Jews are of course also predominant in radio. Norman Pattiz, for instance, has been for years the chairman of Westwood One, which “is America’s largest producer and distributor of radio programming” and the parent company of Mutual Broadcasting System, the NBC Radio Network, CBS News Radio, Fox News Radio, CNN Radio, the Source, NBC Talknet, and the Westwood One Radio Network.” Its programs are featured on over 7,500 radio stations around the world. By 1988, it was even producing 200 rock and roll concerts a year. The “single biggest stockholder of Westwood One, the nation’s largest radio network” is also Jewish: David Saperstein. [PR NEWSWIRE; MOTHER JONES, 5-3-01]

In 1991 Bruce Kanter was named Executive Vice President and Chief Financial Officer of the Westwood One company. Another Jewish executive, Martin Rubenstein, was the CEO of Mutual Broadcasting until 1984; in 1986 he became the CEO of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Among the many Jewish reporters in commercial radio is Ellen Ratner, “White House correspondent and bureau chief for Talk Radio News Service.” She was formerly the co-host of the widely syndicated Good Day USA. [SPEVACK, V., 5-5-2000, p. 48]

In the government realm, Marc Nathanson was appointed twice by President Bill Clinton to be “chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and other federal broadcasting services… Nathanson founded Falcon Communications. In 1999, he sold the company to Charter Communications for $3.5 million, creating the nation’s fourth-largest cable operator. Nathanson remains one of the largest individual stockholders and vice chairman of Charter’s board. He is also a director of the Digital Entertainment Network and the National Cable Television Association… He recently ventured into online entertainment, making an undisclosed investment in iFilm.” [MOTHER JONES, 5-3-01]

NPR’s White House correspondent? Also Jewish: Mara Liasson. NPR reporter Lina Gradstein is an Orthodox Jew. (Can we remotely imagine a comparable Christian fundamentalist as a reporter at the liberal public radio network?) In 2000, yet another Jew, Jeffrey Dvorkin, was named to the new post as National Public Radio’s ombudsman. He formerly worked as the Vice President for News at NPR; before that, he was in the same position at the Canadian Broadcast Corporation. Why not a Jewish ombudsman? As the Cleveland Jewish News notes,

"[Dvorkin] notes that Jewish listeners comprise more than 20 percent of NPR's audience. A significant number of Jews, like himself, also work at the radio network." [KARFIELD, M., 6-23-2000, p. 27]

Other prominent Jewish NPR figures include Ira Glass (host and producer of This American Life, Robert Siegel (co-host of All Things Considered), and David Isay and his Associate Producer Stacy Abramson – contributors to All Things Considered). Rabbi Lawrence Kushner is a “regular commentator” to the same program. [PROVIDENCE JOURNAL-BULLETIN, 5-1-99] Senior editor for the All Things Considered weekend edition is Jonathan Broder, also a writer for Israel’s Jerusalem Report. Scott Simon (whose father was Jewish), now hosts Weekend Edition and has “one of the most familiar voices on radio.” (In 1997 Catholic groups protested Weekend Edition’s satirical song of Catholic ritual called ‘The Vatican Rag. ‘ “NPR is taking great delight in offending Catholics,” objected William Donahue, of a Catholic defense organization, “They would not be disparaging of blacks, Jews, and gays. This rank hypocrisy and double standard is what gets our ire up.”) [MCCORD, J., 6-12-97, p. 57]

Ketzel Lavine is the “funny gardener” on the Weekend program. Charles Mayer is “one of the new members of NPR, a young producer.” [JULIAN, S., 6-6-2000] Michael Feldman hosts Whad’ya Know? Terry Gross is host of NPR's Fresh Air (co-producer: Naomi Person). Even Ray Suarez, of Puerto Rican heritage, has a Jewish mother. For six and a half years he hosted NPR's Talk of the Town program until he recently moved to PBS television as a “senior correspondent” for the News Hour with Jim Lehrer. [DIAZ, K., 10-28-99] (The director of the Lehrer news hour is David Deutch.) Likewise, David Brancaccio, host of NPR's Marketplace, is of Jewish/Italian descent.

For many years too, the head of the most important NPR radio station in the second largest American radio market (Los Angeles), has been Ruth (Hirschman) Seymour. Seymour, notes the Los Angeles Times, “shaped the public radio station KCRW in her own image… Hawkish on behalf of Israel, Seymour and KCRW often seem to fixate on the Middle East and Europe and, until recently, hardly seemed to acknowledge the existence of Los Angeles.” [RUSSELL, p. A1] Among her pet projects was a 13-week 32-story collaboration between KCRW and the National Yiddish Book Center [which opened its new Amherst, Massachusetts $8 million building in 1997] to air Eastern European Jewish short stories to a nationwide audience. [MARGOLICK, p. 3] (Another nationally “acclaimed National Public Radio series” was Great Jewish Stories from Eastern Europe and Beyond). [BIGA, L., 4-14-2000, p. 34]

Meanwhile, in the commercial radio world, Mel Karmazin, was described by the New York Daily News in 1997 as “one of the most powerful and richest men in the media business.” His personal fortune is estimated at over $200 million. He headed “the CBS broadcasting giant’s most precious properties: it's string of 14 TV stations and 77 radio stations and is poised to take over the entire network.” [FURMAN, p. 31] The CBS radio group was by 1998 America’s largest radio company in terms of revenues, at $1.5 billion. In 1998 Karmazin became the chairman and CEO of the resurrected Infinity Broadcasting division, which he had sold to CBS two years earlier for $3.9 billion. CBS has also acquired the then fifth largest radio company – American Radio Systems – during Karmazin’s tenure. Among other accomplishments, Karmazin resurrected the career of decadent Jewish radio talk show host Howard Stern when he was fired by WNBC in 1985. “At the time,” notes the Daily News, “Stern was under siege. Parents and religious groups regularly protested his provocative broadcasts and boycotted his advertisers… No matter what Stein did on the air, whether it was lesbian dial-a-date or celebrating his own flatulence, Karmazin stuck with him,” eventually even paying a “$1.7 million settlement to the Federal Trade Commission to settle indecency charges against Stern.” [FURMAN, p. 31] “During is career in radio,” noted the Washington Post, “Mr. Karmazin championed the notion of favoring good ratings over just about everything else, including taste.” [SCHWARTZ, p. 13]

Karmazin, head of the CBS Station Group (radio and television) in May 1997 became Chief Operating Officer of the CBS corporation. By January 1998, notes the New York Times, “he muscled aside the CBS Chief Executive Officer, Michael Jordan… for the top job,” finally reigning over all of the firm. [ELLIOIT, S., p. 16] Following the pattern of more and more centralized media monopolies, in September 1999 CBS merged into the aforementioned Viacom, headed by another Jewish mogul, Sumner Redstone. Karmazin was now the president and Chief Operating Officer of the new Viacom, number 2 man behind Redstone, but all divisions reported to him. “Mr. Redstone,” noted the New York Times, “predicted that when his position finally became vacant, Mr. Karmazin would get the job.” [ELLIOIT, p. 16] Viacom now ruled CBS, MTV, the Nashville Network, Nickelodeon, Paramount, Simon and Schuster, VH1, the Blockbuster video chain, and on and on. And who is chairman of CBS Television? Leslie Moonves, is also Jewish [ELKIN, M., 7-13-2000], and reputed to be a distant relative of David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister of Israel. Only a month after the World Trade Center terrorist attack, he was under fire by some for his consideration of a new sitcom show based on the atrocity. [LOS ANGELES TIMES, 10-20-01, p. F4]

In 1996 President Bill Clinton responded to lobbying pressures from the entertainment media and signed a bill deregulating American radio; companies had formerly been limited to the ownership of two radio stations in any given geographical market and 40 stations (20 on AM, 20 on FM) overall. The new law allowed the ownership of up to eight stations in a given area, and the total number that a company could own was now unlimited. In the next two and a half years, 4,000 of America’s 11,000 radio stations changed ownership [FINANCIAL TIMES, 6-10-98, p. 24] as the richest companies rushed to expand into giant media conglomerates, increasingly monopolizing and homogenizing the airwaves, and creating what one professor called the “McDonaldization” of radio. “More and more regulators, academics, and advertisers,” noted the Dallas Morning News, “worry that radio’s merger-mania concentrates too much power in too few hands.” [DWORKIN, p. 1H]

Quickly, two radio companies stood out as especially active in bloating themselves immediately after Clinton’s deregulation bill to gigantic status:
Chancellor Media, and Jacor Communications.

After a series of massive buyouts of other companies, in late 1998 the Chancellor Media corporation became America’s largest radio broadcast company with over 456 stations in 105 markets across America (it also owns or manages 12 TV stations). Its AMFM Radio Network was also created to provide program syndication. It even owns the Primedia Broadcast Group in Puerto Rico and 50% of Latin America’s largest Latin American radio company (in Mexico). Chancellor also owns 37,000 outdoor advertising display boards in 37 states.

In 1998, the president and CEO of Chancellor, Scott Ginsburg, resigned and took with him a “severance” package worth $59 million. He was replaced by another Jewish executive, Jeffery Marcus, the founder of Marcus Cable, “the largest closely held U.S. cable TV company.” [LA TIMES, p 4-30-98, p. 7] In
Radio Network to run Chancellor’s AMFM Radio Network. He was also named senior vice president of Chancellor.

The parent company (Hicks Muse Tate and Furst) that owns Chancellor Media is not Jewish-owned, but in 1998 it joined forces with the America’s largest private equity company, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts (which is Jewish) to create the largest chain of movie theatres in America – Regal Cinema. Plans were to own 20% of the total cinema screens in the nation by 1999. [LEWIS, W, p. 2]

The Jacor Communications rise to gigantic status is even more dramatic, zooming from obscurity to become the third largest American radio broadcasting corporation (after CBS and Chancellor). Starting in early 1996 with 20 radio stations, by late 1998 it owned 205 in 56 cities. In 1997 alone Jacor paid $1.2 billion for 77 new stations. “Jacor,” noted the Associated Press, “has gone on a cost-to-coast buying spree that has raised eyebrows even in an era when loosened controls on the broadcast industry have led us to widespread purchase and consolidation of radio groups.” [NOLAN] The company was particularly interested in “clustering,” i.e., buying the maximum number (eight) of radio stations in a given market including Denver, San Diego, and Cincinnati. By 1997, Jacor had eighteen such clusters throughout America. Aside from flirting with local information monopolies (it is not impossible that the eight most dominant radio stations in any given area could be owned by the same controller), the economic effect of this is significant. Early in Jacor’s buying spree, for example, its Cincinnati stations cornered 44.3 percent of the radio advertising dollar in that area.

Among Jacor’s other buys was also EFM Media Entertainment, the syndication company that holds the rights to the number one rated radio talk show in America – that of conservative political news commentator Rush Limbaugh.
The next year Jacor bought the rights to (Jewish) Laura Schlessinger’s number two rated talk show for $71.5 million. Jacor even bought a Christian radio station in St. Louis, WCBW-FM.

For Limbaugh’s part, Susan Rosenbluth, editor of the Jewish Voice and Opinion, noted that “as one who knows Limbaugh and has personally followed his career for many years, I can assert categorically that his philo-Semitism and pro-Israel stances are sincere and heartfelt.” [ROSENBLUTH, S., 10-9-94] In 1995, the New York Times featured an article on Limbaugh’s “legman” Joel Rosenberg, director of research for Limbaugh’s Limbaugh Newsletter. Posted in Washington DC, says the Times, Rosenberg

“is the eyes and ears – and, on occasion, the muscle – of Mr. Limbaugh in the capital… Mr. Rosenberg considers himself something of an expert on Israel, where he has travelled extensively and spent a year as a student at Tel Aviv University. The summer before his graduation from Syracuse, he worked at the State Department, helping produce a videotape that introduces Israel to Foreign Service Officers newly stationed in Tel Aviv… [Rosenberg] describes himself to acquaintances as an evangelical Christian… [He regards] himself as a rather committed Zionist.” [BERKE, p. 1]

The economic piston behind the Jacor feeding frenzy was Sam Zell, a Jewish billionaire who is also the chairman and major stockholder in the company. Zell was listed in the mid-1990s as the 96th wealthiest American by Forbes magazine. The president of Jacor is also Jewish, Steve Lehman, as is the CEO, Randy Michaels (real name: Benjamin Homel). (Sheila Rosenberg was Chairperson and Robert Lawrence the co-CEO in 1996).

Michaels has long cultivated a distinct reputation in the radio business. In the early 1990s at a Radio & Records convention he ripped the shirt off a woman he planted in the audience during his talk about the “importance of being outrageous.” [STARK, p. 63] Michaels, wrote the Dallas Morning News, also “has earned publicity for promoting his stations with billboards that featured naked women and disgraced celebrities.” [DWORKIN, p. 1H] In 1992 ABC’s 20/20 TV program featured a story about a sexual harassment suit by a former talk show host. Broadcasting magazine noted that

“In the report, 20/20 quoted [former Jacor employees] who said that ‘Jacor’s emphasis on sexually oriented programming continues off the air, creating a raunchy workplace atmosphere that [was]… intolerable for some female employees’…. The report detailed incidents in which Michaels, then vice president of programming and an on-air personality at WFLA, allegedly accosted women with a flexible rubber penis and twice mooned a female employee.” [VILES, p. 33]

In 1996, as a recorded radio stunt, local employees at a Jacor affiliate in Denver went to a mosque and “played the national anthem on a bugle and taunted worshippers.” The Denver Post responded by condemning the station attitude created by Jacor’s top executives:

“The management of radio station KPI would have us believe that the buck stops with disc jockeys, in the outrageous invasion of Muslim mosque in Denver. Wrong. The buck should stop at Jacor, the corporate owner of the station… Jacor has demonstrated it has the financial clout and the influence to dominate the Denver radio market with eight stations. But this latest incident proves that Jacor is a lousy, money-grubbing corporate citizen. It obviously couldn’t care less about the irresponsible, bigoted trash it’s spewing out over the public airwaves. [AMOLE, p. F5A]

In 1998 Jacor made Denver’s news again when a citizens’ group – Citizens Opposing the Stadium Cost – charged that Jacor’s eight local stations were “openly engaged in a campaign to shape public opinion and influence an election that would result in substantial profits for itself as well as its political and business allies.” [LOWE, p. A10]

(Ever in flux, in 1999, with continuing corporate mergers and reshufflings, Jacor merged with Clear Channel Communications [non-Jewish (?) CEO Lowry Mays] to become the second largest radio group in America in terms of stations (458). Randy Michaels was named president of Clear Channel).

In the cable world, based in Philadelphia, the Comcast Corporation is America’s third largest cable company (only behind Time-Warner and TCI). Comcast was founded by three Jewish entrepreneurs in the 1960s – Ralph Roberts, Daniel Aaron, and Julian Brodsky. By the 1990s the company’s chairman, Roberts, was worth $400 million and owned 78% of the company’s voting stock. In 1997 he ceded voting control to his son, Brian, who had been earlier named, at age 30, as the Comcast president. By 1996, Brian was also Chairman of the National Cable Television Association and on the Boards of Turner Broadcasting System, QVC, Inc., and Viewer’s Choice. [ALMANAC, 4-23-96]

In 1991, another Jewish executive, Ann Wexler, was named as Director of the Comcast company (she had once served as a public liaison assistant to President Jimmy Carter. Wexler’s husband is the president of American University in Washington DC). In 1998 Howard Fischer & Associates took credit for bringing Steve Burke (formerly president of Disney’s ABC Broadcasting) to the presidency of Comcast as Brian Roberts moved upwards. Comcast has been active in Jewish and Israeli causes, including a film about the Holocaust that was introduced to local school systems. In 1993 the company even defrayed expenses for a Jewish National Fund “gala” featuring the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Colin Powell. “Having someone of Colin Powell’s stature gives us the edge,” said JNF president David Neving, “and means we’ll sell more tickets to raise money for Israel.” [FEILER, p. 17]

(Brian Roberts won silver medals in squash in 1981, 1985, and 1997 at Israel’s Maccabiah Games. “The Maccabi,” once noted Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion about the Games, “is without a doubt one of the most important offshoots of the Zionist movement.” [http://www.maccabicanada.com/about/history/history.html] According to the organization’s web site, the Maccabiah Games’ “Goals and Objectives” are “1. To re-enforce Jewish Zionist Education, both for the youth and adults to enable the Jews to receive and explore their roots. 2. To fight Assimilation 3. To get the Jewish youth of the Diaspora more acquainted with the Jewish heritage and tradition. 4. To foster the relationship between the Jewish communities inter-globally and with Israel.”) [http://www.maccabiworld.org/aboutus.html]

In 2001, Comcast took over AT&T’s cable business to become the “giant of the industry… with 22.3 million cable subscribers in 41 states. The company will have more than 30 percent of the cable market… The Roberts [family] will have only a 1 percent equity stake in the combined company. But they will control one-third of the voting stock, far more than any other single block of voting shareholders.” [DABNEY, M., 12-20-01]

Further along in the mega-mogul category, the Bronfman family (worth $2.7 billion) acquired a fortune by supplying United States bootleggers with alcohol from Canada during the prohibition years. Deals were made with Jewish gangster Meyer Lansky for the illegal distribution of Bronfman’s liquor into the United States. The Bronfman’s own Seagram’s, and market Chivas Regal scotch, Absolut vodka, Mumm champagne, Martell cognac, and Tropicana fruit juices. At the age of 16 a young heir, Edgar Bronfman, Jr. (whose father is the Chairman of the World Jewish Congress) spent $500,000 on making his first movie. Later, he bought 15% of the shares of Time Warner (the parent firm of Warner Brothers, HBO, and Time magazine.) In 1995 Edgar gained 80% of MCA, Inc. the parent company of Universal pictures, Universal City and other theme parks in Los Angeles and Orlando, Florida, and Geffen Records. MO-MENT, p. (By the early 1980s MCA – run by Lew Wasserman and Sidney Scheinberg – had evolved from a talent agency to a television production and music firm.) The Bronfman dynasty, as noted earlier, also owns the PolyGram media empire. (Ever changing, Seagram recently merged with the French Vivendi media conglomerate. In 2001, Jewish Hollywood mogul Barry Diller took the helm of Vivendi Universal, “one of Hollywood’s hottest studios.”) [VERRIER/BROWN, 12-16-01]

Some apologists have argued that, with large investments in Hollywood by powerful Japanese corporations in recent years, that Jewish power there is being diluted. Not so says Michael Medved:

“It’s… foolish to use foreign ownership of leading entertainment conglomerates as a rebuttal to those who blame Jews for what they dislike about Hollywood. Sure, companies like Sony [and] Matsushita [are] not recognizable Jewish name[s]. Nevertheless, these offshore enterprises have functioned in Hollywood like absentee landlords, employing long-time industry insiders in all the most powerful positions rather than importing their own personnel from Tokyo or Sidney. When Matsushita took over MCA-Universal, for instance, the home company did nothing to undermine the unquestioned authority of Universal’s legendary – and all Jewish – management triad of Lew Wasserman, Sid Scheinberg, and Tom Pollack. Now, of course, the Japanese conglomerate has abandoned its high-flying Hollywood adventure and turned over its entertainment division to Seagram – a business that’s owned by one of the most visible and active Jewish families on the globe, the Bronfman, whose patriarch heads the World Jewish Congress. Young Edgar Bronfman Jr. has now arrived in California to take personal control of the operation and has installed Ron Meyer (former associate of Mike Ovitz at the Creative Artists Agency) as his second-in-command.” [Medved, p. 37]

Before Edgar Bronfman (chairman of the World Jewish Congress) and his family’s Seagrams corporation took over MCA-Universal, there was a lingering “Jewish problem” to Matsushita ownership. “A sensitive matter that remains unresolved from the Matsushita-MCA deal,” noted the Los Angeles Times in 1991, “is Matsushita’s relationship with Israel. Matsushita was listed late last year among the companies that comply with an Arab-led business boycott of Israel. The disclosure did not threaten the deal but did express all sides, because Wasserman is a leading supporter of Israel.” [CITRON, Matsushita, p. D1]

For Ovitz’s part, when Sony bought Columbia Pictures in 1988, he bagged an $8 million “consultant” fee. When Matsushita bought out MCA, Ovitz’s consultancy brought him $40 million. [SLATER, p. 219, 227] In 1994 an unnamed Sony executive in Tokyo told the Japanese business weekly Keizaikai, “The United States film business is almost completely controlled by Jews. This is true of what we are doing as well and our job is to use them in an efficient manner.” The magazine then noted, “What this person is saying is that you cannot ignore the Jews if you do business in the United States.” [MAGIDA, British, p. 42] (These conditions were apparently noted by Berry Gordy, founder and head of the African-American Motown musical recording label. A Jewish employee, Rob Cohen, was installed as a prominent official in the company’s film division). [TARABORRELLI, p. 299]

The Japanese-owned media giant Sony has maintained a prominent Jewish executive presence in its American operations. In 1994, Michael Raskin, the 33-year-old chief American counsel for the Sony Corporation, fell and died on Mt. Fuji. In a 1997 job purge because of weak profits, Sony Corporation of America chief Michael Schulhoff and Sony movie president Fred Bernstein lost their positions. (Alan Levine, chairman of Sony Pictures Entertainment, had been fired the year before). Schulhoff had earlier hired Jeff Sagansky in 1994 as his second in command. By 1998 Sagansky was – of all things – the CEO of Paxson Communications, a “conservative Christian” station. Illustrating the necessity even here for a negotiating Jewish presence in order to reasonably function in the Jewish entertainment and broadcast industry, the network under his command would not be solely slanted from a Christian point of view. As Sagansky told the Hollywood Reporter, “I’m Jewish so if that were true [the owner of this station] certainly wouldn’t have gotten me to do this job.” [DAVIES, J.] In 1999, still head of Paxson, Sagansky was honored with the Jewish Television Network’s “Vision Award.” Sagansky was also a member of JTN’s Board of Directors. [PR NEWSWIRE, 9-9-99]

By 1996 Marvin Schick complained that “There may be someone adept in cyberspace who can roam across the Internet and ascertain how often Michael Schulhoff and Mel Iberman have been enshrined as outstanding Jews. They’re the top American officials of Sony, the company that has just released Michael Jackson’s album which contains words so vile and anti-Semitic that it is impossible to figure out what was on anyone’s mind.” [SCHICK, p. 5]

Jewish mass media influence, internationally, in a variety of countries, is also profound. Jews, for instance, have been prominent in defining the world throughout Latin America from the media helms. In Brazil, Jewish media mogul Silvio Santos (original name: Senor Abranavel) controls 98% of the group shares of that country’s second largest TV network – Sistema Brasileiro de Televisao (SBT), a conglomerate of 33 companies employing 15,000 people. Santos long ago installed himself as an on-air entertainer, and is a well-known TV personality. The (London) Daily Telegraph notes that Santos is “best known as the beaming millionaire host of Brazil’s most popular television variety show… [which features] half-naked Samba dancing girls, celebrity guests, and [a] Treasure Chest of Happiness lottery [that is] part of very working-class Brazilian’s traditional Sunday.” [HARGREAVES, p. 21]

By 1991, Santos was also the on-air host of the popular “They’ll Do Anything for Money” show. The Associated Press described the show:

“How about it, Christianne?’ Santos coaxed. ‘I’ll give you 10,000 cruzeiros (about $10) if you let me mash this egg on your head.’ Maciel, 18, an unemployed maid, refused. ‘How about 20,000?’ said Santos. ‘No? How about 40,000!’ She studied the audience, then nodded, embarrassed… The program, which pays audience members money to be the butt of pranks, has touched off a ratings battle that has all Brazilian networks thinking up new ways to ridicule contestants. The new crop of shows has also sparked a debate over what’s funny and what’s simply cruel.” [LEWAN, AP, INTERNET]

Another SBT show was “Get It Right or Get Splattered, in which contestants who give wrong answers to trivia questions get a pie in the face. Now, other networks have joined in the trend.” [LEWAN, AP] In 1989, Santos even sought to run for the presidency of Brazil. It was no joke; as the (London) Daily Telegraph noted in a headline: “Game-show Host Could Win Brazil’s Presidency.” [HARGREAVES, p. 21]

In Peru, preeminent media mogul Baruch Ivcher is an immigrant from Israel and owns the country’s largest television station. In 1997, during political troubles with the government for a series of television exposes, Ivcher lived in Miami and Israel. His minority partners in the station, also Jewish, ran the company in his stead. [FORWARD, 11-7-97, p. 3] In Panama, the largest newspaper, La Prensa, is owned by Jewish mogul Robert Eisenmann. Even in Jamaica, that country’s most prominent newspaper – the Gleaner – is most publicly associated with the Ashenheim family. [HOLZBERG, p. 146] In Bolivia, a country that had less than 500 Jews in the whole country in 1987, “publisher and book dealer Werner Guttentag [is] a major presence on the national cultural scene.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 127]

In Mexico, the principal news anchorman for Televisa (which in recent years has held a monopolistic 95 per cent of the television audience) was Jacobo Zabludovsky. [OPPENHEIMER, A., p. 128, 131] He retired in 1998 after 27 years. Zabludovsky is often referred to as the “Walter Cronkite of Mexico.” He was “the nation’s most influential journalist who was also director of the network’s news division for many years.” [BUCKLEY, T.] Zabludovsky’s son, Abraham, is also a prominent reporter at the TV network.

In 2001 Jewish author Elissa Rashkin wrote a book entitled Women Filmmakers in Mexico. Of the five filmmakers she features, at least two are Jewish (despite the fact that there are merely 86,000 Jews in all of Mexico). Such filmmakers reflect typical Jewish themes. For Guita Schyfter,

> “with government backing, she was able to make a film which directly addressed her own experience of outsidersness and exclusion, as well as the history of Mexican Jews as a whole. That Schyfter’s reexamination of mexicanidad through Jewish eyes came to the screen in the 1990s has everything to do with larger changes taking place during this period: the collapse of myths of national unity in the wake of successive economic and political crises and the emergence of contestatory discourses such as feminism, gay activism, and campesino and indigenous resistance to centralized state power… Schyfter was refused permission by the president of the Ashkenazi community to film at the old synagogue and the Jewish cemetery, on the grounds that the film included an intermarriage.” [RASHIN, E., 2001, p. 143, 153]

Then there was Jacques and Natasha Gelman, Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe, who settled in Mexico. They were

> “major players in the glamorous Mexico City film scene of the 1940s… Aristocratically educated in St. Petersburg, Russia, Jacques Gelman had been sent packing to Europe by his land-owning parents following the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, his pockets stuffed with several Faberge eggs he luckily was never forced to sell. Much of his fortune… came from discovering and producing the films of Mexican comedian Cantiflas.” [VANESIAN, K., 6-7-01]
Elsewhere in Latin America, Jaime Yankelevich “pioneered both radio and television and broadcasting in Argentina, becoming a nationally known figure in the country’s culture and politics… [ELKIN, 1998, p. 157] … Max Glucksman (1875-1946) was producing, distributing, and exhibiting films in the early years of this century. Albeito Soifer… wrote tangos and other music for more than eighty movies. Leon Klimovsky… directed movies, and Luis Saslavsky wrote screenplays for Argentine and foreign films. Numerous Jewish actors and actresses, such as the Singerman sisters and Iza Kremer, gained fame.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 101]

“turned to journalism as a profession, and a considerable number of them founded their own journals of opinion. The total number of periodicals emanating from identifiable Jewish sources that have circulated in Buenos Aires at one time or another probably comes to as many as 250. With the acculturation of the second generation and attrition of the communal press, journalists who are Jewish emerged into the wider, multimedia, Spanish-and-Portuguese world. Bernardo Verbitsky of El Mundo, Antonio Portnoy of La Gaceta and others introduced a substantial presence of journalists into the Argentine press… The current president of Argentine PEN is a Jew, and so is the first Latin American to be elected president of the Federation of International Association of Journalists… Jews were among the pioneers of Argentine films… and a host of other entertainers achieved fame on the Argentine radio and stage despite their ‘exotic’ origins… Actors occupy several pages in recent books about Jewish Argentina and Mexico.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 276]

The most famous Jewish Argentinean media figure in the West was probably Jacobo Timerman, founder of Primera Plana (“a kind of Argentina Time”), [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 305] and founder, publisher, and editor of the newspaper La Opinion. [SIMPSON/BENNETT, 1985, p. 245] “Broadly speaking, La Opinion supported [in the 1970s] much of the military government’s disastrous economic policy,” note John Simpson and Jana Bennett, “and it rarely spoke in unambiguous terms about the government’s total disregard of human rights, or the continuing practice of torture and murder. What it did was to highlight some of the cases that came to light, and that was itself dangerous enough.” [SIMPSON/BENNETT, p. 247] In 1977 Timerman was arrested, initially during an investigation into Timerman’s partner at La Opinion (a 45% shareholder in the paper), banker David Gravier. Gravier had recently died in a plane crash, and soon thereafter his banking interests in Belgium, Switzerland and the United States crashed, causing a scandal. It was also discovered that Gravier, also Jewish, “had been handling $17 million, mainly raised through robberies and ransom demands by the Montonero guerillas.” [SIMPSON/BENNETT, p. 252] As for Timerman, note Simpson and Bennett, “[he] had a reputation as a kingmaker and wheeler-dealer which made the human rights side of his case [in Argentina] more difficult to get across.” [SIMPSON/BENNETT, p. 259]

Timerman was imprisoned, interrogated and tortured by interrogators of the ruling military junta, not uncommon in an era when over 11,000 people in Argentina “disappeared,” presumed murdered by the oppressive dictatorship.

Timerman, in his best-selling book, Prisoner without a Name, Cell without a Number, recalls an early interrogation he was forced to undergo with his captors:

“Question: Are you Jewish?
Answer: Yes.

Question: Are you a Zionist?
Answer: Yes.

Question: Is La Opinion Zionist?
Answer: La Opinion supports Zionism since it is the liberation movement of the Jewish people. It considers Zionism to be a movement of high positive values, the study of which can shed light on many problems related to building national Argentine unity.

Question: Then it is a Zionist newspaper?
Answer: If you wish to put it in those terms, yes.

Question: Do you travel to Israel often?
Answer: Yes.

Question: Do you know the Israeli ambassador?
Answer: Yes.”

Timerman survived a two and a half-year imprisonment and, due to international pressure upon the Argentine government in his behalf, was released. He was expelled from Argentina and subsequently emigrated to Israel.

Also in Argentina, Alef, “the world’s first Jewish TV channel outside of Israel,” was initiated in 1995. Vice president Horacio Lutzky, said Television Business International “will have a Jewish perspective, but is looking for a universal audience.” Transmitting 24 hours a day, the network was founded and funded by “15 Argentine investors and local and Israeli media professionals.” Two-thirds of the programming was to come from Israel. “Also under way are negotiations with cable operators in other Latin American countries.” [TEL. BUS. INT’L, p. 16]

Along the same lines, in Great Britain, the (London) Independent wrote in 1998 that:

“Britain’s Jews are being urged to seize the unique opportunity presented by the digital revolution to create their own television channel. The call came yesterday from the Institute for Jewish Policy Research (JPR), a leading international think-tank, and is being backed by prominent Jews who hold some of the most powerful posts in British broadcasting, including David Elstein, chief executive of Channel 5, Michael Green, chairman of Carleton Communications, and Sir Jeremy Isaacs, founding chief executive of Channel 4. His successor Michael Grade was also Jewish. Indeed, until he quit television last year, all of Britain’s five terrestrial channels had Jews in prominent positions.” [BROWN, p. 11]
One of the forces behind the new Jewish channel, professor Roger Silverstone, said that “it is high time that Jews participate in electronic media space to recover their heritage, to redefine their identity, and their social and cultural contribution, and to make their presence felt in the wider public sphere.” [BROWN, p. 11] “Professor Silverstone,” noted the Independent, “acknowledged the risk of creating an ‘electronic ghetto’ through such a narrow casting initiative. But he envisaged that the proposed channel would avoid the danger by appealing from day one to non-Jews.” [BROWN, p.11]

Also in England, in the 1980s, the head of Channel 4 in London, Jeremy Isaacs, was Jewish. [LILENTHAL, p. 143] A former chairman of the BBC, Stuart Young, was also chair of the Institute for Jewish Affairs. By the late 1970s, another British Jew, Sir James Goldsmith, owned the weekly French newspaper L’Express as well as a significant interest in London’s Daily Express. [MCCLINTICK, p. 303] David Montagu was director of London Weekend Television for 21 years, as well as the chairman and CEO of Orion Bank. Sidney Samuelson has been “head of the British Film Commission since 1991.” [SINGER/SELDIN, 1997, p. 267] “At least three British television stations and a radio station are headed by [Jews],” noted (London) Independent journalist Mark Lawson in 1994, “as, in the past, were three of the great ITV companies: ATV, Granada, and the Thames.” [LAWSON, p. 16] Alex Bernstein, for example, is the former chairman of Granada Television till he retired in 1979; his father, Sidney, founded the company by first building a chain of cinemas, opening one a week in 1935. “Raised in an Orthodox Jewish home,” noted the Associated Press, “Bernstein was not particularly religious. But he was a lifelong supporter of many Israeli charities.” [AP, 2-6-93] Another Jewish mogul, David Goldman, is the former chairman of Britain’s Sage computer software group.

In the mid-1990s, the Internet website of European-based Radio Islam at http://abbc.com/ (considered to be extremely anti-Semitic by Jewish organizations) documented over 250 names of prominent Jews on staff in England’s mass media system, ranging from Alan Yentob (Director of BBC programming) to Judee Goffee (Director of the Independent Television Commission) to David Elstein (the CEO of Channel 5) to Duncan Lewis (the CEO of the Granada Media Group) to Julian Aston (the Managing Director of Channel 1), and on and on and on.

In 1999, Granada Media announced an agreement with the New York Times to “jointly produce international television programming. Granada, one of Europe’s largest commercial television production companies, and a unit of London based Granada Group PLC, said it will have access to the New York Times’ newsroom and other departments, in order to create documentary programming, including science, history, and current affairs shows.” [WALL STREET JOURNAL, p. 3]

In 1998, Scotland’s The Scotsman wondered:

“Vanni who? TV-land was desperately seeking the answer to that question this week after it was announced that Vanni Treves (“of Jewish stock”), a 57-year old lawyer, had been named as the new chairman of Channel 4 television.” [DIDCOCK, p. 31]

In 1991, the (London) Sunday Telegraph noted the path to power of Jewish media mogul Michael Green:

“In his own quest to own a television franchise, Green has immersed himself in the industry, becoming close friends with men such as [Jewish media moguls] Michael Grade of Channel 4 and Alan Yentob of BBC2… The jewel of the ITV [television network was] added to his crown… Green attended Great Portland Street synagogue where he met Isaac (later Lord) Wolfson, the founder of Great Universal Stores and one of the most influential businessmen of his generation…. Helped mainly by [Jewish] city advisor Michael Sorkin of Hambros Bank, Green built [his] company… into a near $2 billion communications giant… [Green] is great friends with [Jewish moguls] Lord Rothschild, Charles Saatchi, Gerald Ratner, and media bigwigs Grade and Yentob… Green cherishes a collection of cars including a 14-year old Rolls-Royce convertible, a Bentley Turbo, and an Austin Martin Virage.” [SUNDAY TELEGRAPH, p. 23]

In 1995, seven of the ten most popular television drama shows in Great Britain were produced by Green’s Carleton UK Television. [LAING, p. 15] The Daily Telegraph called him “the most powerful figure in British commercial television.” [VALLELY, p. 21] (In 1998 the Carlton Communications division was fined $3.2 million by a British TV commission “for faking an award-winning documentary about Colombian drug smuggling.” [USA TODAY, 12-22-98]) In 1998, British Jewish media mogul Stephen Grabiner (whose brother Mike runs Energis, a telecommunications company) was “the front man for the biggest media launch this country has ever seen” [LYNN, INTERNET] – British Digital Broadcasting (BDB), a joint venture between Michael Green’s Carlton company and Granada. These two corporations, note the Wall Street Journal, “are the two largest players in ITV, “which is Britain’s leading commercial terrestrial [i.e., non-digital/satellite] channel.” [PYLAS, p. 14] Grabiner also headed the newspaper and magazine division of United News and Media. By 1998 too, BBC’s studios were, quite literally, rented out to a Jewish bar mitzvah ceremony. “More normally home to A Question of Sport and the Mrs. Merton Show,” noted the London Independent, “Studio A will now be made kosher so that food can be served to a party of several hundred.” [MCCANN, p. 10]

By the late 1990s, more and more British observers were expressing concern about the increased decadence on British broadcasting airwaves. “The tidal wave of sex and nudity,” complained journalist Leo McKinsty, “demonstrates that the BBC and other broadcasters have lost all sense of morality… A friend of mine was recently trying to make a programme for the supposedly religious Everyman slot on BBC 1 about Edith Stein, the Jew who converted to Christianity, died in a concentration camp and has recently been canonized. He was told the subject was ‘not sexy enough.’” [MCKINSTY, L., 11-23-98] Government Culture Secretary Chris Smith even told the House of Commons that “We have noted in recent days a very considerable concern about some of the content on television, particularly in relation to Channel 5.” [LEY, G., 6-22-2000, p. 19]

Channel 5 is of course headed by Jewish mogul David Elstein, and he increasingly has come under attack for the station’s fare. “Can this really be the same man,” wondered the Daily Mail,

“who today runs a channel that seeps tat into our living rooms with offerings such as Stark Naked, a naturism programme screened at 8:30 PM; Pleasure Zone, the theme of which is sex, debauched films masquerading as drama; The Naughty, Naughty Hypno Show, in which members of the audience are hypnotised to engage in lewd acts such as simulating oral sex and wearing a rubber phallus; and, of course, the gruesome show Naked Jungle in which all the contestants appear in the nude.” [BROWN, A., 11-2-97]

“Much of this [television decadence],” noted the London Daily Mail in another article the next year, “can be traced back to the zeal with which [Jewish media mogul] Michael ‘Pornographer-in-Chief’ Grade introduced a whole new approach when in charge of Channel 4, filling its outposts with sex-oriented programs.” [MCKINSTY, L., 11-23-98] Other Jewish moguls include David and Ralph Gold,

“[who are] most famous for owning the Ann Summers chain of sex shops, run by David’s daughter Jacqueline. The Gold brothers have interests in top shelf publishing as well as owning independent magazine distributor Portman. The brothers also jointly own Sport Newspapers and Birmingham City football club with David Sullivan.” [TMF NEWS]

Elsewhere in Britain, the avidly pro-Israel Hollinger Group (“described by one author in 1997 as “the world’s fastest growing press empire” [NESIVSKY, p. 1]) is the owner of London’s Daily Telegraph, the Jerusalem Post and is the owner – or has an interest in – nearly 500 newspapers throughout the world. It controls half of all the daily newspapers in Canada and even owns 24% of Australia’s second-largest newspaper chain, Fairfax Holdings. The man who runs all this from England, Conrad Black, is not Jewish, but, noted the (London) Sunday Times, “he thought nothing of turning the whole traditional editorial policy of the Jerusalem Post on its head once he acquired it, transforming it from a dovish into a hawkish [militantly pro-Israel, anti-Arab] paper overnight.” [HOWARD, INTERNET]

The Jerusalem Post itself noted that:

“For the record, Black has long had Jews on his company boards, including such figures as Chaim Herzog [a former president of Israel], Henry Kissinger, the Canadian real-estate tycoon Paul Reichmann, former Canadian ambassador to the U.S. Allan Gottlieb, U.S. security advisor Richard Perle, Peter Bronfman, Sir Zelman Cowen, and others. Black’s current wife, the one-time Sunday Times of London columnist Barbara Amiel, is Jewish, and Black’s longtime Jewish partner David Radler became the Post’s chairman.” [NESIVSKY, p. 22]
The (London) Sunday Times noted that Black’s “wife, chief operating officer, and other key members of staff, including the Fairfax chairman [in Australia], are Jewish.” [BERNOTH] Black’s wife, Barbara Amiel, is also a director of the Spectator, the Jerusalem Post, and Sunday Night Magazines. For years she has been the senior political columnist for the Sunday Times (London). “Those of us who care about Israel,” wrote Amiel in 1999, “can’t come up with any pragmatic reason for our unrequited love… I’d support Israel even if I were not a Jew, simply because any country that is subject to such malevolent distortion fits my notion of a worthy underdog.” [AMIEL, 1999, p. 17] In 1995, Conrad Black and his wife were guests of honor at the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada. “Black and his wife, Barbara Amiel, a columnist for MacLean’s and the Daily Telegraph,” observed MacLean’s itself in 1997, “are known for their hawkish positions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.” [NOLEN, p. 36]

Black’s Jewish partner, David Radler, is also the CEO of Hollinger (Blacks’ Canadian holding company) and he is the chairman of the Chicago Sun-Times. He is also on the board of the UK Telegraph newspaper and Southam (Canada’s biggest newspaper chain). [SIMON, p. 16] Radler was described by the Financial Times (London) as “Black’s closest business confidant, his chief deal maker, and when necessary, his hatchet man.” [SIMON, p. 16] [Also note earlier references to Jewish domination of the nineteenth century British newspaper world]

In 2001, Black announced plans to within the year launch a new daily newspaper called the New York Sun. Jewish hedge-fund mogul Michael Steinhardt was a major co-investor. The chief editors at the new paper were announced as Seth Lipsky, former editor of the Jewish ethnic weekly newspaper, Forward, and his ‘protege,’ Ira Stoll. [New York Observer, 11-29-01]

Earlier, in 1991, at the death of corrupt [see earlier] British tycoon Robert Maxwell (born Ludvik Hoch), his media empire included Britain’s Mirror Group of newspapers, including the Daily Mirror and Sunday Mirror. Other media holdings included People, Syndication International, the Scottish Daily Record, the New York Daily News, 50% of Germany’s Berliner Zeitung, 50.1% of Hungary’s Magyar Hirlap, 45% of the Kenya News, the European newspaper, percentages of Canadian media companies, Metromode cable TV, MacMillan, MacMillan-McGraw Hill Educational Books, Pergamon, Que (computer books), Collier, Panini, Berlitz, the Official Airlines Guide, and Europe’s biggest printing company. Maxwell also owned a major share of Ma’ariv, one of Israel’s two major newspapers. The Jewish Advocate noted that Maxwell “has been called the ‘crook of the century’ following revelations that he looted $900 million from his workers’ pension funds and his complicated web of companies. Hour by hour, new and lurid details surface of Maxwell’s chicanery, deceit, and international intrigue.” Yet, said the Advocate, in its article entitled Robert Maxwell: An Appreciation, “Maxwell was an ardent Zionist devoted to Israel and the Jewish people… Despite all the National Equirer glamour and clamor, beneath the swashbuckling image of ‘Cap’n Bob,’ beat the heart of a real mensch, a decent, sensitive man, a Holocaust survivor.” [PORTER, p. 9]
In 1986 Ari Ben-Menashe, a controversial figure who asserted an identity as an Israeli undercover agent and arms dealer, claimed that he had dealt directly with Maxwell as a “saian” (Jewish “assistant” for the Mossad) in soliciting his help for an Israeli coverup, to impugn actual photographs taken inside Israel’s nuclear weapons plant by defector Mordechai Vanunu as fraudulent. As Seymour Hersh tells it:

“Maxwell made it clear at the brief session, Ben-Menashe recalled, that he understood what had to be done about the Vanunu story. ‘I know what has to happen,’ Maxwell told Ben-Menashe. ‘I have already spoken to your bosses.’” [HERSH, p. 312]

Whether this interchange was true or not (some have challenged Ben-Menashe’s credibility), Maxwell’s Daily Mirror printed Vanunu’s true story as “a hoax or something even more sinister – a plot to discredit Israel.” [BOWER, p. 462] Maxwell, a British citizen, notes Seymour Hersh, “was well known for his closeness to Israel’s top leadership,” and even ordered that the Vanunu photographs be delivered to the Israeli embassy. [HERSH, p. 312] Maxwell’s funeral in Jerusalem was attended by the most powerful Israeli government officials, including prime minister Yitzhak Shamir, and cabinet ministers Ariel Sharon, Moshe Arens, Ehud Olmert, and Shimon Peres. President Chaim Herzog was among Maxwell’s eulogizers, noting his rise as a media mogul, thus “influencing a large sector of mankind in many countries.” [LYNFIELD, p. 7] “Regaled at his graveside by the Israeli government as a hero,” notes Tom Bower, “he was condemned in London as a fraud.” [BOWER, p. xiv] Maxwell’s lawyer in Israel, Yaacov Ne’eman, eventually became the Israeli Finance Minister under Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. [MACHLIS, p. 30] In 1995 Maxwell’s widow was selected by the American Zionist Youth Federation to be the Grand Marshall for New York’s Salute to Israel parade.

Maxwell’s intrigues were diverse. Nicholas Davies, the former Foreign Editor at Maxwell’s Daily Mirror, notes that “for decades Maxwell had been involved with the KGB, not, as far as is known, as an active agent or in spying activities, but according to KGB sources in Moscow, he acted as a conduit, a banker, ‘laundering’ the KGB’s money outside the Soviet Union.” [DAVIES, N., p. 7]

Another Jewish entertainment/media mogul in Britain over the last few decades has been Lew Grade (born Louis Winogradsky). Grade founded the Associated Television Corporation (ATV) and was the Managing Director of ACC (Associated Communications Corporation), which owned ATV. Grade built the largest chain of theatres in the world. His brother, Bernard Delfont (born Boris Winogradsky), became the CEO of EMI’s entertainment division and a nephew, Michael Grade, became Director of Programming for the BBC as well as the CEO of Channel 4 and the director of First Leisure. By the 1960s, notes Michael Pye, “the Grades were the most powerful force in British show business, the three brothers [Lew, Leslie, and Bernard Delfont at their company called the Grade Organization] had television in the Midlands, a string of London theatres, and a vast agency business.” [PYE, p. 234] In 1980, music critic
David Harker noted the omnipresence of the powerful Winogradsky brothers in British music, media, and entertainment worlds:

“The Royal Variety show takes place in a theatre owned by Associated Television (ATV), which is run by Lew Grade – who, just happens, to be Bernard Delfont’s brother. The proceeds from the shows go to a charity – presided over by Bernard Delfont. Delfont is also a director of EMI, the largest record manufacturer in the world. Recently, EMI absorbed one of England’s two big cinema circuits – Associated British Pictures – of which Delfont is also a director. Bernard Delfont is also deputy chairman and joint managing director of the Grade Organization, which is owned by EMI (of which Mr. Delfont is a director). Bernard Delfont thus owns himself – twice. So, if you read the TV Times, buy Pye, Marble Arch, Regal, Columbia, Parlophone, HMV, Pathé, Music for Pleasure, or Odeon Records; if you watch ATV or Thames Television, go to the Talk of the Town, the London Palladium, Victoria Palace, Hippodrome, Her Majesty’s Globe, Lyric, Apollo, or Prince of Wales Theatres; if you go to one of ABC’s 270 cinemas or twelve bowling alleys or one of Ambassador’s ten bowling alleys, then Bernard Delfont has an interest in what you’re doing.” [WICKE, p. 120]

Delfont and London music publisher Cyril Share were particularly active in support of Israel during the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. [COLEMAN, p. 345]

Jewish commentator Barnet Litvinoff once observed

“that Jewish power expressed unconsciously is Jewish power nevertheless. Few films emanating from Hollywood have put a Jew in an unfavourable light, possibly because of the special character the industry assumed through the Jewish pioneers who controlled it for so long. Britain may well be undergoing a similar experience through the ubiquity of the organization headed by Lew Grade and his brothers (the erstwhile Winogradskys of Whitechapel). It is impregnable in entertainment for its hold upon the theatre, the variety scene, commercial television, a significantly large cinema circuit, and its contractual ties with many leading actors, writers, and popular musicians.” [LITVINOFF, B., p. 168]

Lew Grade, note Peter Brown and Steven Gaines,

“owned the huge Associated Television Corporation, Britain’s largest independent producer of TV programs. Lew Grade also personally produced the United Kingdom’s most popular TV variety show, ‘Sunday Night at the Palladium,’ on which an appearance was crucial for an act to gain national attention. Brother Leslie Grade headed the largest show business agency in the country… The third brother, Bernard, owned several prestigious theatres, was a major force behind the West End Theatre business, and by appointment to the Queen booked the most prestigious of all live shows, the Royal Command Performance.” [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 98]

(Among Grade’s many Jewish partners in various reams was Leo Greenfield, “nearly legendary in the field of motion picture distribution,” who co-founded with the British mogul the film distribution firm Associated Film Distribution.) [BROUWER/WRIGHT, 1990, p. 508-509]

Another British Jewish entertainment mogul, Louis Benjamin, was the managing director of the Moss Empire, a theatre chain later running the Pye and Golden Guinea record labels. Benjamin “pioneered cut-price records…, signed many of the musical giants of the day, and was credited with the introduction of Rhythm and Blues to the [British] public.” [DAILY TELEGRAPH, p. 21] Arnold Goodman, who died in 1999, was chairman of British Lion Films and the London Observer newspaper. [FINANCIAL TIMES, 10-16-99, p. 4] Jack Shulman “started one of London’s early silent movie picture houses despite being a staunch member of the communist party.” [BEVAN, J., 10-2-94, p. 24]

Echoing the situation in America, many of Great Britain’s popular comics have been Jewish. These include Peter Sellers, Marty Feldman, Bennett Aron, David Baddiel, Jerry Sadowitz, Paul Kaye, David Schneider, Sid James, Ivor Dembina, Arnold Brown, Alexei Sayle, Ben Elton, Peter Rosengard, Maureen Lipman, and Mark Maier. Television writers Laurence Marks and Maurice Green are recent history’s “Kings of British Sitcom.” [WINNER, D., p. 45] Then there is Esther Rantzen, also Jewish. As London’s Independent reported in 1991:

“Her colleagues and the Press delight in castigating her. She has been called vulgar, mawkish, exploitative, smug and self-serving; ruthless, spiteful, ambitious, aggressive, power-mad. In the Eighties she was frequently likened to Mrs. Thatcher, a comparison she claimed she was proud to accept, adding however that Mrs T. identified with success and she with victims. After winning this week’s libel case against a newspaper that claimed she had protected a known pedophile because he provided inside information for her programme, she said her critics had the right to call her old, ugly and untalented, ‘but if you tell me that I put children in danger, then I have to go to court.’ Few would dispute that Esther Rantzen is the most powerful woman on television. That alone explains why her survival and the 18-year reign of her programme, That’s Life, should arouse strong passions. How did she reach and maintain that eminence?” [INDEPENDENT, 12-21-91, p. 14]

In France, notes Howard Sachar, “by the mid-1950s… as in other Western nations, Jews were prominent in theatre and cinema.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 99] The CEO (1996) of Lagardère Group is Raymond Levy. Its Hachette Filipacchi division publishes over 100 newspapers and magazines (including Women’s Day, Family Life, Video, and Car and Driver) in 15 languages throughout the world. In 1995, Lagardère bought Premiere magazine, in association with Jewish American mogul Ronald Perelman. Its Matra division even produces missile parts, satellite technology, and builds cars with Renault. [HOOVER, p. 110] Also in France, Europe’s largest pay-TV organization is Canal Plus; its CEO is Marc André Feffer. Also, in the 1980s and 90s, for thirteen years, Anne Sinclair, the Jewish wife of French Finance and Industry Minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn, “hosted France’s most popular political chit-chat show on prime television, being voted ‘television’s personality of the year.’” [ECONOMIST, 9-13-97]

Going to France’s Cannes Film Festival? It is monopolized by yet another Jewish entrepreneur, Gilles Jacob. Newsweek noted him in 1999 as a “career maker,” a “former film critic who has been running the Festival for the past 21 years. Not only does Jacob choose and schedule all the films, he also picks the jury president and its members.” [THAMES, D., p. 56] Want to speak freely about the Jewish influence in radio and television in France? In 2000, a French publisher, Éditions Fayard, called back its volume “Journal,” by Renaud Camus, for fear of public backlash for Camus’ negative comments about Jews in the French mass media. The book criticized the “large presence of Jews in a radio and television program, France Culture.” Camus wrote that Jews were “over represented as an ethnic and religious group” and there was too much emphasis on “Jewish culture, Jewish religion, Jewish writers, the state of Israel and its policy, the life of Jews in France, and in the world today or through the centuries.” Among those threatening to sue both the author and publisher was the Jewish director of the France Culture program, Laure Adler. [XINHUA GENERAL NEWS SERVICES, 4-20-2000]

In southern Europe, Jewish mogul Carlo De Benedetti is “one of the richest men in Italy,” and is “ranked third among Italy’s economic barons.” He built to power Olivetti, “one of Europe’s premier computer and telecommunications companies.” A De Benedetti holding company, CIR, owns La Repubblica, “one of the country’s top newspapers,” and the Editrice Periodici Culturali magazine group, which includes L’Espresso, a well-known weekly magazine. In 1992, De Benedetti was sentenced to six years for fraud in a bank scandal. He was also arrested for spending $6 million in a kickback scheme with government officials. [MONTALBANO, p. A13; VULLIAMY, p. 9] Also in Italy, Ever Haggiag, is “a leading Italian motion picture producer and distributor.” [PERRY, V., 6-10-99] In 1996, Fiamma Nirenstein, a “well-known journalist and former director of the Italian Culture Center in Israel,” won Italy’s Premiolini Journalism Award. [SINGER/SELDIN, 1997, p. 328] In 1999, “Clemente J. Mimun, director of TV news at the state-run RAI-2 channel, received the Golden Quill award honoring outstanding personalities in the field of ‘Culture in Journalism.’” [GRUBER, R., 1999, p. 333]

In 2000, Gad Lerner, also Jewish, resigned his position as director of news on Italian state television RAI 1. “He resigned,” noted the Irish Times, “because he had been caught up in a major political row prompted by the fact that his channel (as well as RAI’s channel 3) had last week broadcast disturbing images of pedophile pornography. The controversial images had been broadcast within the ambit of a report on an investigation by state prosecutors in Torre Annunziata, near Naples, which uncovered an Italo-Russian racket that produced and sold child pornography on the Internet. The images in question were deeply disturbing since, among other things, they showed the apparent rape of a young boy by an adult man. Clearly, this was hardly family viewing for the main evening news bulletin on the nation’s longest-established television service, a bulletin that last Wednesday night was watched by seven million people. Within minutes, the RAI switchboard was receiving hundreds of protest calls... Given Mr Lerner’s swashbuckling, campaigning style of journalism on previous news and current affairs programmes, it was hardly surprising to discover that he had made enemies. Nor did it help his popularity on the right that he is a former member of the extreme left-wing group, Lotta Continua.” [AGNEW, P., 10-4-00, p. 14]

The Associated Press noted that “Aldo Grasso, one of Italy’s most respected television critics, said the RAI broadcasts were ‘symptomatic of what has been happening in Italian TV, both state and private, over the last couple of years.’ ‘Editors are driven not by quality or responsibility toward viewers but only the ratings,’ he told the Associated Press. ‘Disturbing and violent images intrude in all kinds of programs, throughout the day.’ The UNICEF head in Italy, Giovanni Micali, also complained bitterly about rising violence. ‘It was an extreme case, but not the first and not the only one,’ he said of the RAI newscasts.” [HUGHES, C., 9-28-00]

In 1994, in Germany, the head of CCC Film Studio, Arthur Brauner, won the German Federal Cross of Merit. [SINGER/SELDIN, 1995, p. 323] Leo Katcher noted in 1968 that

“The German motion-picture industry, which Hitler and Goebbels had converted into a propaganda machine was a shambles when the war ended... For a short time there was no industry at all and then Arthur Brauner emerged as the new titan in the field.” [KATCHER, L., 1968, p. 176]

Brauner, who is from Poland, rose to power in post-war West Germany, where Jews were one-twentieth of one percent of the total population. And as he once noted:

“I made up my mind that some day I would tell the world what it was like to be a Jew. It was then that I decided that I would make motion pictures... I wanted revenge against the Germans. I wanted to show that they had not destroyed all Jews [KATCHER, L. 1968, p. 177]... No Jews can be Germans. If we have a home, it is Israel. That is where our duty lies. That is where our love must go. It is our obligation to defend and aid Israel.” [KATCHER, p. 175]

In 1997, Brauner premiered his eighteenth film about the Holocaust (From Hell to Hell) at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles. The film’s depiction of Poles and Poland garnered protests from the Polish-American community. A month later Brauner’s German studios burned down in what police called an arson attack. [TUGEND, T., 2-7-97]

In 1995, another Jewish mogul, Ron Sommer, took over as CEO of Deutsche Telekom, formerly a massive state bureaucracy. Subdivisions of this firm include T-Online, “Europe’s largest internet service company.” [BENOIT, B., 9-22-2000, p. 32] Sommer was born in Haifa, Israel.
In Sweden, notes Rochelle Wright, “Between 1989 and 1993... there were five Swedish feature films and one co-production— a significant number, given the relatively small annual output of the Swedish film industry— that focused on the Jewish experience. Beginning in 1997, several television dramas of varying lengths also incorporated a discussion of Jewish identity or of Swedish anti-Semitism.” [WRIGHT, R., p. 8]

What about the mass media situation in Canada (aside from the already mentioned Hollinger dynasty)? “Jews,” notes Morton Weinfeld, “have been statistically over represented in both the financial and the creative aspects of the entertainment business. It is a short step from that observation to the vicious canard that the Jews, in some collective, conspiratorial sense, control Hollywood. One could also possibly construct a similar argument for the Canadian scene. People such as Izzy Asper, Garth Drabinsky, Harold Greenberg, Robert Lantos, Ed Mirvish, and Moses Znaimer are just a few of the Canadian Jews who have played innovative roles in the popular entertainment industry in Canada.” [WEINFELD, p. 10]

In that country, Israel “Izzy” Asper controls CanWest Global. He is the chief officer of the company that by the mid-1990s was “already the largest private sector television broadcaster in the country.” [CHISHOLM, p. 36] CanWest is also the country’s “most profitable broadcaster” and has media outlets in every Canadian major markets except Montreal and Alberta. [TELEVISION BUS. INT’L] Asper also controls TV 3 in New Zealand (68% of its stock) and founded TV 4, as well as FM radio network MORE, in the same country. In Australia, CanWest has a 76% stake in Network Ten, the second-most profitable TV station in that country. In Ireland, Asper is the largest investor in TV 3, and his firms also have a financial stake in Ulster TV. [SCOTLAND, Business, p. 4]

A TV colleague calls Asper “the most aggressive businessman I know. The guy is a Machiavellian genius.” [CHISHOLM, p. 36] MacLean’s notes that:

“Asper’s lock on [CanWorld’s] multiple voting shares— he holds all 26 million— has also made him one of the country’s richest corporate players. By the time he is through, he wants to carve a global broadcasting force. He does not say that he will build a dynasty, but his three offspring [including Leonard, CanWorld’s vice president for corporate development; David, the vice president for programming; and Gail, another executive] have taken on key corporate roles, and they will accede to ownership, so there is that too.” [WELLS, p. 40]

Asper blatantly uses his ownership powers to melodramatically propagandize on behalf of the state of Israel, as he did in the National Post (a newspaper he controls) in 2001:

“Israel, after 53 years of statehood, remains the only isolated island of democracy, human rights and rule of law—a lonely outpost of Western civilization and its values in a sea of terrorism, corruption, dictatorship and human enslavement. Countries like Canada should therefore be in the vanguard of its support, for mutual economic, military and ethical reasons… It is therefore a dismaying sight for knowledgeable Canadians to watch our Foreign Affairs minister, John Manley, either a prisoner of naïveté, or political opportunism, embracing this war criminal, [Yassar] Arafat, on Mr. Manley’s recent visit to the Middle East.” [ASPER, I. H., 6-19-01] [See chapter on Israel, p. 1725 for the details of Israel’s “democracy.”]

Other important Jewish executives at CanWorld have recently included president Steve Gross, and David Mintz, the head of programming.

Also in Canada, the wealthy Greenberg family began moving into the mass media in the 1990s, controlling Astral, Canada’s largest pay-per-view and specialty TV company. The chairman of Astral, Andre Bureau, is also the former chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission. Astral Home Entertainment is the largest wholesaler of video cassettes in Canada. Harold Greenberg’s original co-partners in his ventures were Phyllis Switzer, Ed Cowan, and Jerry Grafstein. Barbara Frum host Canada’s prominent TV news program, The Journal.

In 1998 a Canadian magazine called Robert Lantos, head of Alliance Communications, and later Serendipity Point Films, “one of the original architects of what we have now [in the Canadian mass media].” [GROSS, P., 9-21-98] The Toronto Star noted Lantos and Garth Drabinsky (eventually caught in a financing scandal) as “Canadian’s two most emblematic, brash, creative and – according to some – egocentric entertainment figures.” [ADILMAN, 8-29-98, p. M4] Drabinsky founded (with Myron Gottlieb) Livent, America’s largest theatre production company, and Cineplex Odeon, by the 1980s one of North America’s largest movie theatre chains. Until recent scandals, Livent owned the $43 million Ford Center for the Performing Arts in New York City, the Pantages Theatre in Chicago, and the Center for Performing Arts in Chicago, among other holdings.

In his autobiography, Drabinsky notes the influence upon him of Canadian Jewish mogul Nat Taylor:

“He was big, the biggest, a legend in the movie business in Canada, the nearest thing Canada had to a Hollywood mogul. He had been an exhibitor, a distributor, a producer, and a TV-station shareholder. He was partners with Famous Players, the dominant exhibition chain in Canada. He owned the country’s largest movie-production studio, Toronto International Studios, in Kleinberg, Ontario. He was the man who opened the first Canadian movie-house for foreign and art films. He was the guy who came up with the idea of multiple theatres.” [DRABINSKY, G., 1995, p. 56]

Taylor also owned the influential trade journal, Canadian Film Digest, and hired Drabinsky – in his early years – to edit it. [DRABINSKY, G., 1995, p. 58]

Another noteworthy Jewish cinema/theatre mogul in the early years was Nathan Nathanson who “built the Panteges [theatre] in 1920... Even more significantly, Nathanson started not only the Famous Players theatre circuit in Canada but also Canadian Odeon... He was single-handedly responsible for the two chains that formed the duopoly that dominated Canadian exhibition for so long.” [DRABINSKY, G. 1995, p. 64] Then there is Allen Karp, “chairman and chief executive of the Toronto-based Cineplex Odeon Corporation, Canada’s largest film exhibitor.” [KIRSHNER, S., 1-7-99]

Also in Canada, Jewish mogul Paul Godfrey is the 1990s chairman of the Toronto Sun Publishing Company/Sun Media Group and was the 1998 winner of the B’nai B’rith Award of Merit. Five families own TorStar, the parent company of the Toronto Star, the largest newspaper in Canada. One of the families is Jewish: the Thalls. “Their original name was Rosenthal. [Burnett] Thall says he lopped off the first two syllables to overcome the anti-Semitism of 1940s Toronto and improve his job prospects.” [REGULY, E., 10-26-01] In 1992, a baptized Jew, Peter Herrnsdorf, became the CEO and chairman of TV Ontario, replacing Bernard Ostry. (For a decade Herrnsdorf had been the publisher of Toronto Life magazine. “Among those who championed Herrnsdorf’s installation at TVO,” notes Toronto Life, “was Howard Bernstein, a senior producer who had worked for Herrnsdorf at CBC,” where Herrnsdorf had also been an executive). [CANADIAN BUSINESS AND CURRENT AFFAIRS, JULY 1996, p. 56-6; DINOFF, D., 7-26-99, p. 4]

Yet another Jewish media head, Jacques Bensimon, member of the “self-help Sephardic Network,” stepped down in 2000 as the Managing Director of TFO, the French language division of TV Ontario. “He is widely considered,” notes the Canadian Jewish News, “to be the father of TFO... By Bensimon’s estimation, his Jewish sensibility helped enormously, sensitizing him to the perspectives and needs of his French minority audience.” Bensimon left TFO to become an executive at the Banff Television Festival. Bensimon had earlier served as a director at the Film Board of Canada. [KIRSHNER, S., 7-13-2000]

Sandra Kolber, also Jewish, became a member of the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) in 1991. [SINGER/SELDIN, 1992, p. 34] The very powerful president and CEO of CBC at the turn of the millennium is Richard Rabinovitch. (He “spent more than a decade as chief operating officer of Claridge Inc., [Jewish alcohol and media mogul] Charles Bronfman’s private holding company in Montreal, and was chairman of the executive committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress’s Quebec region). [GORDON, S., 11-30-01]

Also in Canada, Garry Schwartz heads Phoenix Pictures and Phyllis Yaffe is the president and CEO of Showcase Television. Both, too, are Jewish. (The chairman of the Canadian Television Fund, a private/public partnership that helped fund 330 TV programs and 17 feature films in 1997-98 alone is Richard Stursberg and Tim Kotchoff was sequentially vice-president of news programming for both CBC and CTV television networks. Are these two men Jewish as well?) At the lower media tiers, a panel discussion at a Canadian Jewish Congress luncheon in 1999 included CBC TV “senior reporter” Joe Schlesinger, “broadcaster” Evan Solomon, “editorial writer for the National Post” Ezra Levant, and “associate editor of Now magazine” Susan Cole. [ROSE, B., 12-9-99, p. 3, 5] Himie Koshevoy died in 2000. He had been the “managing editor of the Vancouver Sun and subsequently the Toronto Star.” [KIRSCHNER, S., 9-14-2000, p. 11]

“Humble Howard” Glassman is a prominent radio show radio host in Toronto, as is Marsha Lederman. As one Jewish ethnic paper noted about the usual Jewish subtext in their commentaries:

“Glassman has been under fire from Christian groups for a few years now, culminating in last month’s 26-page complaint to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission by the Catholic Civil Rights League and the Canadian Family Action Coalition. (They sent copies to the B’nai B’rith and the Toronto Police Hate Crimes Squad). Particularly at issue was a series of bits done by Glassman and sidekick Fred Patterson regarding Jesus (including the song ‘Jesus Was a Fetus’) and Easter (a giveaway of chocolate Jesus candles, promising to mail their producer to a cross and holding a Jesus-lookalike contest… While [Lederman] has sufficient respect for her background to not try to subvert Judaism, she is constantly at odds with how much her perspective is shaped by religion. She’s been accused of being anti-Catholic after addressing issues, which she finds odd, since she currently cohabitates with a Catholic.” [WEISBLOT, M., 9-2001]

In 1997, the Alberta Report reported about those who oversee moral issues for the Canadian television audience (the article was subtitled “Naked Lesbian Kissing Is Deemed Acceptable for Suppertime TV”):

“A recent decision by the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council suggests that if Ellen [the American lesbian-oriented TV series] were produced here, the only controversy would be whether she would be shown naked in bed with her lesbian lover… Nudity is not yet common on Canadian sitcoms, but the diaphanously-clad models featured on such haute couture ‘news’ programs as CBC Newsworld’s Fashion File and the syndicated Fashion Television often resemble Salome stripped to her last veil… Two weeks ago the industry-funded CBSC (which had earlier dismissed two previous claims against Fashion Television) dismissed this complaint as well. The CBSC cited a response from series producer
CITY-TV—owned by [Jewish mogul] Moses Znaimer, who also co-owns Alberta’s ACCESS-TV—‘We do not equate nudity with pornography. Fashion and photography to our mind are art’… The unnamed complainant had argued in a January 1995 letter, ‘These are prime time family viewing hours and it is highly inappropriate for such sexually explicit material to be shown on television.’ Ron Cohen, CBSC national chairman, rejects this argument as irrelevant, contending that the specialized nature of the program appeals to adults only… Jay Levine, Fashion Television’s producer, adds that nudity is to be expected from a show covering an industry where ‘being sexy is to be provocative.’ He adds, ‘We’re doing something that obviously a lot of people don’t have a problem with… a few years ago it would have been inconceivable that producer-writer Ken Finkleman could utter ‘the f-word’ on his hit CBC sitcom The Newsroom.’” [SILLARS, L., 4-28-97]

In Australia, the pattern continues. Jewish mogul Theodore Fink (1855-1942) “owned the Herald newspapers, the largest chain in Australia and the largest publishing enterprise south of the equator.” [GREENBERG, M., p. 53] In South Africa, Jonathan Wacks returned to his homeland as a major Jewish movie figure after 20 years in the United States. There, he was a film director, vice-president of production at the Samuel Goldwyn Company, president of Michael Ne smith’s Pacific Arts Pictures, and head of the Moving Image Arts Department at the College of Santa Fe in New Mexico. [MORRIS, M., 10-23-01]

From America, the Lauder family fortune, worth $4.2 billion, is rooted in perhaps the richest woman in the United States, Estee Lauder, the “queen of cosmetics.” An heir, Ronald Lauder, gained a footing in Europe in the mid-1980s while a Reagan-appointed ambassador to Austria, which was “largely in return for his work as finance chairman for the New York Republican Party.” Lauder, noted the Jewish Week, has been “active in a wide variety of causes which aid Israel and world Jewry. [He] is closely associated with the Israel Bond program… [Lauder] made a significant contribution to Vienna’s Jewish community by dedicating and opening up for Jewish immigrants the [Orthodox] Chabad center.” [JW, 2-26-88] He also heads the Jewish National Fund of America.

With the collapse of the Soviet-controlled Eastern European bloc, Lauder was well-positioned to embark upon investing in a business empire in Central and Eastern Europe, particularly in television and telecommunications. A former executive (Itzik Fisher) at Israel’s national telephone company, Bezeq, was installed as head of Lauder’s RSL Communications. Mr. Lauder (also current Chairman of the Board of the Museum of Modern Art) was not alone among those most prominently searching for profit, control, and cultural influence in the collapsed communist area. A 1990 New York Times article highlighted five American investors in Hungary; at least four of them were Jewish, including Lauder. Another, Albert Reichmann, one of three brothers controlling a company that Business Week calls “the richest and most powerful real estate developer in the world,” told the magazine: “The Jewish population is the reason I’m interested in Hungary and the Soviet Union.” [NYT, 1-26-90]
In 1990 Lauder gained principal ownership of the Hungarian Credit Bank Ltd, and in 1992 he had 50% share in an eastern German engineering firm. By 1997 a Lauder-controlled company – Central European Media Enterprises – held television stations in seven European countries, including Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, and the Czech Republic, and operated eleven TV stations in Poland alone, ironically called “Independent Polish Television.” [BRZEZINSKI, p. A41] CME became the largest private television broadcasting organization in Europe. [MCELVOGUE] The publisher/editor-in-chief of the English-language general information newspaper in Poland, the Warsaw Voice is also Jewish – Andrzej Jonas. One of the paper’s crusades has been against a cluster of Christian crosses near Auschwitz. [See, for example, 6-6-99] He also publishes the English-language Okecie Airport magazine, the other newspaper visiting Americans are likely to read in English in Poland. The publisher of Gazeta Wyborcza, one of Poland’s most widely circulated newspapers, is Adam Michnik. He is also Jewish.

By 1989, Poland’s first cable TV system, Polska Telewizja Kablowa, was 70% controlled by Jewish entrepreneur David Chase’s Chase Enterprises). [LOS ANGELES TIMES, 12-8-89, p. D4] In 1996, with the continued de-monopolization of Poland’s communist-era RP Telekom telecommunications company, the Jerusalem Post noted the “position” of Israeli Shmuel Dankner in the Eastern European country’s telecommunications field:

“Dankner is well positioned to become a key player in the country’s transition to market economics. Yet he doesn’t appear intent to do that. In fact, it seems as if Dankner is careful to keep his own and his partner’s foreign profiles low.” [ASA-EL, A., 7-17-96, p. 6]

Dankner partners include fellow Israelis Meir Srebernik and Sharon Waizer “who runs an RP Telekom joint venture with Motorola.” “If anything,” Waizer said about Poland, “my stay here so far has made of me a prouder Zionist.” [ASA-EL, A, 7-17-96, p. 6] By 1997, Dankner’s Dankner Investments, its subsidiary Matar, and General Electric held “majority shares” in RP Telekom. [MIDDLE EAST NEWS, 3-24-97] By 1998, a telecommunications firm called Netia had “emerged as the largest provider of local fixed line telephone services in Poland… It holds the concessions for five of the ten biggest cities… and has licensing covering a third of the population [of Poland].” Owned by a consortium of companies (Telia from Switzerland, Dankner Investments, Shamrock Holdings, Trefoil Capital Investments, and Goldman Sachs Capital), the CEO was Israeli Meir Srebernik. [FINANCIAL TIMES, 3-25-98, p. 8]

In 1999, Ronald Lauder’s CME merged with the Swedish-based SBS Broadcasting. The new company (retaining the SBS name) now owned 18 TV and 12 radio companies in 13 countries (TV stations included those in the Netherlands, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, Norway, Finland, Italy, Hungary, Slovenia, Romania, Ukraine, Switzerland, and Poland). Ronald Lauder now shared the Co-Chairmanship of the new firm with Harry Evans Sloan. Sloan is also from America – originally a lawyer in Hollywood. Sloan once headed New _World Entertainment_ and built his early media empire with Lawrence Kuppin via junk bond financing.

Another Jewish businessman, Michael Finkelstein, formerly the Vice-Chairman of _SBS_, became Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Board of the new entity. "_CME_ stations [in Central and Eastern Europe]," noted the _Central European Business Weekly_, "are ranked number one in both audience and revenues in all markets except Hungary where the _SBS_ station, _TV 2_, is number one." [ANTHONY, M., p. 1]

In 1997, in the Czech Republic, one of Ronald Lauder's stations, _TV Nova_ – one that reaches 70% of the Czech broadcasting audience and was originally founded by five Czech intellectuals in Prague, was embroiled in controversy. The control of _Nova_ by Lauder, noted the _Wall Street Journal_, "is raising fears about foreign ownership in broadcasting throughout the region... [Some Czechs] were worried that the country’s liberalized media laws have created a huge foreign force in the market. Czech regulators are investigating _Nova_ for alleged license breaches and have threatened to pull the plug on the station... Adding to the pressure, one of the founders of the station is suing _Nova_ over control and labeled it 'an American propaganda machine.'" [FRANK, p. A1]

"Newspaper editorials attack the influence of 'Nova sleaze' on Czech culture," noted the _Journal_, "Government ministers privately suggest _Nova_'s gory prime-time features are to blame for the recent rise in crime." [FRANK, p. A1] In Poland in the same year, arsonists set fire to a Warsaw synagogue located next door to the offices of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, an organization attempting to reassert an international organizational Jewish presence in Poland.

Maneuvering around Czech ownership and licensing laws that addressed foreign ownership, the control of _TV Nova_ was technically deeded, in association with Lauder, to a Czech national, Vladimir Zelezny. Zelezny, not surprisingly, is also Jewish ("Zelezny and Lauder have much in common, including a passion for collecting art collecting and Jewish philanthropy.") [MORTKOWITZ/ERNSBERGER, 1-17-00] He is also "one of the wealthiest men in the Czech Republic." [MEILS, C., 3-5-01] By the year 2000 the two Jewish moguls had a falling out in a struggle for full control of the station. Lauder eventually sued Zelezny for 140 counts of alleged fraud. Lauder also sued the Czech government. However, noted _Newsweek_, "Lauder has said he’d drop the case against the Czech government if _CME_ is allowed to purchase _Prima_ [the second largest TV station in the Czech Republic]." [MARTKOWICZ/ERNSBERGER, 1-17-00, p. 46] "It is widely believed, noted _Variety_, that Zelezny also covertly manages _Prima TV_, Nova’s main commercial rival." [DAWTREY, A., 1-22-01]

And what was the effect of this Jewish-controlled _TV Nova_ upon Czech culture? Local professor Jan Culik noted that "educated people have been horrified by what this station has been to doing to Czech society, especially the violence and its effects on kids." The _Jewish Week_ described the station’s fare:

"There, on the TV screen each night, on Lauder’s flagship European station, a buxom, frontally naked weather lady would coyly tell viewers how to dress for the next day’s weather. The erotic weather forecast, as it was called, was part of a newscast that media industry observers describe as among the most gory and sensationalist anywhere, with graphic depictions of beheadings, burnt bodies and other mayhem. Later, after 11 each evening, the station, TV Nova, would follow up with soft core pornography. And on another program, ‘Taboo,’ sexual deviants such as molesters, sado-masochists and rapists who would frankly discuss their sexual activities.” [COHLER-ESSES, L., 1-21-2000, p. 16]

Jewish influence in the mass media of Czechoslovakia has a long history. Prior to the rise of the Nazis, in the 1930s “the largest [motion picture] producer was the Elekta Film concern, with its imaginative chairman, Josef Auerbach.” [PICK, J., 1968, p. 422] And as Avigdor Dagan notes about the Czech popular press in this era:

“As in all other countries in Central Europe, so in the Czech lands, Jews played an outstanding role in journalism. The editor-in-chief of the Prager Press, the German- language organ of the Government, Arne Laurin, was Jewish. Another Jew, Paul Eisner, was editor of its Cultural Supplement, and many Jews served on the editorial staff. Among the Czech-language papers, there was hardly one without Jews on its editorial and literary staff. Jewish journalists could be found in papers of all parties from the right to the left… Even the Catholic organ Lidove Listy had a partly Jewish editor in the person of Alfred Fuchs, a Jewish convert.” [DAGAN, A., 1968, p. 523]

In 1997, in the process of expanding his Eastern European media empire into the Ukraine, Ronald Lauder also gained unwelcome publicity when it was revealed that a Jewish Russian partner in the deal, Vadim Rabinovich (who owns “one of the country’s most popular television channels”), had ties to the Russian mafia. Rabinovich is also the founder and president of the All-Ukrainian Jewish Congress. It’s chairman is Grigory Surkis who also owns a TV station, the country’s most popular soccer team, oil-related firms, and a law company. [KRICHEVSKY, Around, p. 6] One of Rabinovich’s partners, Grigory Lutchansky, in another project, owned a Vienna-based trading company that the Director of the CIA had once called “an organization associated with Russian crime activity.” Lutchansky (spelled various ways, also Grigori Loutchansky) was noted in the New York Review of Book’s review of The Red Mafiya:

“Along with [Russian Jewish crime boss Semion] Mogilevich, American officials put high on their list of suspects two of his lieutenants, Gregori Lutchansky and Vadim Rabinovitch. Lutchansky ran a trading company called Nordex, which American and European officials say has links to Russian organized crime and once acted as a broker in the sale of Scud missiles from North Korea to Iraq. Rabinovitch ran the Nordex office in Kiev. In Israel, the Russian mob leaders have bought protection from senior government officials, and have poured so much money into political campaigns that they have been able to name candidates for local and national office. The admired former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky, who has become active in Israeli politics, has admitted taking campaign contributions from Nordex, in spite of pleas from American officials to cut his links with Loutchansky. Loutchansky invited a list of prominent Russian mobsters to his birthday party in Israel in 1996.” [BONNER, 11-16-00]

Vadim Rabinovich himself (Lauder’s direct partner) had spent eight years in a Russian prison but the New York Times noted that he claimed that “he had committed no real crime and had been persecuted for being Jewish.” The (Jewish) Forward noted in August 1997 that Rabinovich “holds 25% stake in the company that runs Ukraine’s only private television station. Cosmetics heir Ronald Lauder owns half the station.” [FORWARD, p. 8-29-97, p. 3] Within months a rival Ukrainian TV station – Perekhid Media Enterprises – filed a lawsuit charging that Lauder’s company and its Ukrainian partners used “criminal connections and corrupt methods” to get a broadcast license. [FRANTZ A4, BRZINSKI A18, FRANKEL A1; MURPHY A6; McElvogue D4; BRZINSKI A41; AUERBACH, S., F4]

In August 1997, Rabinovich’s All Ukrainian Jewish Congress bought a full page ad in the New York Times to call attention to anti-Semitism, and investment potential, in the Ukraine. “The Jewish issue will never get the attention it deserves without your active help,” said the ad, “After all, if American Jews don’t care about their Ukrainian brothers and sisters, why should anyone else?” [FORWARD, 8-29-97, p. 3] A month earlier Rabinovich met for unity talks with Michael Schneider, the vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. “Mr. Rabinovich’s ad,” noted the (Jewish) Forward, “comes as American-Jewish groups, such as the Jewish Committee and the World Jewish Congress, are increasing their role in Europe.” [FORWARD, p 8-29-97, p. 3]

In June 2001, the New York Times noted that Lauder’s Central European Enterprises company was “under an investigation over allegations that it paid at least $1 million in bribes to Ukrainian officials for a valuable television license, according to lawyers and [U.S.] Justice Department documents… In Ukraine, Central European Media controls the most popular station through its majority-owned subsidiary Studio 1+1… The principal owners [of Studio 1+1] were [Jewish moguls] Vadim Rabinovich and Boris Fuchsmann, well known around Kiev for their influential wealth. Less well known were their ties to Russian organized crime, according to reports by the F.B.I. and European law enforcement agencies… A 1994 F.B.I report on Russian organized crime in the United States described Mr. Fuchsmann as a gold smuggler and embezzler, whose company in Germany was part of an international crime network. He is barred from entering the United States… Besides Mr. Fuchsmann and Mr. Rabinovich, there were other, silent owners of Studio 1+1. In one internal fax, in April 1996, Ms. Jensen [a CME employee] described the Studio 1+1 shareholders as ‘extremely powerful’ people whom, she added, ‘I will not mention on this fax.’ Central European Media now owns at least 60 percent of Studio 1+1, and Mr. Fuchsmann owns at least 30 percent, according to public statements.” [BONNER, R., 6-12-01]

And what are some of Ronald Lauder’s prior track records in television? What are his interests? What perspectives might he bring to Central and Eastern Europe? Aside from creating the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation to revive Jewish culture in Eastern Europe, he has expressed considerable interest in pressing attention upon the Jewish Holocaust. He is founder of a right-wing think tank in Jerusalem, the Shalem Institute. In his 1989 bid to become the mayor of New York City, he attacked his opponent, Rudolph Giuliani, in a TV ad, saying: “he handcuffed innocent stockbrokers in front of co-workers and ignored the torment of a Holocaust survivor.” [MAY, p. A27] In 1988 he financed a documentary shown on PBS about the 1938 Nazi attack upon Jewish synagogues in Austria and Germany. [SMITH, C, p. 32] And in 1994 his media company in Europe “kicked off the first commercial broadcast in Eastern Europe with the film ‘Sophie’s Choice’ [a Nazi concentration camp story].” [FRANK, R, p. A1] In the political realm, in 1997 the Jewish Week noted that Jewish American Lauder is “reportedly among Netanyahu’s biggest financial backers.” [Netanyahu, of course, is the former right-wing prime minister of Israel]. [COHLLER-ESSES, Dissensions, p. 1] “With money and campaign contacts,” notes the (Jewish) Forward, “Mr. Lauder has helped engineer one of the biggest upsets in the history of Israel’s democracy.” [FORWARD, 11-14-97, p. 14]

In 1999 Ronald Lauder became what the Jewish Week called the “King of the Jews” – the head of the Presidents’ Conference of Major Jewish Organizations. “Some [Jewish] leaders,” noted the Week, “are expressing concern about what they see as the continuing lack of democracy [in that organization]... Several left-wing groups complained that Lauder is perceived as being too close to [right-wing Israeli prime minister Benyamin] Netanyahu, both as a personal friend and a major political contributor.” [GREENBERG, 1-15-99, p. 20]

With the fall of communism in the Soviet bloc, yet another Jewish media “tycoon,” this one in Hungary, rose to power in recent years. This one, Janos Fenyo, was murdered in 1998, apparently by criminal underworld elements. At the time, as founder and head of Vico Distributing and Publishing (“currently the biggest print media-owner in Hungary”), [MARYNIAK, I., 4-1-98] he controlled Hungarian 13 newspapers (including the former trade union journal Nepszava and a women’s journal, Nok Lapja) and Nap TV. “Fenyo had excellent contacts to leading Hungarian politicians and he skillfully exploited the confusing legal situation after the collapse of communism to boost his empire.” At the time of his death, he also had 30 lawsuits filed against him. [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 5-21-98]

Turning to the nearby new capitalist nation of Russia, in 1997 the Washington Post noted that

“In last year’s presidential campaign, two of the most powerful media tycoons, Vladimir Gusinsky and Boris Berezovsky, played a key role in reelecting President Boris Yeltsin, demonstrating the might of television in the young democracy.” [HOFFMAN, p. 12]
The Wall Street Journal noted that Gusinsky (also spelled Goussinsky) “is sometimes billed as the richest man in Russia.” [WALLST, 4-13-95] For his part, Berezovsky was listed by Forbes in 1997 as one of the “ten top” billionaires in the world. Both Gusinsky and Berezovsky (originally Abramovitch) are Jewish. Gusinsky is also the president of the Russian Jewish Congress and his circle of international Jewish connections includes the aforementioned Ronald Lauder and Edgar Bronfman of the World Jewish Congress. A source told the Jewish Week that Gusinsky founded the Russian Jewish Congress so his “physical well-being will no longer be just [his] personal concern; it will be of international [Jewish] interest,” i.e., whatever he does, he can tap into the powerful international Jewish defense mother lode against “anti-Semitism.” [COHLLER-ESSES, p. 13] The Jerusalem Post notes that in Israel “media reports [were] hinting” that Gusinsky “had ties to the Russian mafia.” [COHEN, A.] Gusinsky built his business empire from his Most Bank; the Chairman of the Board of the Most Bank is Boris Hait who is also one of the vice-presidents of the Russian Jewish Congress. Other vice-presidents of the Jewish organization include Mikhail Friedman, Chairman of the board of the Alpha Bank, and Vitali Malkin, President of the Rossiiski Kredit Bank.

Gusinsky’s media empire includes NTV television – the largest commercial television station in Russia with an audience of 120 million. It also broadcasts to Israel, and “recently [December 1997] unveiled plans to expand its Russian-language broadcasts to Western Europe and other parts of the Middle East.” [KRICHEVSKY, p. 10] (Even in the New York area, the Russian-language Russian Television Network is run by a rabbi, president Mark Golub. Alexander Polovets, the editor and publisher of Panorama, “the most influential Russian-language newspaper in the United States,” is also Jewish. [TUGEND, 10-22-99]). Gusinsky also controls the Echo of Moscow radio station; a weekly magazine called Itogi (published in partnership with Newsweek/The Washington Post); the newspaper Segodnya; and NTV-Plus, a pay-per-view satellite network. In 1997, the Russian Orthodox patriarch, Alexei II, charging blasphemy, declared that “God would punish those responsible” for screening Martin Scorsese’s film The Last Temptation of Christ on Mr. Gusinsky’s television channel. The program had been postponed twice “because of Orthodox Christian fury.” [MEEK, p. 1] With mind-boggling chutzpah, NTV had originally planned to show the film “in April, on Russian Easter.” [KRICHEVSKY, Jewish-Owned, p. 9] Meanwhile, “at Gusinsky’s influence,” noted the Israeli newspaper Haaretz in 1998, “a synagogue and Holocaust museum are now being built at the World War II Memorial site in Moscow.” [MILNER]

In 2001, the deputy head of the Russian Jewish Congress, Mikhail Miralashvili was arrested in Russia and charged with kidnapping. “Mr. Miralashvili,” noted London’s Independent,

“who holds joint Israeli and Russian citizenship, was due to leave Russia this week with the Israeli President, Moshe Katzav, who is on a state visit. Mr. Miralashvili is a director of the St. Petersburg company Russian Video, which was bought by Media-Most, controlled by Mr. Gusinsky, in 1997. Mr. Gusinsky was later accused of defrauding the state by buying the company for $10 million – well below its real value.” [COCK-BURN, P., 1-25-01]

In July 1997, the Jewish Week reported that

“the Russian Jewish Congress, a powerful new group headed by one of Russia’s most prominent and controversial millionaires, has signed a landmark agreement with American Jewry’s top umbrella organization [the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations], pledging joint cooperation and consultation… The National Conference on Soviet Jewry, another U.S. umbrella group that encompasses many of the same Jewish organizational members as the Presidents Conference, was also a signatory…. Some, including a top Russian Jewish Congress official, says it marks a milestone in the emergence of the Russian group as an influential diaspora player on the international stage… In a separate initiative, the Russian Jewish Congress signed an agreement at about the same time with the World Jewish Congress…” [COHLER-ESSES, Lawyer, p. 9]

(A note about the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations: It represents, notes Jewish journalist Wolf Blitzer, “more than thirty of the most important national Jewish organizations; it has come to be viewed as the authoritative voice of the mainstream Jewish leadership… Because the Presidents’ Conference, like AIPAC [the leading American Jewish Israel lobbying organization], can almost always be found in support of the official Israeli position, U.S. officials in all recent administrations have to view it as a de facto arm of the Israeli government.” [BLITZER, p. 141-142])

Gusinsky also met with a number of Jewish American Congressmen, including Carl Lewin, Frank Lautenberg, Joseph Lieberman, and Arlen Specter. “The Middle East and ‘rising anti-Semitism’ were among the topics discussed,” noted Don Bonker (“a former Congressman who handles public relations for Goussinsky in Washington”). [COHLER-ESSES, US RUSSIAN, p. 1] The Jewish Week further noted that “according to a Jewish official who spoke on the condition of anonymity, Goussinsky’s efforts to meet with top State Department officials were rebuffed due to what one State official ; as his ‘checkered past.’” [COHLER-ESSES, US-RUSSIAN, p. 1] In 2000, Gusinsky, who, like other Russian Jewish media moguls, has dual Russian-Israeli citizenship, fled Russia after accusations of fraud. In October, related to the Gusinsky criminal investigation, Russian police raided the central Moscow synagogue, searching “practically everything,” but particularly looking for “in what way was the Jewish community… laundering money it was receiving from its sponsors.” Alexander Osovtsov, Executive Vice President of the Russian Jewish Congress, complained: “What gives special cynicism to it is the fact that the action was undertaken on the single day when the leaders of the Congress and the Jewish community were absent from Moscow because they were on a one-day visit of peace and solidarity to Israel.” [INTERFAX RUSSIAN NEWS, 10-20-00]
Boris Berezovsky’s riches began with Logovaz, a car dealership. He has since rapidly gained control of the Russian Public Television network, known as ORT; the newspaper Nezavisimaya Gazeta; the weekly magazine Ogonyok; Transero, a Russian airline; and 80% of Russia’s seventh largest oil company, which merged in 1998 with another Jewish-owned oil firm (together called Yuksi), to create “the world’s largest oil company in terms of reserves.” [MC-MAHON, p. 3] “Berezovsky,” says the Wall Street Journal, “has a reputation for labyrinthine political and business intrigues and has in the past exercised influence over Russian companies, including the national airline Aeroflot, without taking over formal ownership.” [HIGGINS, p. 2]

“Like many of the people in Russia who became rich very fast,” notes the New York Times, “Mr. Berezovsky has been the subject of numerous press reports that suggest he relied on organized crime to build his business empire.” [STANLEY, p. A3] Berezovsky, notes the Washington Post, “is part of a tight circle of financiers and business moguls who, by his own estimate, control half of Russia’s economy… [HOFFMAN, Russia]…. They all attained wealth in the violent, corruption-ridden, high-stakes competition that followed the collapse of the Soviet Union five years ago…. The scramble for wealth and power was carried out with brutal means, often including car bombs and assassinations… Russian tycoons are not public heroes. Popular resentments run deep over the vast sell-off of state property, which made many of them rich and left millions of Russians in poverty.” [HOFFMAN, p. A26] Berezovsky, notes the (Jewish) Forward, is one of the “robber barons accused of milking Russians dry.” [BLUSTAIN, p. 1]

In 1999 Berezovsky gained control of Moscow’s popular TV-6 television station. That same year he claimed control of “Russia’s premiere daily newspaper, Kommersant,” and fired its editor, Raf Shakirov, who said that “his ouster [is] an attempt to curb often critical coverage of the tycoon’s business and political activities.” [HIGGINS, p. 2]

In December 1996, Forbes magazine published a scathing article about Berezovsky (making sure such reports will be few and far between, the multi-billionaire responded by punishing the magazine with a suit for libel, as did the other Jewish tycoon giant, Vladimir Gusinsky, against the Wall Street Journal for an unflattering report about him). [WALL ST JRNL, 4-13-95] The Forbes article, entitled “The Godfather of the Kremlin,” was printed with no byline for fear of violent retribution to its authors. “Berezovsky,” noted the magazine’s editor, James Michaels, “stands tall as one of the most powerful men in Russia. Behind him lies a trail of corpses, uncollected debts and competitors terrified for their lives.” [MICHEALS, p. 10]

The anonymously written article in Forbes notes that “Assassination is a tool of business competition. Scores of business leaders and media personalities have been killed… Berezovsky controls Russia’s biggest national TV network. His control was solidified shortly after the first chairman of the network was assassinated gangland style. Berezovsky was immediately fingered by the police as a key suspect, but the murder remains unsolved two years later… Such is the Russian business environment today that the men at the top have use for the shadowy army of killers and thugs who work further down in the scale of corruption, running prostitute and protection rackets.” [FORBES, p. 91, 92]

In 1995 Vladislav Listiev, one of Russia’s most popular television talk show hosts, was named head of the Russian Public Television network (ORT). One of his major efforts was to rid the station of the corrupt, monopolistic advertising empire of a man named Sergei Lisovsky. The Forbes article suggests that Berezovsky was involved in Listiev’s eventual assassination, and when Berezovsky ended up with a controlling interest in ORT (36%), he retained Livosky as the only agent for the company’s advertising.

Incredibly, in 1996 Berezovsky vast wealth and power afforded him the opportunity to become a member of the Kremlin Security Council, a position that meant access to some of the Russian government’s most sensitive national secrets. He was soon embroiled in a scandal over his national allegiance when the liberal newspaper Izvestia publicized the fact that Berezovsky had secured Israeli citizenship in 1994. Berezovsky threatened to sue the newspaper, charging anti-Semitism. [SHALAPENTOKH, p. 19] (Meanwhile, the ruthless baron publicly declares he is a convert to Christianity). [KRICHEVSKY, L., 5-23-99]

A year later Fortune magazine ran an article entitled “Russia’s Robber Barons,” profiling ten of the most important Russian business tycoons who have catapulted to economic dominance in Russia with the collapse of communism; these included Gusinsky, Berezovsky, Boris Hait, Mikhail Friedman, Vladimir Vinogradov, Vladimir Potanin, Mikhail Khodorkovsky, Alexander Smolensky, and Pyotr Aven.

Along with Gusinsky and Berezovsky, not only are Hait and Friedman Jewish, they are, as noted earlier, vice-presidents under Gusinsky in the Russian Jewish Congress. Khodorovsky, the President of Bank Menatep (and, curiously, the former Deputy Secretary of the Moscow Branch of the Communist Party youth branch) is also Jewish. (Khodorovsky’s ability to make ideological U-turns on a dime somewhat echoes the latent wheeling and dealing of Leonid Roitman, whose “meteoric rise to power was fueled by the chaos of post-pereestroika Russia.” In his earlier years, under the communist regime, says the Jerusalem Post, Roitman set up “an organization called Hativya, which taught summer camps for Jewish youth. In a brilliant move, he registered Hativya as part of Komsol, the Communist Youth movement, and it rapidly became ‘one of the largest and strongest organizations in Russia.’” [HECHT, p. 12]

Continuing the Fortune list, Pyotr Aren, of the Alpha financial group, is also Jewish. Smolensky, president of Stolichny Bank and Vinogradov, head of Inkombank, are also – according to a B’nai B’rith publication – “believed to be Jews.” [BERNSTEIN, RUSSIA’S, p. 12] (Many Jews in Eastern Europe publicly hide this fact of their identity). Of this group of economic dominators, that leaves only Potanin who is not Jewish (in a country where today less than half of 1% of the Russian population is Jewish [BERNSTEIN, p. 12]), but he has had American Jewish billionaire George Soros as a major backer in some of his deals, including the takeover of Russia’s Svyazinvest telecommunications giant. (Soros has “invested around $2.5 billion in Russia, more than anyone or any institution.” [BROWNING, p. F2] “Soros’s extraordinary role,” noted the (London) Guardian in 1994, “not only as the world’s most successful investor but now possibly, fantastically, as the single most powerful foreign influence in the whole of the former Soviet empire, attracts more suspicion than curiosity.” [LEWIS, M., p. 14] “I have been a prime target for the current version of anti-Semitic conspiracy theory,” notes Soros himself, “If there was ever a man who fit the stereotype of the Judeo-plutocratic Bolshevik Zionist world conspirator, it is me. And that is, in fact, how I am increasingly depicted in Eastern Europe and also to some extent in Western Europe, but not so much in America.” [SOROS, p. 239])

The above ten Russians, notes the Fortune piece, “dominate the country’s trade in arms and precious metals, as well as its production of copper, nickel, and a quarter of its oil. They control the No. 1 and No. 3 television networks, the Visa bankcard network, a big chunk of the pulp and paper industry, and an increasing portion of the food processing industry… Princeton professor Steven Cohen, writing in the Nation, dubbed [most of today’s Russian business elite] a ‘semi-criminalized oligarchy’ that has made ordinary Russians ‘suffer unduly and unjustly.’” [MELLOW, p. 120] Berezovsky has publicly bragged that he, Gusinsky, Khodorovsky, Aren, Friedman, Smolensky, and Potanin control half of Russia’s wealth. [BERSTEIN, p. 12]

As Jewish scholar Betsy Gidwitz noted in 1999:

“That Jews control a disproportionately large share of the Russian economy and Russian media certainly has some basis in fact. Between 50 and 80 percent of the Russian economy is said to be in Jewish hands, with the influence of the five Jews among the eight individuals commonly referred to as “oligarchs” particularly conspicuous. (An oligarch is understood to be a member of a small group that exercises control in a government. The five oligarchs of Jewish descent are Boris Berezovsky, Mikhail Friedman, Vladimir Gusinsky, Mikhail Khodorkovsky, and Alexander Smolensky. The other oligarchs are Vagit Alekperov, Vladimir Potanin, and Rem Vyakhirev.) Perhaps the most famous (and simultaneously the most infamous) of the oligarchs is Boris Berezovsky. In common with most of the other Jewish oligarchs, Berezovsky controls industries in three critical areas: the extraction and sale of a major natural resource, such as oil, as a source of great wealth; a large bank (useful in influencing industry and transferring assets abroad); and several major media outlets (useful for exerting influence and attacking rivals). He also controls a significant share of the Aeroflot airline and the Moscow automobile industry.” [GIDWITZ, B., 9-15-99]

A 1999 Wall Street Journal editorial notes that disturbing situation in today’s Russia:

“Russia’s oligarchs – many of them apparatchiks from the communist days – have stripped the country’s best assets and transferred their winnings to off-shore companies they control... For every dollar a Russian has laundered abroad there had to be a counterparty at the other end. London, Geneva, and New York are preferred destinations, as well as off-shore havens such as Cyprus and New Jersey. Estimates of $10 billion capital flight from Russia each year are probably conservative.” [WSJ, 8-30-99, p. 8]

By 1998, the foreign minister of Russia was Yevgeni Primakov. His real last name – Finkelstein – was dropped when he worked for the KGB. Also that year, Sergio Kiriyenko became the prime minister of Russia. He too is Jewish. [SAFIRE, p. 6] Primatov later succeeded him as Prime Minister. “Two of the main political leaders in Parliament,” adds the Times of London, “Grigori Yavlinsky, the leader of the liberal Yabloko Party, and Vladimir Zhirinovsky, the head of the ultra-nationalist LDPR, also have Jewish parents.” [BEESTON] A Los Angeles Times reporter notes that “at least half of the powerful ‘oligarchs’ who control a significant percentage of the [Russian] economy are Jewish. The reviled architect of Yeltsin’s failed reform policies, Anatoly Chubais, [later head of the national electrical power monopoly], is rumored to be Jewish, along with Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov, ousted Deputy Minister Boris Nemtsov and Yeltsin’s wife, Naina.” [REYNOLDS, p. 7A] The Jewish Telegraph Agency noted that “Chubais is not… open about his Jewish roots.” [KRICHEVSKY, L., 5-23-99] Alexander Livshitz also served a spell as Russia’s finance minister in the 1990s. [KRICHEVSKY, L., 5-23-99]

In 1999, the Jewish Exponent noted that “all but one of the eight leading [Russian] bankers are Jewish,” and four of them – Goussinsky, Boris Hait, Mikhail Friedman, and Vitaly Malkin – occupy the top positions at the RJC [Russian Jewish Congress]... In addition to these business titans, often referred to here in the [Russian] media and on the street as the ‘oligarchs,’ many of the leading political figures in Russia are also Jewish or partly Jewish. These include former prime Minister Sergei Kiriyenko and top Kremlin aides Yegor Gaidar and Boris Nemtsov. Grigori Yavlinsky, the leader of the Yabloko, the largest democratic party in the Duma today, has one Jewish parent... In the new Russia, the most important fields... to which Jews [have] gravitated [are] banking, trade, the media, and show business.” [RUBY, W., p. 37]

In late 1998, Viktor Ilyukin, the head of the Russian Parliament’s Security Affairs Committee, said this about the Yeltsin government: “The large-scale genocide [i.e., Russian social and economic collapse] wouldn’t have been possible if Yeltsin’s inner circle had consisted of the main ethnicity groups, and not exclusively of one group, the Jews.” [NEW YORK TIMES, Communist, p. 12] That same year, Nikolai Kandratenko, the governor of a southern Russian province, called the government of the area’s largest city “a Zionist nest” exemplifying a “Judeo-Masonic mafia.” [KRICHEVSKY, L., Russian, p. 7]

Meanwhile, also in the same year, the Jerusalem Post noted a more commonly enforced stereotypes about the situation of Jews in Russia:
“[A Christian woman in Dallas] heard about some young Jews in the former Soviet Union getting help via a soup kitchen. She decided to become the adoptive grandmother, sending in a monthly contribution for their welfare.” [COHEN, A., p. 11]

As Jewish scholar Michael Paul Sacks noted in 1998 about the almost secretive nature of the economic situation of Jews in modern Russia:

“Published census data on Jews [in Russia] have been very scarce, but this [from the 1989 Russian census] and other sources leave no doubt that in comparison with other groups Soviet Jews were very distinctive in terms of their urban concentration and their educational and professional achievement… With the recent release of new data from the 1989 census, a more precise understanding of the opportunities available to Jews in ‘Soviet’ Russia is now possible. These data show the number of men and women by major ethnic groups (including Jews) in 257 job categories. Surprisingly, this new information is not referred to even in the most recent Russian scholarship on Jews, and it received no mention in western sources… Jews showed a very early path of upward mobility in the modernizing sectors of the labor force… [SACKS, 1998, p. 247]… Occupations that were largest for Jews were primarily top-level positions and all were white collar: physicians, scientists, chief managerial personnel, artists and producers, literary and press personnel. The [job] categories that were largest only for Russians were entirely manual labor and other low-skills; tractor drivers, cleaners, weighers, nursemaids, lathe operators, tailors and seamstresses, carpenters and dairy work.” [SACKS, M., 1998, p. 257]

A 1995 study in Russia found that 84% of employed Jews had “professional or managerial positions.” Another 4% were “owners of firms or entrepreneurs.” [SACKS, M., 1998, p. 265]

With the likes of Gusinsky, Berezovsky, and other powerful Jewish business tycoons wielding extraordinary influence and blatantly buying (and allegedly even killing) their broad way into the Russian media, business, and government, (as well as centrally placed Jews in the Russian government like Finance Minister Alexander Livshits and First Deputy Minister in Charge of Economic Reform, Boris Nemtsov), the Christian Science Monitor noted in 1997 that

“A loose coalition of nationalistic communists and out-and-out [Russian] nationalists has begun to characterize President Boris Yeltsin’s regime as ‘Jewish.’ It is the Jewishness of Mr. Yeltsin’s regime, its essential foreignness to Russia, that [in this view] explains the plummeting economy, the brazen corruption and enrichment of the few… and Russia’s subservient position to the West.” [SHLAPENTOKH, p. 19; WALL ST, 4-13-95, p. A14; HOFFMAN, D., 1-10-97, p. A1; STANLEY, 6-14-97, p. A3]

Still another angle on Jewish economic dominance at the upper tiers of capitalist Russia was a 1998 article in the Israeli daily, Ha’reetz, which noted

“The most successful venture capitalists in the world in 1996 and 1997 operated out of Moscow and was started by an Israeli. The Hermitage 1 and Hermitage 2 funds specialize in investments in Russia and other countries of the former Soviet Union, although they invest throughout the world. They were set up in 1995 by Israeli businessman Benny Stein-matz and the Safra brothers [and are] managed by American Bill Brod-er… Hermitage is considered the most senior player on the Moscow Stock Exchange, and it is the second-largest of the fund managers active in Russia, with some $600 million to invest.” [LIPSON]

Then there is Boris Jordan, also Jewish, from New York’s Long Island, eventual head – after Vladimir Gusinsky fled to Israel to escape criminal prosecu- tion – of Russian television station NTV,

“who almost single-handedly established the Russian stock market, who in one year earned half the global profits for his employers at Credit Suisse First Boston, who walked away from a reported $4 million bonus because it was insultingly small and instead founded Russia’s first full-ser-vice investment bank, which he optimistically called Renaissance Capital. Brash, bright and above all ambitious, Jordan more than any other individual put Russia on the financial map in the 90’s. ‘Czar Boris,’ as he was dubbed by admiring business reporters, held court high atop Mos-cow’s most expensive new skyscraper, while Renaissance’s 800 pin-striped bankers and brokers handled billions of dollars from blue-chip investors like George Soros and the Harvard endowment. The darling of Davos, the Swiss summit for the well heeled and influential, Jordan was, in his own words, on top of the world.” [BRZENSKI, M., 7-22-01, p. 40]

Yet another Jewish Russian money mogul is Roman Abramovich. The Warsaw Voice (headed by Jewish publisher and editor Andrzej Jonas) noted in 1999 that he is “the CEO of the powerful Sibneft oil group. A popular joke in Mos-cow says that one must count one’s fingers after shaking hands with Abramovich, who has for years been associated with Berezovsky’s financial group.” [ZYGULSKI, p. 8] Oil magnate Leonid Nevzlin became head of the Russian Jewish Congress in 2001. He and the aforementioned Mihail Khodorkovsky “formed one of the first successful private banks in Russia in 1989. The two then went into the oil business together, and now run the YUKOS firm – Khodorkovsky is in charge, and Nevzlin is his deputy.” The secular Jewish Nevzlin, like so many, has returned to his Jewish roots. “For all my life,” he says, “I have never felt any substantial anti-Semitism, and was rather indifferent to the Jewish community. Then something clicked, and I thought, Well, I’m over 40, I have made a successful career, I have made a fortune. But what will I tell my children when I am 70.” [GORODETSKY, L., 5-23-01]

Then there is Mikhail Mirilashvili (a.k.a., Misha Kutaisskey), who “is one of the biggest shareholders of the local branch of LUK oil. He is also president of Channel 11 and president and deputy chairman of the St. Petersburg branch of the Russian chapter of the World Jewish Congress.” A brother, Konstantin, is the “co-owner of Gosting Dvor, [St. Petersburg’s] major shopping center.” [KORA-LYEV, VLADIMIR, 10-11-2000] Then there is Anatoly Karachinsky, “head of In-formation Business Systems, Russia’s largest IT group.” Karachinsky, also Jewish,
“is regarded in Russia as the country’s answer to Bill Gates – and who is about to become the country’s first high-technology dollar millionaire.” Karachinsky “set up NewspaperDirect, a system that allows newspapers from anywhere in the world to be printed on a desktop.” [FINANCIAL TIMES, 10-2-00]

Then there is New York-based Stuart Subotnick, also Jewish, who is the CEO and president of Metromedia International Group. (In 1999, Subotnick was ranked by Forbes magazine among the richest 400 Americans). This company’s specialty is cable, telephone, and digital media – largely in Eastern Europe. Holdings include complete – or major – shares in Russia’s PLD Telekom, Kosmos TV (“one of Russia’s largest wireless cable operators”), 50% of Comstar (“a large Moscow digital communications carrier”), Romsat (“one of the largest cable operators in Romania”), 70% of “a leading Bucharest-based ISP (Internet Service Provider) called FX Internet. Metromedia even has holdings in places like Belarus and Kazakhstan. In Russia it also owns “several TV and radio stations in St. Petersburg and Nizhii Novgorod.” [CAPITAL MARKET RUSSIA, 5-20-99; AFX EUROPEAN FOCUS, 1-12-01; CABLE EUROPE, 7-4-00; TELECOMMUNICATIONS SERVICES MARKET, 6-26-00]

“His family kept it alive so that they could talk among themselves and not be understood. ‘A secret language,’ he explains. The secret language of the Jews. A light kept burning underground all during those years of atheism. I’d be touched if I wasn’t alarmed. For where people speak a secret language, how can suspicion and fear of them not multiply?” [JACOBSON, H., 1993/1995, p. 80-81]

“Our people are not blind,” proclaimed the head of the Russian Communist Party, Gennady Zyuganov, in 1998, “They cannot fail to see that the spread of Zionism in the government is one of the reasons for the current catastrophe in the country, the mass impoverishment and the process of extinction of its people.” [ENSEL, M., p. 3]

The blustering of an anti-Semitic fanatic? In the same year, a Jewish Russian immigrant in New York of considerable renown, novelist Edward Topol (whose work was once banned in Russia), stirred controversy and deep concern in the world Jewish community because of a published letter he wrote to a Russian weekly newspaper. In it Topol called prominent Jewish Russian bankers “puppeteers” who manipulated Russian politics and its economy. The puppeteers, he concluded, has “a very long Jewish last name – Berezovsko-Goussinsko-Smolensko-Khodrokovsko, etc…. How come all or almost all the money in this country ended up in Jewish hands?” Topol also called the economic crisis in Russia today a “Jewish tragedy.” “Mr. Topol’s main premise,” noted the (Jewish) Forward, “is that for the first time in a millennium, Jews have gained real political power and financial control over Russia and can pretty much decide whether to ‘cast the country into a chaos of wars and poverty or raise it from the mud.” [KRICHEVSKY, Emigre’s, p. 5; KAZAKINA, p. 5]
In 1997 the (Jewish) Forward reported that “with the [Russian] economy in shambles, opposition parties held nationwide strikes at the end of last month. [Even] Jews are grumbling that too many Jews stand close to the reigns of power and too many Jewish names fill the headlines.” [BLUSTAIN, R, p. 1] “All the Jews, I don’t understand their motivation, to show they are rich… [to say] ‘I am an owner and you are a slave,’” complained Alexander Lieberman, the Jewish director of the Union Council’s Russian-American Bureau of Human Rights. “If I were a single Russian and I saw and heard only Jews in the government… [I would think] ‘we are all without money because the Jews have all the Russian money.’” [BLUSTAIN, p. 1] “People have quite bitter memories of Jews in the [communist] revolution,” noted Michael Chlenov, the president of the Jewish Va’ad of Russia.

In this regard, transnationally, in 1996, Boris Berezovsky hosted a party in honor of the earlier mentioned Ronald Lauder (American Jewish owner of a number of TV stations in Europe), attended by Russian President Boris Yeltsin and United States Ambassador Thomas Pickering. Speaking to a reporter, Lauder (already ensnared in partnership media dealings in the Ukraine with Russian mafia-clouded Vadim Rabinovich) publicly distanced himself from Berezovsky, saying, “The invitations went out in President Yeltsin’s name.” [FORBES, p. 91]
In 1986 Ze’ev Chafets, an American Jew who had moved to Israel, returned for a while to the states to do a book about the American Jewish community; he entitled the resultant volume, Members of the Tribe. Following an AIPAC (the powerful Israel lobbying agency based in Washington DC) organizer who was “hunting Jews” across America, he noted an interesting incident at a Jewish gathering at the Stardust Motel in Moline, Illinois. Chafets writes that a fellow Jew sitting next to him in the audience poked the American-Israeli in the ribs, and then “tapped my copy of the Quad-City Times (‘The Midwest’s Most Exciting Newspaper’) and whispered, ‘This is a Jewish newspaper’ … The man was referring to ownership, not content … Determined to make an impression, the man poked me again. ‘See this motel?’ he asked. ‘It’s a Jewish motel.’” [CHAFETS, p. 39]

In 1999, the chairman of the Newspaper Association of America was Richard Gottlieb. He is also the chairman of Lee Enterprises, based in Davenport, Iowa, which owns 21 newspapers and 16 TV stations across the United States – from Billings, Montana, to Madison, Wisconsin, to Lincoln, Nebraska. Lloyd Schermer retired as CEO of the company in 1999. A corporate subsidiary, NAPP Systems, constructs printing plates for about 350 newspapers in 30 countries. In Nebraska too, John Gottschalk is the chairman and president of the Omaha World-Herald company. He is also publisher of the Omaha World-Herald. [BATT, J., 3-24-2000]

In northern California, in the heart of the internationally important high-tech area of Silicon Valley, David Cohen controls an area-wide empire as the Publisher/CEO of the Silicon Valley Community Newspapers (SVCN Inc.). Cohen founded Metro, “Silicon Valley’s weekly alternative newspaper.” A SVCN subdivision is Metro Newspapers. Metro, in turn, “purchased the Los Gatos Weekly and the more than 100-year old Los Gatos Times-Observer, which were combined as the Los Gatos Weekly Times. In 1991, the company acquired the weekly Saratoga News and the Willow Glen Resident … In 1993, Metro Newspapers began publishing a newspaper in Cupertino, and acquired its competitor the Cupertino Courier, in 1995. The company founded The Sun in 1993. The most recent addition to the community family was The Campbell Reporter, which began publishing in March, 1999.” [CUPERTINO COURIER, 4-11-01]

In Colorado, Edward Lehman publishes a few small town newspapers, including the Longmont Daily Times-Call, the Loveland Daily Reporter-Herald, and Superior in Lafayette. The executive roster for all these papers includes Ed-

In 1975, in New Hampshire, journalist Kevin Cash wrote an entire volume criticizing the concentrated media and political power of newspaperman William Loeb. Loeb owned New Hampshire’s two major newspapers – the Manchester Union Leader and the New Hampshire Sunday News, as well as the Vermont Sunday News, and a few smaller New England area papers. Loeb was also in the habit of writing regular editorials in his newspapers. “The truth is,” wrote Cash, a former reporter at the Union Leader, “is that [Loeb’s papers] are to a large extent monopolistic in nature within the limits of New Hampshire.” [CASH, K., p. 3] Loeb was of Jewish heritage (both parents were Jewish); he once published in one of his papers, however, his father’s 1906 Episcopal baptismal document, signed by American President Theodore Roosevelt (his father was Roosevelt’s executive secretary).

In Pittsburgh, Paul Block (1877-1941) owned the Pittsburgh Evening Sun, the Pittsburgh Morning Post, and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, as well as the Toledo Times and Toledo Blade. [GREENBERG, M., p. 53] His sons, William and Paul, also later added television and cable stations to their mini-empire. Elsewhere, “in 1978, the Samuel Horvitz Trust [run by three sons and an employee] owned five monopoly newspapers in Ohio and New York, cable systems in Ohio and Virginia, and construction firms in Ohio, and was a major landowner in Florida.” [BAGDIKIAN, p. 42]

In a review of Jewish book publishing in the United States to 1976, Jewish author Charles Madison noted the following Jewish-founded, or purchased, firms (some still exist, some are now defunct, some are absorbed by others):

- Simon and Schuster (Richard L. Simon; Max L. Schuster)
- Knopf (Alfred A. Knopf)
- Random House (Bennett Cerf and Donald Klopfer)
- Pantheon (founded by Kurt and Helen Wolf)
- Viking (Harold Guinzburg)
- Dover (founded in 1943)
- Farrar, Strauss, and Giroux - (The father of Roger Strauss – president of the publishing company – was in turn chairman of the Board of the American Smelting and Refining Company. From 1955-65 Roger was also chairman of the board of American Judaism magazine).
- Grove Press (1947) - which controlled Evergreen Books and the Evergreen Review.
- Praeger (1950)
- Basic Books (1952) - Its founder, Arthur Rosenthal, later became Director of Harvard University Press.
- The Free Press (1947) - Its founder, Jeremiah Kaplan, joined Crowell-Collier, which had acquired MacMillan, as a Vice-President.
- Atheneum (1959)

[MADISON, CHARLE:, 1976]

“One year,’ says famous Jewish novelist Judith Krantz in her autobiography,

“when I cam back from Paris, I foolishly risked a certain jail sentence by bringing for, buttoned into my blouse, a copy of the utterly pornographic Rosy Crucifixion by Henry Miller, an erotic masterpiece that Jeremy rented out to his friends as twenty-five cents a day. I’m not taking all the credit, but eventually he [Jeremy Tarcher] became the first and best publisher of New Age books in the United States.” [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 147] [Krantz notes that her novel Mistral “was quickly bought for France by Edition Stock, whose publisher, Jean Rosenthal, as it happened had translated my other novels into French.”] [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 313]

In a continuing trajectory of percentage of ownership, by 1968 Roger Kahn noted that “Jews own perhaps half the major book publishing houses: Random House, Simon & Schuster, New American Library, Alfred Knopf, and Atheneum are a few that thrive under the leadership of Jews.” [KAHN, R., p. 5] “Owners of new [early to mid-20th century publishing] concerns, “notes Jay Gertzman, “most of them young Jewish men (Horace Liveright, Thomas Seltzer, Ben Huebsch, Max Schuster, Alfred Knopf) had begun to specialize in presenting European writers to an American audience curious about their sexual frankness and Marxist ideas. Established houses, such as Doran, Houghton, Appleton, and Doubleday, did not do so, and some of their executives resented their parvenu colleagues. Modernist writers especially owed their exposure to Jewish firms.” [GERTZMAN, J., 2000, p. 114]

In the 1980s, Crown Books, headed by Robert Haft (who also founded the Trak Auto supply chain), rose to become the third largest bookstore chain with nearly 250 outlets throughout America. At its peak the firm was a national giant with nearly 10,000 employees and valued between $500 million to $1 billion (the company drastically weakened with in-house, intra-family legal feuds between Robert and his father Herbert, a Jewish immigrant from Russia). The Brentano’s bookstore chain was also founded by Jewish entrepreneur August Brentano in the late 19th century. Abraham Rosenbach and his brother Philip were used book sellers from 1903 until the 1950s. In 1928, the New Yorker called Abraham “the most famous dealer in rare books.” “If Gutenberg [Bible] sales are taken as the measure of a dealer,” says Guy Lesser, “Rosenbach would have to be reckoned history’s most successful [book dealer], judging by his transactions over … four decades.” [LESSER, G., JAN 2002, p. 48, 46] “Whiskey, cigars, deep-sea fishing, and women (to put the last politely),” adds Lesser, “in roughly that order, after books, seem to have been his passions.” [LESSER, G., JAN 2002, p. 48]

Jewish publishers also brought out the inexpensive series for mass appeal, including the Little Leather Library, the Little Blue Books, and the Modern Library (Horace Liveright); Jewish entrepreneurs also initiated the “Book-of-the-Month Club.” “As an author and editor, [Mortimer] Adler built a publishing empire on an unlikely foundation: the philosophic system of Aristotle and St. Thomas Aquinas. That system influenced his work as compiler of the Great Books of the Western World and as editor of Encyclopedia Brittanica.” [D’Alessio, F., 6-29-01] In 2001, Michael Ross, the publisher of the World Book Dictionary, removed the verb “jew” (traditionally meaning “beat down in price”) from the volume. [LEVINE, S., JUNE/JULY 2001]

Other Jewish book publishers include Westview, Stein and Day, Holmes and Meier, Price Stern Sloan, Lyle Stuart (the founder, Lyle Stuart, was born Lionel Simon), Ottenheimer (a Baltimore publisher with 200 titles a year), and Schocken. In England, Lord George Weidenfeld not only controls a well-known namesake publishing house, he is also chairman of the Zionist Federation of Great Britain. From England, Andre Deutsch’s namesake company published Norman Mailer, V.S. Naipaul, Arthur Schlessinger, and other prominent authors. In Canada, Avie Bennett is president of McClelland & Stewart (1992).

By the late 1990s, Golden Books Family Entertainment, “the nation’s largest producer of children’s books,” was headed by Jewish publisher Richard Snyder (who replaced Richard Bernstein). The next four top executives at the firm were also Jewish: Steven Grossman, James Cohen, Ira Gomberg, and Ian Reich. [HOOVER, p. 255]

Alfred Lilienthal, a Jew and lifelong crusader against Zionism and Jewish chauvinism, wrote in 1982 that “All the leading magazines, ranging from Commentary, Esquire, Ladies Home Journal, New York Review of Books, New Yorker, and U.S. News and World Report have Jews in key positions as publishers, editors, or managing editors. No one is able to criticize Jews – or even take Israel to task – for fear of being out of line with the boss … There is [also] the constant overriding concern of the media about losing advertising … at times making a mockery of ‘freedom’ of the press … [LILIENTHAL, p. 219] … It would be futile to list the number of top Jewish editors and writers across the country. Many of the largest book publishers, including Knopf, Random House, Holt, Liverwright, Viking Press, Simon and Schuster, Van Nostrand Reinhold, and Lyle Stuart are Jewish-owned, directly or by Jewish-controlled interests (including CBS, RCA, Music Corporation of America [MCA], Litton’s, and Gulf and Western.

In other firms such as Macmillan and Grosset and Dunlap, one will find editors-in-chief or presidents who are Jewish.” [LILIENTHAL, p. 220]

In the same year, Jewish literary agent Bill Adler (formerly the Executive Editor at Playboy when Mike Cohn was Director of Playboy’s book division) wrote a volume entitled Inside Publishing. Some of the (Jewish) power people in his New York publishing world included

- Richard Snyder: CEO, president and Chairman of the Board of Simon & Schuster
- Joni Evans: (Snyder’s wife), president of Simon & Schuster subsidiary, The Linden Press
- Robert Gottlieb: President and Editor-in-Chief of Alfred A. Knopf
- Louis Wolfe: President and CEO of Bantam Books
- Marc Jaffe: Editor-in-Chief of Bantam Books
- Hillel Black: Editor-in-Chief at William Morrow
- Nat Wartels: Chairman of Crown Publishers
- Jonathan Segal: Editor-in-Chief of Times Books
- Helen Meyer: President of Dell Publishing
- Phyllis Grann: Publisher of G.P. Putnam’s Sons
- Jim Silberman: President of Summit Books
- Howard Kaminsky: President and Publisher of Warner Books

[ADLER, B., 1982]

Adler’s favored choice for assignment as writing “collaborator” with celebrities was Mickey Herskowitz. Herskowitz wrote books for Bette Davis, Dan Rather, Gene Autry, Jimmy the Greek, and others. In the “book packaging” field (where literary agents produce anthology-type volumes commissioned by publishers) Lyle Kenyon Engel was “one of the most prolific book packagers over the years.” [ADLER, B., 1982, p. 89]

Jewish actor Kirk Douglas has written some books about his life; he notes his surprise when he discovered that

“my editor Ushi was becoming fascinated with Judaism [she eventually converted to it]. Out of the blue, in the fall of 1993, she announced that she was going to Israel. A whole month in Israel would cost her a mere $950 plane fare, food and lodging included. Could that be true? Oh yes, but she was doing it through an organization called Volunteers for Israel, which basically meant she was going into the Israeli Army for three weeks.” [DOUGLAS, K., 1997, p. 125]

“Any roll call of the most respected and/or powerful figures in the publishing world,” wrote Robert C. Christopher in 1989 in a book about the decline of WASP institutions,” whether in editorial or executive positions, has to include a sizeable number of Jews; among those who automatically come to mind are Robert Bernstein, Jason Epstein, and Joni Evans at Random House, Richard Snyder and Michael Korda [also author of Power: How to Get It and Success!] at Simon and Schuster, Simon Michael Bessie at Harper and Row, Howard Kaminsky at Hearst and Marc Jaffe at Houghton Mifflin.” [CHRISTOPHER, p. 222] “I don’t want to sound chauvinistic;” said Jason Epstein in 2001, “but [Jewish publishers] were smarter than their gentile colleagues.” [GREEN, D., 5-31-01]

Others Jews in positions of power in earlier years (as noted by Martin Greenberg in 1979) included the publisher of Collier’s and the Women’s Home Companion, founder and editor of the National Guardian, the editor and founder of AB Bookman’s Weekly, the editor of the Saturday Review, senior editors at Time, Forbes and Newsweek, the editor of Variety, a member of the Board of Editors for Fortune, the editor-in-chief of Redbook and on and on. [GREENBERG, 1979]

More recently, take, for example, a 1996 report in Advertising Age that noted that Ellen Levine, the editor-in-chief of Good Housekeeping, was having a spat with her publisher, Alan Waxenberg, and that Jerry Kaplan was one of those being considered to replace him. [KELLY, p. 47] In 1994, Barbara Grossman left Simon and Shuster to become the publisher at Viking where Peter Mayer was the Viking Penguin CEO. In the same era, Joni Evans (born Joni Goldfinger) became the head of the Turtle Bay imprint at Random House. Tina Brown, also Jewish, was described by one London newspaper as “the most famous woman editor in the world … [She is] the worst social climber since Kong lumbered to the top of the Empire State Building.” [LANGTON, J.]

In England, in 1998 the (London) Daily Telegraph noted Gail Reubuck, “daughter of affluent Baltic Jewish immigrants,” as “the most powerful figure in British publishing,” and “recently voted Publisher of the Year.” [CAMPBELL, p. D4] Another example is Richard Malina who started out as a lawyer for Grosset and Dunlap. By 1985 he was the President of the publishing division of Doubleday; in 1987 he became the Executive Director and Publisher of the Jewish Publication Society. [GODFREY, p. 2]

A mere random look at a few 1998 issues of Publishers Weekly evidenced the following items: Al Silverman retired as “Editor-at-large” at Penguin. He was also the former publisher and editor-at-large at Viking, and chairman and CEO of the Book of the Month Club. Mark Lieberman was the Executive Vice President of Cahner’s Publishing Company, which publishes Publishers Weekly where Sybil Steinberg was the Senior Editor for Fiction. Jane Friedman was the CEO and president of HarperCollins. Martha Levin was named the new Vice President and editor-in-chief at Hyperion (moving over from a position as Senior Vice President at Doubleday. Lucianne Goldberg was noted as the literary agent for Linda Tripp (who exposed the President Clinton-Monica Lewinsky sex scandal. Goldberg – formerly Steinberger – is the wife of Sid Goldberg, former editor of the North American Newspaper Alliance, and later vice president of United Media, a syndicator of news stories. One of Lucianne’s own novels is Madame Cleo’s Girls, a “frothy tale about three high-class prostitutes.’ [HUBBARD, p. 111]) The Bantam Doubleday Dell International CEO in 1998 was Stephen Rubin. The president and editor-in-chief of Summit Books was still Jim Silberman. Marc Jaffe was publisher of his own imprint at Houghton Mifflin. Others afforded news making mention in the Publishers Weekly issues were Jonathan Karp, an editor at Random House, Esther Newberg, an agent at ICM; and agents
Daniel Greenberg and Al Zuckerman of James Levine Communications. The Horowitz-Rae book manufacturing company was also noted as sold.

Such Jewish prominence today is all over the map. Michael Hoffman is the Executive Director of Aperture, probably the most influential “art” photography journal and book publisher. Michael Hirschorn is editor of Spin, “the bible of alternative music.” Alan Light is Editor-in-Chief of Vibe magazine. George Hirsch is the vice-president and publisher of Runner’s World. Nat Lehman was the publisher of Playboy. (Richard Rosenzweig was Playboy founder Hugh Hefner’s personal Executive Assistant, Bobbi Arnstein his personal secretary, and Howard Shapiro his chief legal counsel. By the 1990s, Shapiro was third in command of the Playboy empire, behind only Hefner and his daughter). Peter Bart is Editor-in-Chief at Variety. Michael Solomon was named editor of Premiere in 2000. Lesley Seymour is the editor of Redbook. Merle Ginsberg is the Entertainment Editor for Women’s Wear Daily. David Bauer is one of the Executive Editors at Sports Illustrated. David Fine is SI’s photography editor. Todd Gold recently left the editorship of People magazine to found a company with fellow Jew Adam Werbach, recently stepped down as the president of the Sierra Club.

Milton Esterow is the publisher and editor of both ArtNews and Antiques World. He is also co-editor and founder of the American Art Journal. Jonathan Steinberg – son of notorious corporate raider Saul Steinberg – publishes Individual Investor magazine. Steven Brill founded American Lawyer and a media watchdog journal called Brill’s Content (editor-in-chief: David Kuhn, formerly executive editor of Talk magazine), and the Court TV program on television. (A rival, Peoples’ Court, features presiding Jewish judge Jerry Sheindlin and commentating attorney Harry Levin. Another court TV program, Judge Judy, features Jerry Sheindlin’s wife, Judy, at the helm.) For years Jerry Finkelstein published the New York Law Journal. Janice Kaplan is the Executive Producer of Television. Jane Goldman is the Executive Editor of California Lawyer. Rae Anne Marsh is the managing editor of Arizona Corridors Magazine. Steven Cohn edits the Media Industry Newsletter. Rachel Newman edits Country Living. David Klinghoffer is the literary editor of the National Review. Debbie Rosenberg is the Managing Editor of Biography. Robert Epstein is the Editor-in-Chief of Psychology Today. Adam Garfinkle is the Executive Editor of the National Interest. Michael Berman co-founded George magazine. Baltimore’s Style magazine is owned by the Baltimore Jewish Times. Michael Gewanda became the editor of Time (Australia) in 1993. Peter Newman edited Canada’s prominent weekly magazine, Maclean’s. Peter Eisenman was “the father of two architectural publications of note, Oppositions and Skyline.” [ARONSON, S., 1983, p. 303] And on and on and on.

ed USA Today, “in a language they can understand. More than 60% of its readers are African-Americans. Over 80% are under age 25.” Featuring “shock covers” and articles like the one about bulletproof vest clothing fashions to ward off a 44 magnum at close range,” the publisher of The Source, Peter Mays, is also Jewish. [HOROVITZ, p. 1B] In 1998, Elinor Ruth Tatum became the publisher of her father’s newspaper, the Amsterdam News, New York City’s oldest and largest African-American newspaper. Ms. Tatum’s father is Black; her mother is Jewish. [JET, p. 32]

The Detroit News is both published and edited by Marc Silverman. Howard Kleinberg was, until recently, the editor of the Miami News. Martin Baron edits the Boston Globe. Phil Bronstein is the executive editor of the San Francisco Examiner and the second Jewish husband of non-Jewish actress Sharon Stone (his father was a former director of the Los Angeles Jewish Federation). (Michael de Young, also Jewish, founded the rival San Francisco Chronicle). Tom Rosenstiel is the director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism. ABC’s Peggy Wehmeier, a self-described Protestant, born of a Jewish mother, is “the only network correspondent specializing in religious and spiritual issues.” [SHISTER, G., 9-11-99, p. G2] At least half of the ten members (Jonathan Alter, Howard Fineman, Michael Isikoff, Debra Rosenberg, and Ron Haviv) of Newsweek’s “political team” covering the 2000 American presidential campaign were of Jewish heritage. [NEWSWEEK, 11-20-2000, p. 4] And if you want to write regularly for editor Steve Wasserman’s Los Angeles Times Book Review, and you’re not Jewish, the odds are heavily against you. His stable of “Contributing Writers” is Anthony Day, Michael Frank, Jonathan Kirsch, Jonathan Levi, Suzie Linfield, Suzanne Mantell, and Benjamin Schwarz. Politically conservative commentator David Horowitz would argue that you’d have to be left-wing too, noting that:

Longtime media critic for the Los Angeles Times has been Howard Rosenberg. In a 1991 column he wrote that

“The mail is coming in about my column endorsing KCET’s recent presentation of the controversial film ‘Stop the Church,’ and nearly all of it is critical and angry. Most writers accused me of being rather a fence sitter and biased against Catholicism. Some note that I am Jewish.” [ROSENBERG, H., 9-16-91, p. F1]

The Washington Post media reporter is another Jewish Howard, this one Kurtz. Until his death in 1997, across the continent, Herb Caen was for fifty years a “legendary San Francisco columnist” and the city’s “most beloved institution.” [SCHEER, R., 2-4-97, p. B7; DOUGAN, M., 2-7-97, p. A1] Looking back into earlier years, Dennis McDougal singles out (Jewish columnists) Joyce Haber (of the Los Angeles Times) and Irv Kupcinet (of the Chicago Sun-Times) as prominent media loyal public supporters/defenders of Hollywood lawyer/mobster Sidney Korshak. [MCDougAL, p. 396]

In 2000, journalist Katherine Ross wrote about the case of fellow journalist Lynn Hirschberg:

“She is the premier chronicler of the entertainment elite for the New York Times Magazine … On the beat for almost 20 years, Hirschberg stands at the nexus of the Los Angeles entertainment and New York publishing worlds … Hirschberg’s pieces almost always deify or demonize. ‘She can make your career,’ says publicist Bumble Ward.” [ROSMAN, K., 5-2000]

Hirschberg started out with help from David Rosenthal, “then the assistant manager at Rolling Stone and now the publisher of Simon and Schuster’s adult-trade division.” “Hirschberg,” adds reporter Ross, “doesn’t just profile and befriend the powerful. Like most other successful operators, she is savvy at facilitating business deals for friends that will leave those friends in her debt. In 1993, for example, Hirschberg brokered a Time magazine cover story about her then close friend, the producer Scott Rudin, written by her friend Philip Weiss … [Also] consider her close alliance with Peter Kaplan, the editor of the New York Observer, a weekly newspaper popular in New York’s media circles. Kaplan and Hirschberg have never worked together, but their friendship has benefited both.” [ROSMAN, K., 5-2000]

All these people are Jewish.

Does all this massive Jewish predominance in the mass media, internationally, and their collective sense of destiny in history; upper echelon cliques; widespread allegiance to Israel; intense sense of collective community; concerted economic and ideological pressures to encourage pro-Israel/Jewish views; the systematic political pressures and omnipresent lobbying maneuvers of the Anti-Defamation League, the American Israel Political Action Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Committee; and many other multi-million dollar lobbying groups whose fundamental purpose is to control information about Jews and Israel, mean nothing, as so many Jews insist? Let us take but one aspect of the systematic censorship throughout American culture by the Jewish community: the state of Israel.

Paul Findley, for twenty-three years a United States Congressman from Illinois had to say about his book that described the Jewish-American lobby for Israel in America, They Dare to Speak Out: People and Institutions Confront Israel’s Lobby (the book was eventually published by a small publisher, Lawrence Hill, and made the Washington Post’s ten top books list for nine weeks):

“My quest for a publisher began in March 1983 and was predictably long and frustrating. Declining to represent me, New York literary agent Alexander Wylie forecast with prophetic vision that no major United States publisher would accept my book. He wrote, ‘It’s a sad state of affairs.’ Bruce Lee of William Morrow and Company called my manuscript ‘outstanding,’ but his company concluded that publishing it would cause trouble in the house and outside’ and decided against ‘taking the heat.’ Robert Loomis of Random House called it an ‘important book’ but reported that the firm’s leadership decided the theme was ‘too sensitive.’ Twenty other publishers said no.” [FINDLEY, THEY, p. viii]

When in 1986 Israeli defector Mordechai Vanunu had his photographic evidence of the inside of Israel’s nuclear weapons plant published in England, it should have been a major news story. Jerry Oplinger, a former White House aide, was amazed at how little attention the mass media gave it, saying: “I couldn’t believe those guys. There was nothing [significant] in the [New York] Times, [Washington] Post, and Wall Street Journal. Everybody in the arms control business was amazed that there was nothing. To me and my close friends, it was really discouraging.” [HERSH, p. 308]

In the London Independent, in 1998 Robert Fisk wrote an entire article about the mass media’s systematic bias and censorship of stories relating to Israel. Among the Fisk’s list of outrages, is the fact that

“the New York Times … ran a syndicated account from an Israeli paper of an Israeli soldier’s life in Qana before the massacre [when Israeli troops fired a missile into an Arab ambulance in Lebanon]; but the New York Times deleted a paragraph about how the Israeli troops had stolen cars from their Lebanese owners and looted houses – thus even censoring the Israeli press … History continues to be short-changed in the American media … Academics may one day decide how deeply the American public has been misled by the persistent bias of the US media, and the degree to which this has led them to support US policies which may destroy America’s prestige in the Middle East.” [FISK, p. 14]

Norman Finkelstein, a well-known Jewish critic of Israel, tabulated the articles about torture in the Middle East in the New York Times between 1981 and 1991. He found over 80 articles – 26 articles about torture in Iran, 15 in Turkey, 14 in Iraq and 8 in Egypt. “Consider how the case of Israel was treated,” he wrote, “Except for a brief period under [Israeli] Prime Minister Begin, torture was practiced continuously from the early 1970s against Palestinian detainees … [The Times] has probably devoted as much space to coverage of Israel [on other matters] as the entire Arab world combined. Yet for the full decade under consideration (1981-91), the Times found space for only five items on Israeli torture of Palestinian detainees … Not once did the Times even hint at the not trivial fact that Israel’s torture of Palestinian detainees in the Occupied Territories is ‘virtually institutionalized’ (Amnesty International) and ‘systematic and routine’ (B’Tselem).” [an Israeli human rights organization] [FINKELSTEIN, 1996, p. 67]

In 1982 the Times’ Foreign Correspondent to Israel, Thomas Friedman (also Jewish) ran into trouble with his Jewish superiors for telling the truth about the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. Friedman filed a report with his employers about the “indiscriminate” bombing of the Arab community there. New York Times editors censored the adjective. Friedman “then sat down and wrote one of the most indicting messages the Times ever received from a correspondent, that his editors were ‘afraid to tell our readers’ about Israel’s ‘apparent aim of terrorizing its [Beirut] civilian population … I am filled with profound sadness by what I have learned in the past afternoon about my newspaper.’” [GOULDEN, p. 323] Friedman was immediately called back to the states and warned that “if you ever pull a stunt like that again, you are fired. Understand?” [GOULDEN, p. 323]

In 1994, the Jerusalem Post noted another case of Jewish lobbying-censorship of the American mass media, this time of the work of Time magazine reporter Murray Gart:

> Time was planning to publish a list of Israeli agents in Washington submitted by the Mossad to the CIA. [Howard] Teicher’s name [a Jewish National Security Agency adviser] was purportedly on the list. Time never ran the story, the editors pulled it out of the magazine virtually at the last minute.” [RODAN, S., 1994, p. 18]

Thomas Kiernan notes the case of non-Jewish mogul Rupert Murdoch, so beholding to the Jews who helped him get a foothold in the world of international mass media:

> “[ABC head Leonard] Goldenson’s personality and lectures thus had the effect of sharpening Murdoch’s sympathy toward Israel. As a result, his Australian papers took a decidedly pro-Israel tone during the early 1960s – a fact that didn’t please his surrogates in the top editorial chairs. The eventual resignation of Douglas Brass as editor for the Sydney Mirror, for instance, is said by some in Murdoch’s organization to have come about over that issue …” [KIERNAN, T., 1986, p. 78]

In a discussion of the reportage at Murdoch’s New York Post, Kiernan observes

> “I was witness to some of the Post’s coverage of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in the summer of 1982 and of the subsequent siege of Beirut. Throughout that period, the paper was without a single reporter on the scene, yet its stories were laced with unattributed ‘eye-witness’ descriptions of Arab atrocities and Israeli heroics, many of them invented in its New York newsroom.” [KIERNAN, T., 1986, p. 262]

In May 2001, during the latest Palestinian intifada (uprising) against Israeli rule, the Anti-Defamation League announced that their recent survey showed that “56 percent of major newspaper editorials took a strong pro-Israel stance.” [TEITELBAUM, S., 5-25-01] This was despite the fact that representatives of organizations as diverse as Amnesty International, the European Union, the Red Cross, and YMCA were criticizing, and often condemning, the brutal policies of the Israeli state. Incredibly, even as most of those who headed press organizations were emphatically pro-Israel, Howard Goller, chairman of the Foreign Press Association, publicly complained that “twenty foreign correspondents in the West Bank and Gaza have been shot at and hit [by Israeli troops] with live ammunition or rubber coated-bullets since the start of the intifada …
Worse still, he says, the Israeli government is refusing to deal with the matter.” [HAUSMAN, T., 5-25-01]

Michael Shermer and Alex Grobman note the case of British author David Irving, who faced the destruction of his decades-old writing career when he started addressing the Jewish community critically:

“After Irving testified for the defense in [“Holocaust denier” Ernest] Zundel’s 1988 ‘free speech’ trial in Canada, various governments filed notices of entry denial and deportation against him. As he recounts on his Web page, his publishing firm, Focal Point, has received notices from the bookstores in England canceling distribution of [his book] Hitler’s Wars and other titles. ‘Following complaints from valued customers we no longer feel able to stock this title,’ read one notice from a Sheffield bookstore in July 1992. Also in the same year, the director of Media House Publications in Johannesburg, South Africa, informed Irving that with regard to Hitler’s War, “I don’t want any copies on our premises. We have had some incidents already. Many of our book buyers are Jewish. It is much easier for [my staff] now to say, ‘We don’t stock the book.’” [SHERMER/ GROBMAN, 2000, p. 50]

Filmmaker Tom Hayes calls the mass media’s wall of censorship surrounding the state of Israel “the Information Blockade.” This systematic censorship is important in keeping Americans ignorant about the truths concerning Israel, including the details of the staggering sums of money – approximately $78 billion – American taxpayers have funneled to that other country (instead of to themselves) since the creation of the Jewish state in 1948, [APAS, p. 106] let alone the myriad of moral injustices perpetrated upon others by the Jewish nation. [See later chapter] Arthur Hays-Sulzberger, the publisher of the New York Times, noted the behind-the-scenes economic intrigues and mass media power of pro-Israel Jews as early as 1946:

“I dislike the coercive methods of Zionists in this country who have not hesitated to use economic means to silence persons who have different views.” [LILIENTHAL, p. 124]

Those who would like to criticize Israel, notes Jewish French scholar Maxime Rodinson, “remain silent, either because they are not in a position to write or speak publicly, or because they fear the reactions of their immediate environment or the broader public. I understand them very well. Moreover, publishers, newspaper editors, and radio and television producers, also tend to be afraid to let them speak; they suffer constant blackmail from Judeo-centrists.” [RODINSON, p. 15]

Ze’ev Chafets notes a 1979 article that got past the censors in Newsweek; it read:

“With the help of American Jews in and out of government, Mossad [Israel’s intelligence agency] looks for any softening in U.S. support and tries to get technical intelligence the Administration is unwilling to give to Israel.”
The normal chorus of Jewish complaint and pressure to censor any similar future statement was soon to follow. As Chafets observes, “the editor of Newsweek later admitted that Newsweek’s insinuation that American Jews are disloyal to the United States ‘reflects an anti-Semitic stereotype’ and informed the Anti-Defamation League that ‘we have engaged in some consciousness raising on this subject and I do not expect a recurrence.’ The letter to the ADL was signed by the magazine’s editor-in-chief: Lester Bernstein [also Jewish].” [CHAFETS, p. 281]

Also in the 1970s, CBS news commentator Jeffrey St. John made a similar mistake about speaking openly of Jewish dual loyalty on the radio program “Spectrum.” He had the courage to observe that “American public opinion is shaped largely by a pro-Israeli viewpoint. And when someone suggests we should begin changing our policy, as an American oil executive did recently, the pro-Israel propaganda machine is America crucifies him in public … Emotions, not reason, govern our policy towards Israel … The issue is whether you are an American first and a Jew second and if forced to choose, which commands your loyalty first.” [LILIENTHAL, 1983, p. 450]

St. John was gone from CBS soon afterwards. Likewise, CBS newscaster Eric Severeid took heavy Jewish lobbying heat in 1975 for daring to say that “A growing number of American Jews are … torn in a soul-searching internal debate as to just where their loyalties should lie and how far they should go in honoring them.” [LILIENTHAL, 1983, p. 449]

In 1994 after rejections from numerous publishers, John Sack, a respected Jewish journalist for Esquire and other magazines for nearly 40 years, managed to get his manuscript (An Eye for an Eye, about the “vengeful” Jewish heads of post-World War II concentration camps for Germans and Poles) published by Basic Books. (The book was originally commissioned with a $25,000 advance by the Henry Holt publishing company. When Sack’s final manuscript was completed, it was abandoned by the firm). “Major U.S. newspapers and publishers,” noted the Associated Press, “shied away from the manuscript before Basic Books finally put out the English edition in 1993.” [BAJACK, INTERNET] The editor for the volume at Basic Books, Steve Fraser, noted that “We concluded it ought not to be suppressed – which is what was happening. I take my vocation as a publisher seriously enough to feel that it is my responsibility to publish something that’s important even if the rest of the industry is afraid to do that.” [WIENER, p. 24]

Terry McDonnell, one of Sack’s editors at Esquire, was one of those refusing to publish any of the investigators articles about the Jewish commandants of concentration camps. “[Other publishers are] scared,” he told Sack. “And I’m scared too.” [LOMBARDI, p. 18]

Sack had researched the facts of the volume for seven years. “Although Sack’s facts were not disputed,” notes the Associated Press, “the book was slammed as sadistic sensationalism in a review by powerful German [Jewish] critic Elke Geisel, whose seething polemic called it ‘vile docudrama’ and ‘a gift to neo-Nazis.’” “[Sack’s book] is the greatest filth,” added Ralph Giordano, a German Jewish writer who never read the book in question, “… [it is a] vulgar artistic fetish.” [AP, INTERNET] (Press censorship about Jewish history even occurs in Poland, presumably because the new capitalist state must seek so much western/Jewish economic aid in rebuilding their nation. In 1994 the Gazeta Wyborcza, one of Poland’s most-widely read newspapers, covered an investigation of fifteen former officers of the Office of State Security [Poland’s communist secret police]. “The paper is avoiding any mention of Jews,” notes Jewish journalist Carol Oppenheim. “I think there is widespread opinion of the dominance of Jews in the Communist Party,” said Michael Cichy, the cultural editor of the paper, “but mention of this in the Polish press is taboo.” [OPPENHEIM, p. 39]

In response to Jewish outrage that such truthful information be published, the new head (Viktor Niemann) of the publishing house that printed Sack’s book in German, R. Piper, decided to destroy all 6,000 copies in its warehouses. “It was the fourth time,” notes the Associated Press, “that Sack’s story … had been bought by a publisher who subsequently decided against printing.” [BAJACK, INTERNET] “It is tragic,” wrote Sack in response to his German publisher’s actions, “that An Eye for an Eye is not being published in Germany now and that Germans have nowhere to learn the truth.” [SACK, p. A18]

When the TV news show 60 Minutes investigated one of the Jewish subjects of Sack’s book, Shlomo Morel, Sack’s broader story “looked as if it might take off,” said Carol Oppenheim, “and it sent shock waves through the Jewish community.” “A feature by 60 Minutes that backed up Sack seemed to promise major attention and at least minor bestsellerdom,” noted the Washington Post, “but the rest of the media either attacked or ignored the book. The general tenor was summoned up in Miami Jewish Week: “Do me a favor – don’t read this book.” [STREITFIELD, p. D4]

In 1994, John Lombardi wrote a disturbing article for New York magazine about the Sack story and the massive censorship surrounding it. Lombardi called his piece “The Book They Dare Not Review: An Inconvenient Holocaust Story.” Lombardi formerly worked at Advance Publication’s GQ magazine, the periodical that had initially paid Sack $20,000 to research and write about the Jewish concentration camp overseers, only – after the article had been typeset – to quietly kill it.

The most venomous attack on Sack’s book came from the New Republic (owned by avidly pro-Israel publisher Martin Peretz). Sack wrote a point by point rebuttal to their review, but the magazine refused to publish any of it in their Letters to the Editor section. “But,” noted the Nation, “the magazine made the remarkable decision to sell him ad space to run it ($525 for five column inches). The ad was typeset, but the magazine then chose to reject it.” [WIENER, p. 287] Leon Wieseltier, the Jewish literary editor of the New Republic, was even quoted as saying, “I’m not embarrassed to say that as part of my job of policing the culture, I felt that the sooner we stopped this book, the better…. It’s one of the stupidest books I ever read, and I frankly resolved to do as much damage as I could.” [LOMBARDI, p 18] Elan Steinberg, spokeswoman for the World Jewish Congress impugned the veracity of Sack’s dozens of interviews with Jewish (and other) eyewitnesses to Jewish-created atrocities, saying: “You cannot rely on witnesses … [because] you’re insulting the memory of 6 million [Jewish Holocaust] martyrs.” [LOMBARD, p. 18]

In 1997, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington DC suddenly cancelled a lecture by Sack about his book and his findings therein. “The invitation to give your lecture was issued without my knowledge,” wrote Director Walter Reich to the Eye for an Eye author, “Having had the opportunity to examine the matter, I have determined that holding the presentation would not be compatible with the Museum’s programs.” [STREITFIELD, p. D1] In turn, Sack decided to rent (for $301) a room at the nearby National Press Club to discuss his book and the censorship around it. There is no record in the major national computer research database of America’s newspapers that Sack’s press conference was ever reported upon.

“It would be tempting to simply dismiss this painful book as the work of an anti-Semitic crackpot, as many have,” wrote Jewish author Carol Oppenheim, “The New York Times, the Washington Post, and Time have ignored An Eye for An Eye [i.e., not reviewed it]. But John Sack is a noted journalist with some forty years experience. His work on the Vietnam War is studied in college classes. And he is also a Jew.” [OPPENHEIM, p. 39]

And what are we to make of the case of Victor Ostrovsky, former Mossad agent and author of 1990’s By Way of Deception, an expose of the international workings of the Israeli Mossad organization? Although Israel managed to briefly, and literally, ban his book in America through the American courts, the censorship was soon lifted. [See earlier discussion] “We will get to him by other means, we will break him economically,” the head of the Mossad, Israel’s CIA, then told the Israeli media. “I’m now convinced,” wrote Ostrovsky in 1997, “that I am the target of a broad collusion between elements of the Israel government and their gofers, mostly in the American Jewish community … My second book was ignored … A speaker’s bureau in Toronto, which seldom had trouble arranging speaking engagements with student and other groups eager to have me as a speaker, found that the engagements were cancelled before I could appear.” [OSTROVSKY, 1997]

When Ostrovsky appeared on Canadian national television, Yosef Lapid, the former chief of Israeli television, declared on the same show, via satellite from the Jewish state, that Ostrovsky’s assassination by the Mossad could cause diplomatic problems now that he lived in Canada, but “I hope that there would be a decent Jew in Canada who would do the job for us.”

Ostrovsky was later stunned that no North American media outcry rose against this call for his assassination on live public television. (Recall, in contradistinction, the mass media outcry against Iran’s death sentence on author Salmon Rushdie. Iran, of course, is a declared arch-enemy of Zionism. And what, one wonders, would happen to a former president of CBS who called for murder?) But Lapid? Nothing. A reporter from USA Today interviewed Ostrovsky about Lapid’s public threat and planned to write a story about it, but,

Eventually he sought to sue the man who called for the call to kill him, but Ostrovsky’s lawyer soon bailed out, explaining “that the safety of his staff would clearly be jeopardized if he proceeded.” Soon thereafter, Ostrovsky had financial problems with both his publishers, HarperCollins and, in Canada, Stoddart. His agent suddenly refused to return his calls and in due time his “house burned to the ground. The fire marshal’s report declared it arson.” In 1997, Washington publisher Regnery backed out of a plan to publish his next book, already listed in its upcoming books catalogue. “It suddenly occurred to me,” Ostrovsky wrote,

“for the first time, that the forces of racism, bigotry and apartheid may win, even here in North America. In calling out, finally, for help, I suddenly fear that I man only be shouting into the wind. To all who believe that ‘it can’t happen here,’ I say beware. It is immensely satisfying to take a stand and speak out against coercion and tyranny. But … although your friends cherish you, they may choose to do it from a distance.” [OSTROVSKY, V., 1997, p. 37, 84-85]

In another case of covert censorship, in 1996 the London Sunday Telegraph took note of an unusual article by American Jewish journalist Philip Weiss:

“A studied silence has greeted the cover story in the normally scrupulously liberal New York magazine which claims that Jews in America wield so much power and influence that they need no longer fear the shadow of anti-Semitism. The magazine refuses to discuss the article, as apparently does the author, Philip Weiss … The weekly must have known it was inviting trouble. Even the cover seemed a calculated risk: a photograph of the American flag with some of its stars replaced by the Star of David. American magazines rarely confront the issue of Jewish influence so directly…. Richard Goldstein, a columnist for the Village Voice, has already remarked that the fact Jews have achieved so much influence despite the anti-Semitic views of many Americans is ‘less a paradox than a time-bomb.’ The irony, of course, is that the issue is one that has been privately discussed among Jews for decades.” [LANGTON, p. 24]

In another censorial case, 1989 BBC reporter Alan Hart complained that United States publishers were afraid to publish his less-than-condemning book about PLO leader Yassar Arafat because they “privately feared a backlash from supporters of Israel.” The volume, Arafat: A Political Biography, had already appeared in three editions in Great Britain – first published five years earlier. Over 40 American publishers had passed on publishing Hart’s work until Indiana University Press decided to do it. In a formal statement, the university publisher remarked that it was “not unaware that some form of self-censorship might have been the cause” for the lack of American publisher interest. [ABRAMS, G., 6-19-89, p. 5, 1]

In 1996 the Christian Science Monitor noted the attack upon a famous Catholic cleric in France, headlining its article: “Cleric’s Comments Ignite the Fury of French media.” The origin of this controversy stems from a book by Roger Garaudy: The Founding Myths of Israeli Politics. Garaudy, as noted earlier, wrote this volume that criticized Israel, Zionism, and the Holocaust as Judeo-centric propaganda; it has been effectively banned in France. The author, an 82-year old former Resistance fighter against the Nazis, was also once a Communist member of the French parliament (expelled from the party in 1970 for criticizing the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia) and later a convert to Islam. He was fined $20,000 by a French court for writing his book, which, declared the court, “questions all Jews, not only Israelis … Far from merely criticizing Zionism … Roger Garaudy embarked on a virulent and systematic questioning of crimes against humanity against the Jewish community.” [ROSENBERG, C., 2-27-98]

The Christian Science Monitor noted that Garaudy’s book was available in only one bookstore in Paris, and it was not possible to even order the work in many of the others. The Monitor also noted that most of the critics of the book have not read it and that “Garaudy’s book does not deny that millions of Jews were murdered by the Nazis.” “A “prominent jurist,” Francois Terre, called the 1990 Gayssot Law (that “makes it a criminal offense to challenge the facts of the Holocaust”) totalitarian: It was “a law that kills historical research and dishonors France … Even politicians who oppose the law have been reluctant to speak out against it.” [CHADDOCK, G., 7-25-96, p. 5]

The Catholic cleric Abbé Pierre fell into the controversy surrounding the book soon after. Pierre, noted the Washington Post, was “France’s most admired man … For five decades [he] ranked consistently at the top of the popularity polls in France for his defense of the downtrodden. As a champion of street people and a former activist in the anti-Nazi resistance, Abbe Pierre commanded universal respect and unrivaled media coverage.” [RANDALL, J., p. 7-3-96, p. A27] Pierre’s activities in the French underground also included smuggling Jews to safety. He is the founder the Emmaus foundation, 350 centers around the world for the homeless and poor.

The cleric’s problems began when he publicly came out in support of Garaudy. Knowing the author for fifty years, Pierre attested to his integrity. “I think the average Frenchman,” said Pierre, “will say with relief the taboo [about how the Holocaust may be examined] is over. You will no longer be called anti-Jewish or anti-Semitic for saying a Jew sings out of tune.” [RANDALL, J., 7-3-96, p. A27] Unfortunately for Abbé Pierre, however, not understanding the power of such forces against such an open comment, this was a gross miscalculation.

The 83-year old cleric was barraged with critical attack from all sides – from the French media, civil rights groups, and eventually – seeking to assuage vociferous Jewish complaint – the Church itself. France’s chief rabbi called Pierre’s words those of an anti-Semite. The president of the Jewish Consistory of France declared that: “[Abbe’s] continuous support of Roger Garaudy is unacceptable.”
Under an avalanche of criticism, Pierre took refuge in a monastery in Italy. For a while the old cleric continued to defend his position, digging himself deeper into controversy, noting that Jewish suffering was only part of the calamity of World War II. He also “said that according to the Bible, the Jews committed a genocide comparable with the Shoah when they entered Palestine 12 or 11 centuries before Christ.” Addressing Zionism, he called it “a world conspiracy,” that it was “based in the United States with world ramifications,” and he implored people to have “the honesty to look at the truth.” Zionism, said the cleric, “want[s] the empire promised to Abraham. And this movement is plotting worldwide for that.” [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 6-17-96] [See later chapters for discussions of Zionism]

The attacks upon France’s national “saint,” suddenly fallen, continued. Months later a British newspaper noted that “it is clear that the debate left him traumatized. His conversation [now] is scattered with references to his friendship, help towards, and empathy, with the Jews.” [FINANCIAL TIMES, 6-21-97] The Washington Post’s reporter Jonathan Randall ended his report on Pierre with a suggestion of senility in the old man. Quoting Charles De Gaulle, Randall concluded his piece, saying: “Old age is a shipwreck.” [RANDALL, J., p. 7-3-96, p. A27]

Overwhelmed by the attacks against him, Pierre finally publicly surrendered. “The attacks of which I have been targeted have been beyond all measure,” he said. “I have greatly suffered.” [PHILLIPS, I., 5-30-96, p. 13] He announced that “I have decided to retract my statement, and to bow entirely to the sole opinion of the experts of the Church,” also adding that his comments had been “exploited by elements who dangerously toy with the anti-Semitic, neo-fascist, and neo-Nazi currents that I have fought and will always fight against.” [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 7-23-96]

A controversy of a somewhat related vein occurred in Montreal, Canada, a year before the Abbé Pierre story. A prominent Canadian Jewish lawyer, Julius Grey, faced an avalanche of Jewish condemnation and outrage when he freely noted in a lecture at John Abbott College that “I think the Holocaust and anti-Semitism is being used by some elements and Israel and the Jewish community to keep people in the fold. What is happening is a fake alarmist mentality, because there is effectively no anti-Semitism in North America … [Modern teaching about the Holocaust] is turning it into a political incident. Each ethnic group creates its own martyrology, that we’re good and kind and we’ve been mistreated.” [CHERNEY, 4-25-95]

Response to Grey’s comments was overwhelming in the Jewish community. Mike Cohn of the Canadian Jewish Congress told a reporter that “in the many years I’ve been at the congress, I don’t remember getting this many phone calls from irate members of the community.” [CHERNEY, 4-26-95] In the flurry of subsequent editorials about the controversy, one non-Jewish commentator noted that “the effect of the reaction to Grey’s remarks could be to intimidate, to stifle open debate, to chill free expression. For after seeing what happened to Grey, others may think twice about expressing unconventional opinions and ideas.” [MACPHERSON, D. p. B3] The original (Montreal) Gazette reporter who reported the Grey story later wondered in a later article about “the rush to discredit and silence Julius Grey … [Does] a writer need … a special license to deal with the Holocaust, or a lawyer need to get permission from the community’s institutions to talk about it … Could that … silence dissent?” [CHERRY, E., 4-29-95, p. B6]

Elsewhere, in the more personal realm, when Tom Bower sought to publish his unauthorized and highly critical biography of Robert Maxwell, the British Jewish media baron invoked litigation involving at least twelve lawyers, a number of accountants, and two private detectives in researching Bower’s background. Failing in the courts to stop the book, Maxwell’s army of censors intimidated – by economic threats and intimidating legal innuendoes – much of England’s publishing world. Wholesale book distributors and most British bookshops knuckled under to Maxwell’s power, and didn’t carry the book. The mogul even bought a paperback company that held the rights to Bower’s pending volume in order to effectively censor it. [BOWER, p. ix-x]

In 1997, in a story about Jewish South African mogul Sol Kerzner, the New York Times noted that:

“In an early test of press freedom under South Africa’s new constitution, a well-known international casino magnate has delayed the publication of a book about him and is trying to ban it. The book, Kerzner Unauthorized… profiles Sol Kerzner [who] made his fortune operating [casinos] under apartheid in south Africa’s black ‘homeland’…. [He] has threatened to sue local newspapers if they excerpted it. As a result, a major Sunday newspaper withheld publication of an excerpt from the book.” [MCNEIL, p. A3]

The author of the Kerzner volume, Allan Greenblo, is credible; he is himself the CEO of two major South African publications – the Business Day and the Financial Mail. (Perhaps he himself is Jewish?)

Jewish author Steven Weinberg (author of Armand Hammer: The Untold Story) was even sued by corrupt Jewish mogul Armand Hammer. “After The Untold Story was published in English, Armand filed the most expensive libel action in British history, suing Weinberg on 157 counts of defamation.” [BLUMAY, C., 1992, p. 449]

In 1988, yet another Jewish business mogul family (Canada’s Reichmanns, at the time owners of the largest real estate empire on earth) sought to censor the truth about their past. The (Montreal) Gazette notes that:

“These are dangerous waters for any journalist. In 1988, Toronto Life magazine was hit with a $102 million libel suit for publishing an article by freelance writer Elaine Dewar which investigates [patriarch] Samuel Reichmann’s murky past as an egg dealer in pre-war Austria and then as a currency speculator in wartime Tangiers. Toronto Life’s eventual apology and out-of-court settlement suggested that ‘libel chill’ can be an effective deterrent for any wealthy family seeking to keep a curtain of privacy around itself.” [HADEKEL, p. I]
In the same realm, as microcosm for the whole problem of censorship and self-censorship in the mass media world, in reviewing Jewish Hollywood mogul Michael Ovitz at the peak of his power, Robert Slater noted that “As the most powerful person in [Hollywood], Ovitz had the power, if he chose, to use it in order to punish any critic who went public by denying him or her all access to his stable of stars. The mere possibility that he exact such punishment was enough to silence his critics … No Ovitz critic was willing to speak out either on or off the record.” [SLATER, p. 202]

In August 1992, John H. Richardson, a senior writer at Premiere magazine in Los Angeles, finished a story about Jewish madam Heidi Fleiss and her drug and prostitution ring in the Hollywood community. The entertainment magazine, dependent upon cooperation with the movie world for its very existence, decided against publishing the piece. The Entertainment Weekly also developed an article about the story, but threats of legal action from attorneys for Columbia executive Michael Nathanson killed the story. The Hollywood Reporter also had an article about Fleiss too; this too was aborted when Nathanson threatened to “destroy [each reporter’s] reputation” if the story was published. [KENNEDY, D., 8-20-93]

Reporter Dan Moldea experienced a similar situation when he dared to write an expose (published in 1986) about mogul Lew Wasserman at MCA. Moldea who has written about crime for over twenty years (including books about the murder of Bobby Kennedy, the Teamsters Union, and corruption in professional sports), noted that “Writing Dark Victory [about Wasserman] was the only time I ever really feared for my career. I felt raw power coming at me like a rifle shot.” [MCDOUGAL, p. x] “Moldea,” notes Dennis McDougal, “maintains that he was followed and his phone lines tapped during the year he worked on the book. He is certain that Lew Wasserman targeted him for harassment.” [MCDOUGAL, p. x]

Los Angeles Times reporter Bill Knoedelseder also faced blatant censorship when he tried to write about the Wasserman-MCA-Mafia world, which extended to powerful influences in the Reagan White House (Wasserman was Reagan’s Hollywood agent). The reporter, notes Dennis McDougal, “changed his mind about his newspaper’s independence…. Somewhere in plusher, upper reaches of the Times, beyond the hard scrabble cubicles of the newsroom, Lew was enjoying lunch with the newspaper’s executives … Knoedelseder’s stories about MCA and the derailed Mob probe [at Los Angeles City Hall] began to get rejected regularly by his editors. He was instructed to switch interests and write about something other than MCA for a change. Before the year was out, stories about MCA and the Mob ceased to appear in the paper at all, and Bill Knoedelseder quit his job at the Times.” [MCDOUGAL, p. 468]

In 2000, Los Angeles Times reporter, Kim Murphy, a 17-year veteran newswoman, wrote some articles about the community of “Holocaust Deniers” and alleged right wing political groups that led to many Jews “accusing the Times of legitimizing the views of anti-Semites.” The first article addressed controversial British historian David Irving who had attempted to, in effect, sue the international Jewish lobby that had destroyed his writing career. Murphy’s attempts at objectivity rankled a lot of Jews and the reporter soon found herself under fire. “The story outraged members of the Los Angeles Jewish community,” notes Eric Umansky, “The controversy even found its way into the Times newsroom.” At close quarters, fellow Los Angeles Times reporter Alan Abramson, of course Jewish, decried Murphy’s work, as did another Jewish newsman, David Lauter, the Times religion reporter, who said, “Kim is a very good reporter. But I think she screwed up on this particular subject.” The Times’ executive editor, Leo Wolinsky, also Jewish, “signed off on Murphy’s second story after asking her to quote more sources critical of Irving.” Murphy publicly defended herself, insisting that

“The Holocaust was horrible, “[but] it’s my profound belief that there are no questions that can’t be asked. This is an issue of political correctness. There are just certain things you are not allowed to say, even in this country.” [UMANSKY, E., 9-2000]

During the era of the 1980s Savings and Loan scandals across America, Wall Street Journal reporter Charles McCoy was set to run an article about the Federal Home Loan Bank Board’s questionable decision to allow J. Livingston Kossberg’s First Texas Savings and Loan (fourth largest in Texas) to acquire Gibraltar Savings (the state’s largest S&L whose principal investor was Saul Steinberg). Connected to the deal was yet another influential Jewish entrepreneur, Robert Strauss, former chairman of the Democratic National Party and head of the Jimmy Carter campaign against Ronald Reagan. Reporter Martin Meyer notes that

“In my presence [Strauss] chewed reporter McCoy out on the telephone for a quarter of an hour, informing him that he (Strauss) was close to Warren Phillips [also Jewish], CEO of Dow Jones, and thus McCoy’s employer, and Strauss would have his ass if there was stuff in the story of which Strauss disapproved … [So] McCoy wrote carefully, and you had to know what the numbers [in his story] implied to know what the story said.” [MEYER, M., p. 14]

“The deal shouldn’t have been approved at all…,” remarks Meyer, “First Texas was a sinking ship, losing money on its lending operations … [But] with Strauss on one side and [Jewish junk bond manipulator Michael] Milken on the other, the Bank Board was completely surrounded by political influence … First Gibraltar’s star board member was [also] Strauss’ son, Richard (who was further blessed in Dallas by his aunt, the mayor).” [MEYER, M., p. 13-14]

In 1992, director/actor Woody Allen faced public embarrassment when actress Mia Farrow (who had a common law relationship with him for many years; she was also once married to Jewish conductor Andre Previn) accused Allen of having an affair with one of their teenage adopted daughters, and that he had repeatedly sexually molested another daughter, a young child. Criminal charges, however, were another story. Allen conceded, and defended, his sexual relationship with the older daughter but denied any other incidents with others. Paul Williams, the New York Child Welfare worker on the case, noted that “based [on the child’s] demeanor and her responses to my questions, and my conversations with the caseworker in Connecticut, and my experiences from interviewing hundreds of children who have been abused, I concluded that abuse did occur and that there was a prima facie cause to commence family-court proceedings against Woody Allen. Then the barriers came down. There came a litany of reasons why we should not go forward. My superior said that Woody Allen is ‘an influential person,’ she talked about his films, and his ‘position.’ As more evidence came through interviews, I insisted that the case should have been filed. Managers at the Child Welfare Agency responded that ‘pressure [to drop the case] is coming all the way from the mayor’s office [Jewish mayor: Ed Koch].’” [FARROW, p. 311]

The case was dropped. A child custody trial featured Allen represented by six different law firms. [FARROW, p. 316] Later, the Connecticut state attorney, Frank Maco, announced that “probable cause” for Allen’s arrest existed, but that by then Farrow had decided a public trial would be extremely detrimental to the abused child. [FARROW, p. 329]

In 1997 Peter Watson’s sensational expose of the systemic corruption within the Sotheby art auction house (headed by Jewish real estate mogul Alfred Taubman) “sparked scandalous headlines on both sides of the Atlantic when it was released in Britain.” [NY POST, 2-2-98] “Now that [the book] has finally arrived [in America],” noted the New York Post, “the press doesn’t seem to be showing much interest. So far, only the weekly New York Observer has reviewed it – and even that is going Sotheby’s way.” [NY POST, 2-2-98] The American publisher of the book, Random House (owned by Jewish mogul Si Newhouse) backed its publication up three times and revised part of the European version. The Post suggested that “Sotheby is getting kid glove treatment thanks to Alfred Taubman getting a favor from Random House owner Si Newhouse – an avid collector known to spend millions at auctions.” [NEW YORK POST, 2-2-98, p. 12]

In 1999, independent journalist and art critic Hector Feliciano found himself facing a $1.8 million lawsuit at the hands of the (Jewish) Wildenstein family (Daniel, Alec, and Guy). Feliciano had dared to write about the family’s clandestine art dealings with the Nazis during Hitler’s looting of Jewish-owned art treasures. “They’re suing me,” said Feliciano, “so that other journalists will think twice about writing about them.” [GOLDBERG, J. J., 6-18-99, p. 14]

Dissident (“self-hating”) Jews too are not immune from enforced censorship about public criticism of their community. British reporters Christopher Reed and Eleanor Mills note a well known case in Hollywood:

“An example of Tinseltown shyness about criticism of Jews is Budd Schulberg’s book What Makes Sammy Run? Now 82, he wrote the classic about a ruthlessly ambitious Hollywood type called Sammy Glick, in 1941. Five attempts to film it have failed. After reading the book, MGM studio chief Louis Mayer said Schulberg should be deported. It was pointed out that the author was not only born in America, he was the son of the head of Paramount.” [He was also Jewish] [REED, p. 2]
“The charge of anti-Semitism was laid on the book,” notes the Los Angeles Times, “although Schulberg pointed out that all of Sammy’s victims were Jewish too … These days, Schulberg fears that What Makes Sammy Run? has become what he calls ‘a handbook for yuppies.’ ‘It’s a new handle on Sammy,’ Schulberg says, “Sammy’s credo of success at all costs and it doesn’t matter how you get there makes the book seem not truly merely entertaining but a Bible of sorts.” [CHAMPLIN, p. F1] (Along the same censorial lines, in 1963, Jewish cinema verité documentary filmmaker Albert Maysles’ unforgiving film about Hollywood producer Joe Levine evoked such anger in the Hollywood community that “members of the Oscar screening society reportedly found ‘Showman’ so anti-Semitic that they watched only five minutes before walking out.” [JEW JR LA, 1-16-98, p. 26] (Levine, notes Thomas Hoving, “earned his millions by buying nonentities such as the Italian Hercules films starring Steve Reeves and Godzilla, the Japanese monster movie, and hyping them shamelessly.” [HOV-ING, T., 1993, p. 396]

Jewish singer Eddie Fisher recalls wanting to play the lead acting role in What Makes Sammy Run? “I had several meetings with Lew Wasserman, then the president of MCA,” Fisher says,

“the talent agency that represented me. I wanted to play the lead, an aggressive producer named Sammy Glick, maybe the ultimate Jewish hustler. I knew a lot of real Sammy Glicks and I felt confident that was a character I could play. Wasserman decided Sammy Glick was ‘too Jewish, too negative.’ He hated the concept and did not want the picture made. I think he decided it was bad for the Jews.” [FISHER, E., 1999, p. 90]

Angry reaction by the Jewish community to members of their own depicting such Jewish “success stories” is not uncommon. The (Montreal) Gazette noted Mordechai Richler as one of Canada’s best known writers, but “caustic, controversial, and often crude … [Richler’s novel] Dudley Kravitz remains the best-selling of Richler’s works. A comic extravaganza of a coming-of-age novel, it tells the story of a ‘scheming little bastard,’ a coarse, driven, young Jew determined to make something of himself at any cost. A critical success both in Canada and beyond, the book inspired a raging controversy and denunciation by the Jewish community that Richler [who is Jewish] was an anti-Semite.” NAVES, p. 12

In the movie making world, in 1996 actor Arnold Schwarzenegger learned a bit about Jewish censorial power when he dared to consider to make a film about a real life character, a Nazi captain named Osterman who refused to kill a group of British prisoners during World War II. His interest came in the wake of Jewish director Steven Spielberg’s colossal hit Schindler’s List, where a Nazi saves Jews. Scheduled to begin shooting in ten weeks, the director of Schwarzenegger’s project backed out of the film. “Other directors,” noted the London Sunday Times, “have privately admitted they are avoiding a film that might offend the powerful Jewish lobby in Hollywood … According to Hollywood reports, Joel Schumacher, who is directing the latest Batman film, offered Schwarzenegger a short word of advice about making the film, ‘Don’t.’” [HARLOW]
In 1999, in an overtly censorial and revisionist move, the British ITV television company announced that it was sweetening the unpleasant Jewish “Fagin” character in their new filming of Charles Dickens’ classic novel Oliver Twist. In the new version too, he would not be Jewish. “We don’t want a Fagin that is a Shylock character,” said the ITV Director of Programming, David Liddiment. “This decision,” noted critic Rhoda Koenig, “exemplifies not only a lack of understanding of our literary heritage, but a contempt for the past itself. It is also an example of the sentimentality, arrogance, and cowardice that are now passed off as ‘sensitivity’ and ‘responsibility’ … Why have we become so illiterate, so phony, and so craven?” [KOENIG, 7-7-99, pl. 13] Dr. David Parker, curator of the Dickens House Museum in London, responded, saying: “This softening of Fagin is done to political correctness. Literary stereotypes, however objectionable, should not be lightly cast aside.” [HELLEN, 1-17-99]

In 1997 the mainstream Jewish Thought Police struggled to censor (and failing that, at least marginalize) a book by a Jewish author, Norman Finkelstein. Finkelstein, described in the (Jewish) Forward as “a notorious ideological opponent of the state of Israel,” a man who characterized a more favored – and best-selling – Jewish author as a “Zionist propagandist who distorted evidence in order to legitimate the existence of the state of Israel.” [MAHLER, p. C1] Hearing that Finkelstein’s book, A Nation on Trial, was set to be published by the Henry Holt publishing firm, “the literary editor of the New Republic, Leon Wieseltier, was so startled by the news that he put in a call to Michael Naumann [also Jewish], an old friend and the publisher of Holt, assured that [Naumann] could not be familiar with Mr. Finkelstein’s work.” [MAHLER, p. C1] The Anti-Defamation League was among those who publicly rallied against the publication of the “anti-Zionist and anti-Israel” work. “There seems no question,” noted the Forward, “that the book is something of a hot potato. An esteemed historian who initially agreed to write the prologue to the book, Istvan Deak, a professor of Central European history at Columbia University, suddenly changed his mind.” [MAHLER, p. C1]

In the violent criminal underworld, vengeful censorship actions can be more draconian. Jewish journalist Robert Friedman was forced to go into hiding in 1998 when authorities informed him that Russian Jewish mobster Seimon Mogilevich (described by the Village Voice as “the World’s Most Dangerous Gangster”) was overheard contracting for Friedman’s murder because of the journalist’s expose about him.

Various forms of censorship by the powerful – usually by economic blackmail and intimidation – is not uncommon in the mass media world, creating an environment of people worried about their careers and fear of their bosses, thereby becoming overly protective of Jews/Israel from criticism. Even leaving aside, for example, the issues at stake in the simple fact that the vast Newhouse media empire – like so many others – is Jewish-owned (a subject whose political implications publishers are certainly forbidden to address), any criticism of the Newhouse organization is smothered because of its omnipresent economic clout, media interconnectedness, and long arm of vengeance. Even in the academic world. Take the case of the Columbia Journalism Review and its Jewish editor, Suzanne Levine, who in 1992 wanted to find a writer willing to address the many negative changes affecting the New Yorker magazine after the Newhouses took it over. Thomas Maier notes that:

“Levine went through numerous contacts until she found an out-of-state editor willing to accept the assignment. ‘Why me?’ asked the editor, Eric Utne, who runs his own alternative magazine. ‘You’re the perfect person to do it,’ the Columbia Journalism Review told him. When Utne pressed for the real reason, he was told flatly, ‘Because no one else will touch it.’” [MAIER, p. 347]

In 1998, a small publisher, Seven Stories Press, published an “unauthorized biography” of the Newhouse family. A reviewer in the New York Times Book Review noted that “Citizen Newhouse was initially signed with Viking, but new management there took the unusual step of canceling the book when it was done – a decision itself that was the subject of news articles and gossip columns. [Author] Felsenthal said that once she turned in the manuscript, Phyllis Grann, president of Penguin Putnam, Inc., parent of Viking, told her she couldn’t publish it because too many people mentioned in it were friends.” [GOLDSTEIN, T., p. 17]

And what – away from the mass-produced popular press – of Jewish dominance of the more “high-brow” reading? The most widely-read American “intellectual periodicals,” remarks W. D. Rubenstein, “are either Jewish or contain a disproportionately Jewish input.” [RUBENSTEIN, p. 64] His list is five journals long: Commentary, The Public Interest, the New York Review of Books, the Partisan Review, and the New Republic.

Commentary is a house-organ publication of the American Jewish Committee (Jewish editors Elliot Cohen and then Norman Podhoretz), “Commentary,” wrote Richard Curtiss in 1998, “… has been around so long that probably few Americans even recognize it as the Israel lobby’s principal national publication.” [CURTISS, p. 9] In a 1990s survey of “3,000 prominent Americans” Commentary was ranked third behind the New England Journal of Medicine and Foreign Affairs among “most influential” print and electronic media. It was ahead of the New York Times, Washington Post, and Wall Street Journal. [TWERSKY, p. 40] “Many Commentary authors,” says David Twersky, “have gone on to serve in government as a result, in large measure, of being read by the right people at the right time.” [TWERSKY, p. 41] Such Gentile authors have included Jeanne Kirkpatrick and Daniel Moynihan (Commentary is well known for its “neoconservative” flavor).

“[Editor Norman] Podhoretz’s struggle with his Jewishness,” notes Twersky, “is central to the evolution of Commentary … [It] came to be defined by the desire of Jewish intellectuals to create a space for modernism without discarding their Jewishness.” [TWERSKY, p. 43] Yet, according to editor Murray Polner of a second American Jewish Committee-published journal, Present Tense, (1973-1990), this second publication was founded “because Commentary wasn’t Jewish enough.” [TWERSKY, p. 58] Former non-Jewish journalist Scott McConnell notes the unpleasant experience he had when (years after his employment at Commentary) he bumped into Podhoretz at a dinner party:

“Norman was standing across a round table from me, looking older and frailer (and thus in a way sweeter). When I approached him, hand extended, his distaste in putting forth his own was palpable. ‘I always liked you Scott. But you wrote an anti-Israel piece, and I’m very ideological on that subject’ … To be charged with writing an ‘anti-Israel’ column is no small thing – it has been known to get people fired … The U.S. gains nothing for its own reputation or interests by backing Israeli policies that are unjust to the Palestinians, reviled throughout the Arab world and opposed by most of the world’s governments. In political Washington (as at some Hamptons dinner parties), life may go more smoothly if one doesn’t do or say anything that irritates right-wing Zionists. As my encounter with Norman reminded me, the consequences of speaking out sincerely can be quite unsettling. But it is still the right thing to do.” [MCCONNELL, S., v.14, ISSUE 30]

The “New York Intellectuals [a group of influential social and political critics and theorists, whom Podhoretz calls “The Family”],” says David Twersky, were “a group made up largely (though not exclusively) of Jews … writing in Partisan Review, and later Commentary and Dissent…. [they] helped fashion post-war American attitudes toward literature, culture, art and politics.” [TWERSKY, p. 40] The Jewish author Irving Howe (himself benighted as one of “The Family”) wrote in 1968 that “they have a fondness for ideological speculation; they write literary criticism with a strong social emphasis; they revel in polemic; they strive self-consciously to be ‘brilliant;’ and by birth – or osmosis – they are Jews.” [TWERSKY, p. 40-41]

In a symposium in Commentary magazine in 1966, notes Arnold Eisen, “all the participants except the Reconstructionists and Rabbi Jacob Agus affirmed that Jews were God’s Chosen People, and did so in the traditional terms of revelation, covenant, messiah, and exile, rather than by citing the Jewish contribution to civilization or explaining that, in fact, it was Jews who had chosen God … Significantly, Commentary did not ask respondents whether the Jews were the Chosen People but in what sense they had been chosen.” [EISEN, p. 149]

The second of Rubinstein’s “most widely read” intellectual journals is Public Interest, founded by Jewish conservatives Irving Kristol and Daniel Bell in 1973. The third, The New York Review of Books, wrote Dennis Prager in 1980, “is still edited by Robert B. Silvers and Barbara Epstein … most of its political writers were Jews, and its tone, in the words of Irving Howe … was a ‘snappish crude anti-Americanism.’” Within a decade it was the “most influential magazine” among America’s 275,000 academics. [KOSTELANETZ, p. 69]

Jewish authors William Phillips and Philip Rahv (born Ivan Greenberg) were the founding editors of the reinstitution of the fourth of Rubinstein’s noteworthy magazines, Partisan Review, in 1937. “The main difference between Partisan Review and Commentary,” said Elliot Cohen, Commentary’s first editor, “is that we admit to being a Jewish magazine and they don’t.” [PODHORETZ, p. 99-100] Even today, Partisan Review remains Jewish-dominated. The Editor-in-Chief remains William Phillips, the Editor is Edith Kurzweil, and Number three in the hierarchy is Associate Editor Steve Marcus. Joanna Rose is also Chairman of the Publications and Advisory Board.

Lastly, of Rubinstein’s five seminal “high-brow journals,” The New Republic is still owned and edited by Martin Peretz, “one of the most militant defenders of Israel.” [GOLDBERG, p. 299] Peretz, once a bankroller of the left-wing Ram-parts magazine, was described by a New Republic foreign editor as “a very emotional guy. He has certain passions in life, one of which is Israel. I hate to keep bringing in the Israeli thing, because I consider myself just as pro-Israeli, but it colored his whole view of the world.” [CURTISS, p. 325] (Among other things, Peretz has served on the Board of Directors of Channel 7 TV in Boston. A Jewish friend, Robert Kraft, owner of the largest privately owned packaging company in America, also sat on the Board and was the station’s number two shareholder). [WEINGARTEN, p. 4]

In 1992, a 25-year old Jewish author, Ruth Shalit, “began interning at the New Republic. Practically overnight she became a star—a TNR Associate Editor writing cover stories for the political weekly as well as for the New York Times Sunday Magazine with a $45,000-a-year contract to do pieces for GQ.” [SHEPARD, p. 34] She was also accused, notes the American Journalism Review, of “plagiarism, factual errors” and – in one specific article – racism, when she charged that the Washington Post “had lowered high standards in an attempt to diversify its newsroom and had softened news coverage of black politicians so as not to offend African-American readers.” [SHEPARD, p. 34]

In 1998, a (Jewish) Associate Editor at the New Republic, Stephen Glass, was even fired for fabricating the news stories he authored. Glass, noted the New York Times about the scandal, “had made up part or all of 27 articles he wrote.” [NEW YORK TIMES, 4-18-00, p. C2] (A former editor of the New Republic, Michael Kinsley, also Jewish, today is the editor of Microsoft’s Internet magazine called Slate. Michael Hirshorn edits rival Internet magazine Inside, and Scott Rosenberg is the vice president and “technology editor” of another of the major Internet magazines, Salon.)

Other important intellectual journals over the years with links to the mostly Jewish “intellectual” clique include [d] Dissent, run by Irving Howe, Meyer Schapiro and Michael Walzer; Sol Levitas’ New Leader; the New Criterion (publisher: Samuel Lipman); and the Menorah Journal; a periodical of entirely Jewish content. Hilton Kramer (for nearly twenty years a news editor and art critic for the New York Times) founded and edited the New Criterion; Peter Grose was managing editor of Foreign Affairs. Laurence Goldstein edits the Michigan Quarterly Review. Irving Horowitz founded the social-science periodical Transaction, now called Society, and Transaction Publishers. “Horowitz,” writes fellow Jewish intellectual Nathan Glazer, “once an advocate of the generally undifferentiated poor and powerless and down trodden, has become over time much more concerned with one group in all its specificity: Jews … Horowitz is much concerned with anti-Zionism, which he sees as extending to what he considers anti-Semitism – even in sociology, with the large numbers of Jews working in it.” [GLAZER, Deomp., p. 127]

Theodore Solotaroff was the founding editor of the New American Review, as well as an Associate Editor at Commentary. Daniel Pipes is the founder and editor of Middle East Quarterly. At one point in time, “roughly half of all the articles of the American medical journals were authored by Jews.” [KRAFETZ, p. 176] Daniel Koshland, Jr., a descendant of the Levi-Strauss blue jean dynasty, is the former editor of Science magazine. In 1999, he donated $8 million to an Israeli university. [LUM, R., 11-19-99, p. 1A] And, as one Jewish observer noted in 1968, “For the last ten years 70 percent of the editors of the Yale Law Journal have been Jewish.” [YAFFE, J., 1968, p. 224] Sam Bercholz, also Jewish, even founded Shambhala Books, “the first major publisher of Tibetan Buddhist works in this country.” [KAMENETZ, R., 1994, p. 9]

Billed as a left wing alternative to Commentary, and just as bluntly Jewish in concern, is Tikkun, the brainchild of editor Michael Lerner. In 1997 Lerner – always heralding the beauties of Jewish values and ethics for the problems of modern society – was exposed to be regularly (over a period of years) publishing “letters to the editor” written by himself under fake names. [KATZ, L, p. 3] Lerner is publicly “known as Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton’s favorite philosopher.” [COLLINS, L., 1994, p. 302] In 1997, Danny Goldberg, the CEO of Mercury Records, became the publisher of Tikkun.

“Who, I ask, are the liberals? The Nation Associates Freda Kirchway, Henry Wallace, Clark Eichelberger, Albert Barkley, William O’Dwyer, Ludwig Lewisohn, Abba Hillel Silver, all of whom have intolerantly and ardently supported Zionism? [LILIENTHAL, p. 145]

In 1967, I. F. Stone (Isadore Feinstein) felt it necessary to write: “As a Jew, closely bound emotionally to the birth of Israel, [I feel] honor bound to report the Arab side, especially since the U.S. press is so overwhelmingly pro-Zionist.” [LAGUEVIR/RUBIN, p. 327]

“The leading exemplars of this genre [of radical journalism],” note Stanley Rothman and S. Robert Lichter, “such as the East Village Other, the Los Angeles Free Press, the Berkeley Barb, and Detroit’s the Fifth Estate, as well as ‘alternative’ papers like the Village Voice, the key personnel were invariably of Jewish background.” [ROTHMAN/LICHTER, 1982, p. 107] Today’s versions of this include David Barsamian (founder and director of Alternative Radio), Michael Albert (editor of Z magazine), and Robert Weissman (editor of Multinational Monitor). Abby Goodman has for years been the news director at “progressive” Pacifica station WBAI in New York; she also hosts its national Democracy Now! program.

Mother Jones, the well-known left-wing “social conscience” magazine, was largely founded in 1974 by the philanthropy of Adam Hochschild, heir to a fortune; he thereby became the magazine’s original managing editor, as well as Board Chairman. Judging by his autobiography, Hochschild’s commitment to create Mother Jones in behalf of the socially and politically dispossessed appears to have been, in major part, in atonement for the sins of his father. This man, Harold Hochschild, was the wealthy Jewish co-founder (and chairman) of an international mining syndicate that sent entire communities of Africans into holes in the ground for a miniscule wage, and engendered local wrath for its strip-mining in Appalachia, pollution of Indian fishing areas in British Columbia, and destroying Aboriginal lands in Australia. The younger Hochschild was even embarrassed to discover, while working on a series of exposes about the CIA as a staff member at an earlier left-wing journal, Ramparts, that for a decade his father was Chairman of the Board of the African-American Institute, a front for the CIA. [HOCHSCHILD, 1986, p. 130] Adam Hochschild, noted the San Francisco Examiner in 1998, is “historically [Mother Jones’] largest funder and the wielder of very substantial clout within the foundation [that runs Mother Jones] … Hochschild has placed an unspecified sum in a 13-year account which … provides money year by year in diminishing amounts.” [ARM-STRONG, D., 9-13-98, p. D1] As editor-in-chief Jeffrey Klein resigned in 1998, “creative director” Rhonda Rubenstein designed a new format for the magazine. Today’s editor-in-chief at Mother Jones is Roger Cohn.

Matthew Rothschild edits the left-wing Progressive (for years published by Erwin Knoll). James Weinstein is the founding editor and publisher of another influential leftist journal, In These Times. (Today’s editor: Joel Bleifuss). Naomi Klein is a former editor of a Canadian leftist journal, This. As mentioned earlier, Jews have dominated Nation for decades. Louis Weisberg edits Chicago’s gay newspaper, The Chicago Free Press. And as Stanley Rothman and S. Robert Lichter note about the world of American journalistic communism:

> “From the 1930s through the 1950s, Jews were quite active in the [Communist] party leadership. Almost half the Communist leaders tried for violations of the Smith Act in 1947 were Jewish. In the 1940s, the editor of the Daily Worker, the managing editor, and the labor editor were all of Jewish background. The publicly visible top leadership, however, was non-Jewish.” [ROTHMAN LICHTER, 1982, p. 100]

To the American political right, by 1997 Adam Meyerson edits the Heritage Foundation’s Policy Review and Bill Kristol, also Jewish, former Chief of Staff for former Vice President Dan Quayle, publishes, and edits, the Weekly Standard, a journal he founded with fellow Jew John Podhoretz. Even William F. Buckley’s well-known politically conservative (and supposedly Catholic) magazine, the National Review, founded in 1953, had a strong Jewish foundation. As George Nash notes:

> “The fact remains that a striking number of National Review’s original luminaries were Jews. [Nash cites seven] Indeed, without them the magazine might have never gotten off the ground, for if Buckley was the founding father of the journal, its unlikely godfather was an Austrian Jewish émigré journalist named William S. Schlamm … [And] it was Morrie Ryskind (1895-1985), a prize-winning playwright and Hollywood screenwriter, who organized a series of crucial fund-raising receptions for the project at his home in Beverly Hills. As a result, Buckley achieved more financial success with Ryskind’s California friends than with anyone else except his own father.” [NASH, G., 2000, p. 124]

Other influential Jews associated with the National Review were Eugene Lyons, Frank Meyer, Frank Chodorov, and Ralph Toledano (an editor at Newsweek who was offered the Managing Editor job. He turned it down but later became the National Review’s music editor). Marvin Liebman also “emerged as the outstanding fund-raiser, organizer and coordinator of ‘agitation-propaganda’ for a vast apparatus of conservative causes associated with National Review.” Will Herberg, also Jewish, became the journal’s first religion columnist. [NASH, G., 2000, p. 124-126, 156]

Other prominent politically conservative Jewish journalists these days include Charles Krauthammer, David Brooks, David Frum, John Podhoretz, and Dan Feder. [FRIEDMAN, M., 1999, p. 110] Even the Christian evangelical World newsweekly (which has over 100,000 subscribers, reasonably comparable in size to the “premier magazine for evangelical Christians,” Billy Graham’s Christianity Today, which has a circulation of 150,000) is edited by Marvin Olasky. Olasky is a “Jew turned Marxist turned born-again Christian … [He] oversees the magazine from his custom-built home in the posh hills of Austin, Texas … He declared himself an atheist at 14, and became a committed Marxist at Yale – even joining the Communist Party and touring the Soviet Union.” [PERINA, K., JUNE 2000]

And how about “radical” (i.e., anti-establishment, anti-Hollywood) documentary filmmakers? For two years (Jewish) film critic and historian Alan Rosenthal was “supported” by an Israeli university to do a book about international documentary filmmaking. (In 1980, the book was published by the University of California Press). Although it was not a publicly stated interest of Rosenthal’s, this side too of movie-making has also been largely Jewish. Rosenthal’s list of the most important “radical” filmmakers of the 1960s includes the Maysles brothers, Ricky Leacock, Don Pennebaker, Bill Jersey, Fred Wiseman, and Alan King. For the 1970s, he singles out Barbara Kopple, Jill Godmilow, Julia Reichert and James Klein. [ROSENTHAL, p. 9] Of 14 people cited, at least 8 are Jewish.

Moving back towards mainstream documentary media, Rosenthal elsewhere observes that “one appreciates Barbara Kopple, Julia Reichert, James Klein, and Richard Cohen but it was directors like Al Wasserman and Douglas Leiterman who have helped enlarge the boundaries of broadcast documentary.” [ROSENTHAL, p. 23] Jewish documentary filmmakers or producers afforded chapter-length interviews in his book included Robert Vas, Abe Osheroff, Amalie Rothschild, Richard Cohen, Jerry Blumenthal (with a group), Julia Reichert and James Klein, Morton Silverstein, David Elstein, and Albert Wasserman.

Wasserman, notes Rosenthal, had a career that covers the best years of ‘CBS Reports,’ the CBS ‘Twentieth Century’ series, and NBC’s ‘White Paper’ series, which he helped originate. At present [1980] he works as producer on CBS’s Sixty Minutes.’ [ROSENTHAL, p. 91] “I was at CBS until 1960,” says Wasserman, “Then I went to NBC with Irving Gitlin, who was a very important figure in the evolution of the television documentary.” [ROSENTHAL, p. 93] Another Jewish writer, director, and producer, Fred Freed, merited an entire volume about his contributions to documentary television. [YELLIN 1973]

For all the international muckraking of all these Jewish documentarians, none of them is noted in Rosenthal’s volume to have turned their critical eyes to Israel, from which the volume’s university support stems. And the only one who mentions Jews in any way is Robert Vas, who frames himself in the context of the Holocaust. By 1995, with the mass media increasingly celebrating Jewish themes, the world could look to more overt mass media Judeo-centrism when Stephen Spielberg funded the New York-based “Fund for Jewish Documentaries,” an off-shoot of his National Foundation for Jewish Culture.

Like the film, television, and publishing industries, the musical recording business and general musical world is, and has been, in virtually all its important facets, dominated by Jews.

Classical music? In 1968 Roger Kahn noted that “the four pre-eminent American orchestras are conducted by Jews: Erich Leinsdorf at Boston, George Szell at Cleveland, Eugene Ormandy at Philadelphia and Leonard Bernstein, who is about to retire from the New York Philharmonic. A look at the rosters of these orchestras reveals string sections all but solidly Jewish clear back to the rear desk in the furthest corner of the second violins … [KAHN, p. 6]…. A Jewish armada has conquered musical performance. Jewish names comprise the aristocracy of performers: Heifetz and Horowitz; Elman and Rubinstein; Piatigorsky and Koussevitzky; Bernstein and Stern; Fleisher, Glazer, Gomberg, Graffman, Roisman, Rosen, Schneider … Jews dominate serious musical performance in America.” [KAHN, p. 63-64] Arnold Schoenberg is arguably “this century’s most influential composer.” [HEILBUT, p. 493]” In the 1920s he wrote (a still unpublished) Zionist drama and began with the preparations for his opera Moses and Aron.” [GRUNFELD, F., p. xix] Philip Glass and Steve Reich are well-know composers in the “pushing the boundaries” avant-garde genre. “In the 1920s [Aaron] Copland was a primary influence in American music through the League of Composers.” [PEYSER, J., 1987, p. 33]

Joan Peyser, a biographer of Leonard Bernstein, notes the following about her subject:

“The more one knows about Bernstein, the more complicated the portrait is of him as a Jew. Capable of working productively with anti-Semites, he still holds a soft spot in his heart for fellow Jews, whom he says he finds superior to all others. ‘He is so adamant about music being Jewish,’ [conductor and composer Gunther] Schuller says, ‘It is important to him that a composer is a Jew, that a performer is a Jew. He told me that Triplum, my composition, has a Jewish soul. That is meant as a compliment. I am not a Jew. When Lenny says, ‘You can almost be Jewish,’ that is considered by him to be one of the most supreme of compliments.’” [PEYSER, J., 1987, p. 409]

In southern California, there exists the Los Angeles Jewish Symphony, which “is an established and growing ensemble that aims to fill a cultural niche by exploring new or seldom heard music by or about Jews.” Founder Noreen Green “is most proud of an original oration and concert, ‘Women of Valor,’ sponsored by Hadassah Southern California [the international Jewish women’s Zionist group] which premiered at UCLA.” [SMITH, L., 6-11-2000, p. E1]

Harlan Robinson notes who dominated the musician (especially violinist) realm of the American classical music realm in the 1940s:

“Further down the 1942-43 [Jewish impresario Sol] Hurok list was a recent addition to the stable: violinist Isaac Stern. Though at the time a newcomer, he, too, would eventually turn into a steady source of income. Stern would also become one of his manager’s [Hurok] most trusted advisers and the patriarch of a group of Jewish musicians (especially violinists) whose imposing artistic and booking influence would come to earn them the ironic nickname the ‘Kosher Nostra … [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 287] … [Itzhak] Perlman turned into a very popular and profitable addition to his list. So did another Stern recommendation, Pinchas Zuckerman. Together, they became the backbone of the Manhattan-based Jewish musical clique jokingly labeled the ‘Kosher Nosta.’” [ROBINSON, H. 1994, p. 427]

Famed pianist Arthur Rubinstein was an ardent devotee of Israel:

“Another matter that frequently enraged Rubinstein was the world’s attitude – or his interpretation of it – toward Israel. In his last years, he was not merely benevolent toward Israel: he was a right-winger, certain that Israel could do no wrong. The territories that Israel had occupied in 1967 were Israel’s by right, he believed, and he said that the Palestinians were nomads in whom Lawrence of Arabia had unfortunately implanted the notion of being a people – after which they had done nothing but procreate ... Since the Soviet Union had become the major supporter of Israel’s opponents, Rubinstein even suggested that the United States bomb the Kremlin.” [SACHS, H., 1995, p. 393]

Rubinstein once donated $100,000 to Israel’s Weizman Institute, he gave $50,000 to the Israel-American Cultural Foundation “in honor of Isaac Stern, on the violinist’s sixtieth birthday,” and he left $500,000 in his will to the city of Jerusalem. [SACHS, D., 1995, p. 394]

In 2000, famous Jewish opera singer Beverly Sills (also chairwoman of New York City’s Lincoln Center performing arts center) was in Seattle to speak to the northwestern chapter of Hadassah. This was special news, noted the local newspaper, because Sills “limits appearances to a dozen a year, often speaking to members of Hadassah, a Jewish women’s organization. She says, ‘They’re people trying to make the world a better place.’” [GODDEN, J., 5-2000, p. B1]

In 1933, a researcher discovered consistent Jewish overrepresentation in the classical music world, including “51% of the first violins of twelve orchestras,” 23.8% of the works “performed by symphony orchestras,” and so forth. Why was this so? Comparing Jewish and non-Jewish children, Kenneth Sward found no intelligence differences, but speculated that “the Jewish child may be a superior all-around organism by ‘nature.’” [WEYL, N., 1968, p. 188]
Singer Jan Peerce (born Jacob Pincus Perelmuth) from the late 1930s to early 1950s “was a regular on the most popular classical music [radio] broadcast in American history ... In a story worthy of Hollywood, he was finally noticed [i.e., ‘discovered’] by showman Samuel L. ‘Roxy’ Rothafel while performing as a singing violinist.” [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 253-254] (Peerce “was so deeply religious that he had even disowned his son Larry, a film director, for marrying a gentile woman with two children). [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 459]

Jewish influence in more popular music has been profound. During the rise of rock and roll, notes Jory Farr, “in many ways, the pop business was run as the film business in its heyday. It was a club, mostly Jewish, filled with wily impresarios, maverick street fighters, and out-and-out operators.” [FARR, p. 126] In earlier years, the musical agent – and later executive – John Hammond, notes Frederic Dannen, “was the ultimate WASP in a preponderantly Jewish profession.” [DANNEN, p. 62] A network of Jewish executives, agents, managers, and other entrepreneurs have reigned supreme in the musical network for decades. (“One writer in 1927,” note Claire Pagackowska and Barry Curtis, “referred to jazz as reaching ‘from the black South to the black North, but in between it had been touched by the commercial wand of the Jew.’”) [PAGACKOWSKA, p. 242]

“Both as a business and as an expression of talent and creative artistry, American popular music was in large part shaped and formed by Jews, many of them immigrant newcomers to the American scene ... Virtually all the great names that come to mind when one considers popular music – Rogers and Hammerstein, Irving Berlin, Lorenz Hart, Jerome Kern, George and Ida Gershwin, Irving Caesar, and Charles Harris, for instance, are Jewish names. Jews wrote the songs, Jews sang the songs, and Jews made sure that the songs were circulated to every corner of the country, for they founded and built America’s publishing industry. Among the vanguard publishers were M. Witmark, Charles K. Harris, Joseph Stern, Shapiro and Bernstein, Harry von Tilzer, Leo Feist, T. B. Harms, and Irving Berlin [born Israel Baline]. Collectively their publishing firms came to be known as ‘Tin Pan Alley’ ... It was the Tin Pan Alley ethos, combining the commercial with the aesthetic, that gave our popular music its distinctive character.” [KANTER, p. ix]

The Jewish Tin Pan Alley monopoly of the music business was solid for decades. As H. F. Mooney notes:

“By 1941, the virtual monopoly of the ASCAP (American Society of Composers Authors, and Publishers, organized in 1914), which had practically protected New York’s ascendancy in the music market, was broken by legal judgment. The consequent opening of broadcasting and recording channels to non-ASCAP composers and publishers, many of them unknowns outside the conventional musical establishment of Tin Pan Alley ... marked the end of an era of increasingly urbane New York composers. These had been heavily Jewish ... Such New York Jews as Harold Arlen, George and Ira Gershwin, Jerome Kern, Vernon Duke (né Dukelsky), Herman Hupfeld and Vincent Youmans had produced a pensive music of finesse and polish, often using minor strains in the cantorial tradition. Their melodic concepts influenced ‘white’ jazz instrumentalists – themselves frequently Jewish – flowing with increasing facility through plaintive but delicately restrained saxophones from Benny Kreuger in the early 1920s through Frank Trumbauer to Stan Getz; and through the arabesque clarinets of Benny Goodman and Artie Shaw.” [MOONEY, H. F., 1972, p p. 258-259]

(Per current Jazz, in 1998 the Cleveland Jewish News announced that “the world’s No. 1 jazz group [is] Spyro Gyra. Meet the man who started it all – Jay Beckenstein. The world-renowned musician and music producer and his jazz crew (Bekenstein and two other members are Jewish) have been legends since 1970.”) [ALPEN, J., 5-1-1998, p. 46]

Jewish domination of the music world did not, of course, end with the demise of Tin Pan Alley. As we shall soon see, Jewish influence merely broadened.

Tin Pan Alley (a term invented by song writer/journalist Monroe Rosenfeld) [SHAW, A., 1982, p. 386] Jews were also instrumental in maintaining popular negative views about themselves. “The image of the Jews in the songs of the day,” says Kanter, “was not terribly flattering. Jews were presented as money-grubbing, hand-rubbing old men who wore crepe hair and ran pawn shops. The Jews of Tin Pan Alley helped perpetuate this stereotype.” [KANTER, p. 57]

The Jews who dominated Tin Pan Alley and the turn-of-the-century vaudeville world were also central in the popularization and propagation of profoundly demeaning African-American stereotypes. Pamela Brown Lavitt notes Tin Pan Alley and the many onstage Jewish “coon callers”:

“Jewish women vaudevillians at the turn of the century popularized what is now a little-discussed and misunderstood performance venue, known as “coon shouting” … Trying to break into the entertainment business, [‘Tin Pan Alley entrepreneurs’] aesthetics were circumscribed in a vehemently antiblack and xenophobic milieu. By the mid-1880-s they had formed a tight-knit Tin Pan Alley industry that came to dominate vaudeville and early black musicals … Intended as comedy, coon song ranged from jocular and dismissive to cruel and sadistic … Coon song sheet music and illustrated covers proliferated defamatory images of blacks in barely coded slanderous lyrics. For example, the ‘N’ word and associated inferences were dispatched in words like ‘mammy,’ ‘honey boy,’ ‘pickininniy,’ ‘chocolate,’ ‘watermelon,’ ‘possum,’ and the most prevalent ‘coon.’” [LAVITT, P., 2000, p. 253-258]

Especially well known Jewish “coon callers” included Sophie Tucker, Stella Mayhew, Fanny Brice, Anna Held, Eddie Cantor, and Al Jolson.

Jews have long gravitated to an entrepreneurial exploitation of the Black cultural scene and jazz music. As Burton Peretti notes:

“Aside from the hazards of the mob [organized crime] environment, the exploitation faced by jazz players was rather typical for this era [1930s and 1940s]. Jazz, like minstrels and ragtime before it, came under the control of professional promoters who sought to make music profitable. [They adapted] the technique of advertising, song plugging, and vaudeville … Some promoters, like Joe Glaser (who managed Louis Armstrong in the thirties) were associates of organized crime who left the underworld when prohibition was repealed. Glaser apparently had overseen Al Capone’s profits from the Sunset Cafe and a prostitution ring before he became Armstrong’s manager in 1935. Many more promoters, however, were veterans of Tin Pan Alley, Manhattan’s song-publishing industry, including Irving Mills, a former singer and songwriter who managed Duke Ellington’s and other black bands in the thirties.” [PERETTI, p. 147]

Glaser ran the Associated Booking Corporation, often “the exclusive agent for many of the top Black performers. He became a close associate of many of the top underworld figures in Chicago and New York, whom he met through his band-booking agency.” [MOLDEA, p. 14] Glaser had been an early partner in the company with eventual MCA chief Jules Stein. In 1962, mob-linked attorney Sidney Korshak, also Jewish, gained control of the ABC company. [MC-DOUGAL, p. 141]

Mills and Paddy Harmon, owner of Chicago’s Dreamland Cafe, “sought and gained spurious renown, as Mills took partial credit for many Ellington compositions and Harmon patented and gave his name to a trumpet mute that had long been popular among Joe Oliver and other black players.” [PERETTI, p. 148] The rip-off of Black artists was a norm for the era. As Al Silverman notes in the case of Fats Waller:

“In his time Fats wrote the melodies to over 360 songs. Not that many bear his name today, unfortunately, because when money was needed he’d write the music and sell all rights to unscrupulous Tin Pan Alley characters.” [SILVERMAN, p. 129-130]

“That practice of show business share-cropping … in the 1920s and 1930s,” notes the director of Harlem’s Apollo Amateur Night, Ralph Cooper, “existed right on through the fifties and sixties. Its bitterness still exists among many performers to this day – a bitterness from the theft of their songs, their sound, their talent.” [COOPER, p. 199] Jewish singers “Sophie Tucker, Eddie Cantor and Al Jolson,” notes Donald Fischer, “performed in blackface at the beginning of their careers, singing black songs. They later built on their successes in this medium to develop national statures and professional successes with other music. However, their early songs were for the most part borrowed or plagiarized from African-American sources, with little or no public recognition – or monetary reward – for the creative talents that produced them.” [FISCHER, D., 6-30-2000, p. 21A]

Jews were also prominent in the overseeing of the Black community’s jazz life, including the control of musical clubs in Black neighborhoods in a variety of American cities. “The invasion of the Black community by organized crime lords with connections to downtown money,” notes Ted Vincent, “was certainly the most sensational contribution to the loss of Black oversight of neighborhood dance halls and theatres.” [VINCENT, p. 176] “Slumming resorts” served a largely non-Black audience and “were noted for their riverboat decor, fake magnolia plants, and nearly nude dancers … Perhaps the nationwide pioneer in the resorts was Isadore Shor’s Entertainment Cafe.” [VINCENT, p. 78] In Harlem, such clubs included Connie’s Inn (owned by Connie Innerman) and the famed Apollo Theatre. “From the opening of the [Apollo] building in 1912 until 1934,” notes Vincent, “the theatre was a showcase for white [i.e., largely Jewish] vaudeville burlesque shows, with white strippers coming to be the main attraction.” [VINCENT, p. 189] The Apollo was eventually sold by “Burlesque Kings Hurtig and Seaman” to Sid Cohen and Morris Sussman, and then to Frank Schiffman and Leo Brecher. Brecher also owned the Douglas, the Roosevelt, the Lafayette Theatre (“the prime showcase for black talent in America”) [COOPER, p. 44], and the Harlem Opera House located a block from the Apollo. [VINCENT, p. 189-192] Jay Fagan, and Moses and Charles Gale (Galewski), founded the popular Savoy Ballroom in 1926.

“Schiffman was a controversial figure in black entertainment. Admired and respected by some, scorned and excoriated by others, he was rarely viewed neutrally. His Machiavellian approach to business is a matter of record, and most would admit that he was an unrepentant shark in business matters. He quickly eliminated his competitors and for decades eradicated all serious competition, which earned him the grudging esteem of other showmen. Among performers, however, the estimate was not glowing. Of his knowledge of black acts, John Bubbles [an African-American performer of the era] said, ‘Only thing he knew was how to get people cheap as he could, and work them as long as he could.’ And John Hammond, a record producer and friend, flatly declared ‘Frank had no artistic taste at all.’” [WATKINS, M., 1994, p. 386]

Samuel Charters and Leonard Kunstad note the situation of another famous nightclub:

“The Cotton Club had opened at 142nd St. and Lexington Ave. in 1922 with a strict policy of white only. The owner, Bernard Levy, had pressed his policy, despite loud protests from the Harlem community. He used Negro orchestras and a Negro revue and ran it as a tourist attraction for society people who wanted to see a little of ‘Harlem life’ … The club was forced to admit colored patrons during the next winter, but the prices he kept high and it remained predominantly a tourist attraction until the Depression.” [CHARTERS, p. 217]

New York’s Latin Quarter club (with eventual branches in other cities) was also owned by a Jew, Lou Walters, father of famous newscaster Barbara Walters; Monte Kay was the founder of the famous Birdland jazz club. He too was Jewish. Mobster Morris Levy later controlled the place. The Panama was one of the top two cabarets in Chicago. It was owned by Isadore Levine. [BRICKTOP, 1983, p. 53] Bricktop, a famous international African-American nightclub manager from the 1920s-1950s, wrote about her time spent in Mexico:

“The most prominent of the wheeler-dealers in Mexico City’s American colony was a strange, tiny little man called Blumey. He was A. C. Blumenthal, a financier who had his fingers in many pies. He was once married to Peggy Fears, a Ziegfeld showgirl. Blumey went to Mexico City to dodge Uncle Sam’s tax collectors, and he was just one of many rich Americans who had gone to Mexico City for that reason. The others lived quietly and inconspicuously, but Blumey loved the limelight ... He had a stable of tall, beautiful girls who towered over him, and he could be found holding court every day in the Reforma Hotel, where he was the manager.” [BRICKTOP, 1983, p. 223]

As Israeli scholar Robert Rockaway notes about a common undercurrent in such night life:

Upset with outsider exploitation and degradation of the Black community (where many night clubs were located), there was an effort by the Marcus Garvey African-American movement as early as the 1920s to institute Black-owned Liberty Halls “where the musical offerings would be part of an overall effort at community uplift and not just a profit-oriented business.” [VINCENT, p. 114]

(From France, even the international jet-set luxury playground/resort of “Club Med” was founded by Gerard Blitz, and built to power by Gilbert Trigano. Both are also Jewish. By 1999 the firm had 116 sites in 36 countries, now headed by Gilbert’s son Serge. [REGULY, E., 4-25-88, pl. 24; MCDONELL, E., 5-1-99, p. D10] Hollywood’s Roxy nightclub was founded by the Jewish managerial trio of David Geffen, Loud Adler, and Bill Graham. [KING, T., 2000, p. 187]

Jews have of course been prominent over the years as musical performers. These included three of the most influential band leaders of the 1930s – Benny Goodman (“the King of Swing”), Harry James, and Artie Shaw (Arthur Arshansky). More recent popular names include Leonard Bernstein, Andre Previn, Arthur Fiedler, Stephen Sondheim, and many others. As noted earlier too, by the 1930s MCA (Music Corporation of America) was a powerful talent agency, founded by Jules Stein and built later to power by Sidney Sheinbein and Lew Wasserman, who ultimately became one of the most powerful men in Hollywood. Ronald Brownstein observes that:
“By the mid-1930s, MCA controlled many of the country’s most popular bands, from Tommy Dorsey to Artie Shaw.” [BROWNSTEIN, p. 181]

For years, MCA’s Jules Stein, adds Michale Pye, “ran the music business so toughly that no dance hall would stand against him.” [PYE, p. 18-19] In a 1946 antitrust trial that MCA lost, a Los Angeles federal judge “declared that MCA held a virtual monopoly over the entertainment business.” The presiding judge also stated that MCA was “the Octopus … with tentacles reaching out into all phases and grasping everything in show business.” [MOLDEA, p. 2, 3] “The one man,” notes non-Jewish band leader Guy Lombardo, “who probably more than any other solidified the business and hastened the era of the Big Bands was Jules Stein. He had started his Music Corporation of America in Chicago and to that city gravitated bands from all over the country, seeking the buildup and engagements they would get if MCA took them in the fold.” Lombardo was also under contract to Stein. [LOMBARDO, G., 1975, p. 153] Stein even wrote an introduction to Lombardo’s autobiography.

For years MCA increasingly interfaced with Chicago’s Mafia and other underworld personalities. Seemingly omnipresent in Hollywood was lawyer Sidney Korshak. “A close friend of Stein’s and Wasserman’s,” says Dan Moldea, “Korshak quickly became one of the most powerful influences in the entertainment industry and in California politics … [MOLDEA, p. 5] … Korshak … has been described by federal investigators as the principle link between the [Hollywood] legitimate business world and organized crime.” [MOLDEA, p. 2]

And rock and roll? The Jewish foundation continued. “The most famous and important [rhythm and blues disc jockey],” note Steve Chapple and Reebee Garofalo, “was … Alan Freed, the father of Rock ‘n’ Roll … Freed was credited with co-writing fifteen rock and rock hits including Chuck Berry’s ‘Maybelline,’ but he did little more than promote any of them.” [CHAPPLE, p. 56-57] A biography of Freed notes that “by 1956, there was no bigger name in rock and roll than Freed, except Elvis Presley.” [JACKSON, p. ix] (Another of America’s best known early disc jockeys was also Jewish, Murray the K, aka Murray Kaufman). In 1960, Freed was indicted for accepting $30,000 in bribes to play songs at his radio station. “[Freed] grabbed the kids and led them to the great rock candy mountain,” says Albert Goldman, “He named their music, coined its us-against-them rhetoric, created rock show biz, including the package tour … Alan Freed is really one of the principal exhibits in the Rock ‘n’ Roll Hall of Ill Fame … [He] was not only a crook but a self-righteous hypocrite. Even [Freed’s manager] Morris Levy [with deep ties to the criminal underworld, particular the Mafioso Gigante family] had to concede that the ‘Father of Rock ‘n’ Roll’ was not a nice man. Speaking as one Jew to another Jew about a third Jew, Levy said simply: ‘He could have been another Hitler.’” [GOLDMAN, p. 519-520]

In a book about the Atlantic Records empire (later swallowed by Warners), Dorothy Wade and Justine Picardie noted Morris Levy and the kinds of people that populated the rock and roll industry: “The truth is, with or without mob connections, Morris Levy was much more typical of the new music moguls than either [non-Jewish] Ahmet Ertegun or [Jewish] Jerry Wexler … The world in which Atlantic had to survive was populated largely by hoodlums and hustlers.” [WADE, p. 57] As Syd Nathan, the owner of King Records, once said, “You want to be in the record business? The first thing you learn is that everyone is a liar.” [WADE, p. 60] “The early rhythm and blues companies were run by a fraternity of Jews … They were tough and they were shrewd – some say unscrupulous – and they were alternately loved, despised, respected, and feared. The deep bond of these cultural outsiders prompted one gentle, mild rebuke in his voice, to comment that ‘Yiddish was the second language of the record business.” [COHODAS, N., p. 3-4, 2000]

“To the general public,” notes Steve Chapple and Reebee Garofalo, “the music business seems to have a tremendous amount of corruption.” [CHAPPLE, p. 226] “I think in Hollywood,” media psychologist Stuart Fischel of California State University at Los Angeles told the Los Angeles Times in 1993, “people get into a kind of mind meld. You can come in as a relatively moral and ethical person, but eventually [Hollywood] produces a re-socializing of a subculture with different norms and ethics based on hedonism and materialism. It’s hard to know what’s going to breach the bounds of acceptable criminality in Hollywood.” [ELLER, p. B8, B11] Aside from drugs, prostitution, and all the other extracurricular norms of the interrelated music, film, and television worlds of Hollywood, just at the most basic business level, “payola [bribery] has been a key factor in the establishment of major artists,” says Roger Karshner, “the evolution of publishing dynasties and the creation of recording empires. Payola, layola, and taking care of business are the ABC’s of the music industry past and present. It has taken many forms, and many publishers, artists, managers, and record people at all levels have participated in payola practices.” [KARSHNER, p. 39]

Probably the most important early rhythm and blues recording company was Chess Records, founded by Leonard and Phillip Chess, Jewish immigrants from Poland. They started out with a scrap metal business in the ghetto, then moved into the liquor business, eventually owning several bars in the Black neighborhoods of South Chicago, including the large Macamba Club, which was “reputedly a prime center for prostitution and heavy drug dealing.” [DIXON, p. 78] The Chess brothers soon recognized a profitable opportunity open to them with the many Black musical acts that played at their nightclubs; the entrepreneurs soon embarked upon a recording business, eventually producing blues, gospel, and rock and roll music. Seminal Black artists who signed on to the Chess label included Bo Diddley, Howlin’ Wolf, Muddy Waters, John Lee Hooker, Etta James, Chuck Berry, and many others. Berry’s songs were among the most influential in rock and roll history. “Some people have called Leonard and Phillip Chess visionaries who recognized the potential in the visceral blues of post-World War II Chicago,” says Don Snowden, who co-wrote the auto-biography of bluesman Willie Dixon, “A far greater number have branded the Chess brothers as exploiters who systematically took advantage of the artists who created that music.” [DIXON, p. 78] The Rolling Stones even found seminal bluesman Muddy Waters still painting the Chess’s home when they came to record in Chicago. [WADE, p. 71]
Frank Schiffman, owner of a number of musical venues in New York’s Harlem area, “was a ruthless competitor who would do anything, including take advantage of his black employees and exploit the great black artists who worked for him, in order to increase his profits and beat down the opposition.” [COOPER, p. 44] “Remember [Black singer] Little Eva Boyd?” asks Ralph Cooper, “She worked as a babysitter for two Tin Pan Alley [Jewish] rock and roll writers, Carole King and Gerry Goffen. They wrote a song called ‘Loco-Motion’ and they asked her to sing it … Now [1990] she lives in North Carolina, where her people are from. She’s a working mother on welfare. She works in a barbecue kitchen as a cook.” [COOPER, p. 196]

In 1997, Black singer Darlene Love won a lawsuit for back royalties against famous Jewish musical producer Phil Spector. (Originally awarded $263,000, it was later dropped down to $130,000.) Love was the anonymous lead singer on a number of 1960s-era Spector productions, including He’s a Rebel, Da Do Ron Ron, He’s Sure the Boy I Love, and other hits. In the early 1980s Ms. Love found herself cleaning toilets for a living, but her singing career later flourished anew. [WILLMAN, C., 10-15-88, CALENDAR, p. 10; WARRICK, P., 11-2-98]

“I didn’t know anything about the record business,” said early rock and roll sensation Little Richard (of “Tutti Frutti” fame) about his rock and roll career. “I was very dumb … I was just like a sheep among a bunch of wolves that would devour me at any moment. I think I was taken advantage of because I was uneducated. I think I was treated inhumane … I think I was treated wrong and many people got rich out of the style of music I created. They are all millionaires, writ many times, and nobody offered me nothing.” [WADE, p. 74] Dorothy Wade and Justine Picardie note Little Richard’s lamentation, then add: “To which many, if not most, of his black musical contemporaries would add: Amen.” [WADE, p. 74] Among others, Richard had in mind the Jewish owner of Specialty Records, Art Rupe, who many years ago bought the rights to his songs for a paltry $10,000.

Chuck Berry remembers being cheated by the Chess brothers:

“[Phil Chess finally acknowledged] in writing that no songwriter royalties had been paid for three years on my Chess Records product … [And in a review of Chess documents] I was surprised to learn that I had been paid the same songwriter royalties for an LP as I was receiving for a single record. Chess claimed to be unaware of this ‘mistake,’ as if they had never noticed that LPs had between eight and ten songs on them.” [BERRY, C., p. 246-247]

“In 1974 Howlin’ Wolf filed a lawsuit against Arc Music [the publishing wing of Chess Records, it was co-owned by the Chess brothers and two brothers of Jewish band leader Benny Goodman] [COHODAS, N., 2000, p. 37] asking for $2.5 million for unpaid royalties from his songs … In 1976 Muddy Waters and Willie Dixon filed identical lawsuits against the publishing company, alleging fraud and conspiracy and asking to paid money damages and to have their publishing contracts voided.” [COHODAS, N., 2000, p. 308]
In 1972, Martin Otelsberg became the manager of African-American musician Bo Diddley. Suspecting in later years that he had been swindled, Diddley filed suit against Otelsberg’s estate in 1994 and recovered $400,000. As Diddley’s lawyer (also Jewish) John Rosenberg noted, “This is a typical story that’s happened time and again to musicians like Bo.” [MORSE, S., 6-18-94, p. 28] Diddley complained of being cheated by the Chess brothers as well. “To me every nationality has a reason for bein’ here,” said Diddley, “an’ mostly all the Jewish people own everything. They got all the money. Give him a thousand dollars, he’ll turn it into ten million. How the heck they do it, I don’t know.” [COHODAS, N., 2000, p. 110]

The Jewish community, of course, isn’t comfortable with this history. As Jewish author Neal Karlen describes one African-American depiction of the Jewish music hustler: “In the 1990 film Mo’ Better Blues, Spike Lee crafted an artful if blazingly anti-Semitic portrait of the fictional Moe Flatbush, an avaricious Jewish club owner intent on swindling black jazzmen. The ferretlike, Yiddish-spouting Moe, played by John Turturro, was seemingly lifted straight from the pages of the anti-Semitic screed The Protocols of Zion.” [KARLEN, N., 1994, p. 145]

The Jewish agent-producer exploitation of Black recording artists in the early rhythm and blues era of the 1940s and 1950s (and later) was predominant and widespread, entrenching a Black hostility among many to their Jewish financial controllers to the present day. The following Jewish entrepreneurs were among those who founded record labels featuring mainly Black talent: Herman Lubinsky (Savoy Records); the Braun family (Deluxe Records); Hy Siegal, Sam Schneider and Ike Berman (Apollo Records); Saul, Joe, and Jules Bihari (Modern Records); Art Rupe (Specialty Records—its biggest hits were those of Little Richard); Lev, Edward, and Ida Messner (Philo/Aladdin Records); Al Silver and Fred Mendelsohn (Herald/Ember Records); Paul and Lilian Rainer (Black and White Records); Sam and Hy Weiss (Old Towne Records); Sol Rabinowitz (Baton Records—Rabinowitz eventually became vice president of CBS International); and Danny Kessler (head of OKeh Records, a “cheap” branch of Columbia Records). Sydney Nathan controlled both the King and Federal record labels and Florence Greenberg owned the Mafia-influenced Scepter Records (featuring the Shirelles and Dionne Warwick).

“Those illiterates,” Hy Weiss of Olde Towne once said about his recording artists, “they would have ended up eating from pails in Delancey Street if it weren’t for us.” [WADE, p. 70] “The record producers were white,” says Nadine Cohodas in her book about the Chess brothers, “their talent for the most part black, many from impoverished backgrounds and few with much formal education, living in a society that regarded them as second-class citizens. The deals between the two parties were not the negotiations of peers. The relationship could be paternalistic, even condescending. At Chess it sometimes looked as though Leonard and Phil gave their musicians an allowance rather than a salary.” [COHODAS, N., 2000, p. 4] The history of rock and roll is, of course,” notes Rich Cohen, “riddled with pioneering white record men who built careers recording, and sometimes, exploiting black artists: Morris Levy, that burly, cigar-smoking product of the Brill Building, allegedly stealing writing credits from Frankie Lyman; Herman Lubinsky, the founder of Savoy Records in Newark, New Jersey, throwing around nickels as if they were manhole covers.” [COHEN, R., 6-21-01]

In Philadelphia, in 1984 lawsuits were swirling around WMOT, a company that “developed a reputation as an aggressive independent record producer specializing in the ‘Philly sound.’” Formerly owned by Steve Bernstein, Alan Rubens, and David Chacker, it was acquired by Michael Goldberg, Allen Cohen, and Jeff and Mark Salvarian. Lawsuits even named Israel’s Bank Leumi among defendants in a scheme to use the record company to launder drug money. The central player in this accusation was Larry Lavin, who was indicted as the “kingpin of a 13-member [drug] ring that allegedly sold $5 million of cocaine a month.” [DAUGHEN, 1984]

By 1978 president Oscar Cohen of the Associate Booking Corporation presided over “the country’s biggest black talent booking agency.” [SHAW, A, p. 419, p. 133] Recurrent, “mobbed-up” Morris Levy even eventually owned Birdland in its heyday, the famous jazz club. [WEXLER, p. 130] Levy also controlled the Roulette Record label. Nat “the Rat” Tarnopol headed the Brunswick label (Jackie Wilson was one of its most prominent African-American stars). Tarnopol was indicted twice in the 1970s “for using payola, drugola, and strong-arm goons to get radio airplay for Brunswick recording artists.” [MC-DOUGAL, p. 366]

An early and important supporter of disc jockey Alan Freed and his own empire was Leo Mintz, who owned a large record store near Cleveland’s Black ghetto. Even earlier, Eli Oberstein founded Varsity records in the 1930s, Joe Davis launched Beach records in 1942, and “Jake Friedman had Southland, one of the biggest distributing outfits in the South.” [SHAW, A., Honkers, p. 236]

“The whole history of rock ‘n’ roll,” noted the London Guardian in a review of Jewish author Michael Billig’s book about the subject, “has been portrayed as white artists ‘ripping off’ black music. Only now [with Billig’s volume] has the major Jewish contribution been acknowledged.” [ARNOT, C., 10-4-2000, p. 6] Atlanta-based Mark Shimmel, for instance, is the CEO of LaFace Records, which headlines TLC, Usher, Tonik Braxton, GoodiMob, “and a raft of hot hip-hop artists … He built his own company, managing talents as varied as John Denver and Broadway composer Frank Wildhorn … He doesn’t worry much about what he calls ‘the white guy in the black music business.’” He has also worked with Huey Lewis, Harry Belafonte, Ray Charles, and former Eagle Don Henley. [POLLAK, S., 1-7-00]

Looking to the Hispanic record market, George Goldner founded the Tico, Rama, and Vee record companies; he also owned a number of Latino-oriented dance halls. Goldner later founded the Mafia-influenced Red Bird label. (Goldner once hired a team of whores to service a deejay convention. He “had the girls arrive a day early, to sit down and go over his new releases with them. The idea was for the girls to whisper the names of those records in the jock’s ear while they were making love.” [ELIOT, M., p. 49] By the 1970s, Joseph, Stanley, and Kenneth Cayre (of New York’s Jewish Sephardic community) owned the Salsoul record label. It was worth $49 million in sales and held a 70% share of the Latino record market. [UPBIN, 11-10-99]

In the folk music genre, Albert Grossman managed the career of Peter Paul and Mary. “This established his reputation as a star maker,” notes Anthony Scaduto, “as some kind of genius manager, even as he was being criticized for commercializing folk and for being an excessively sharp operator.” [SCADUTO, p. 106] Israel Young ran the Folklore Center in New York’s Greenwich Village in the 1960s. Fred Weintraub owned the well-known Bitter End nightclub. Manny Roth ran Cafe Wha? Among the prominent Jewish folksingers of the era were Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, Jack Elliott, Peter Yarrow (of Peter, Paul, and Mary), David Blue (Cohen), and two (Fred Hellerman and Ronnie Gilbert) of the four Weavers. Ballad singer Leonard Cohen had a grandfather who was the first president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Moe Asch (whose father, Sholem, was “the most widely read Yiddish writer of the twentieth century”) [GOLDSMITH, P., p. 1] headed Folkway Records, the label that released recordings by Woody Guthrie, Pete Seeger (manager: Harold Levanthal), Doc Watson, Black blues artist Leadbelly, Josh White, Black poet Langston Hughes, and ethnic performers from around the world. (Woody Guthrie’s wife, Marjorie Gleenblatt Mazia, was Jewish, and their child, Cathy Ann, was “raised as a Jew.” [POLLAK, O, p. 12]) Guthrie even lived with Marjorie in a Jewish neighborhood in Coney Island.

Asch got into the recording business with a connection to David Sarnoff, the eventual head of NBC-RCA. [GOLDSMITH, P., p. 60] A later version of Folkways was Verve/Folkways, which featured Tim Hardin, Richard Havens, and Jewish artists Laura Nyro and Janis Ian. (Nyro’s original name was Nigro, and her name was changed for fear that people might call her “Negro.”) [KING, T., 2000, p. 73] Another Jewish entrepreneur, Maynard Solomon, headed another prominent folk-oriented record label, Vanguard, which featured Joan Baez, Buffy St. Marie, Eric Anderson, among others. Another folk label in Chicago, Flying Fish, was founded by Bruce Kaplan.

Jewish popular musical performers are many and varied, including the Beastie Boys (“widely castigated for glorifying sex and violence”) [ANDERSON, 1991, p. 173], Bette Midler, Billy Joel, Barry Manilow, Randy Newman, Carly Simon (one of the heirs to the Simon-Schuster publishing house fortune), Helen Reddy, Lesley Gore, David Lee Roth of Van Halen, Lou (“Take a Walk on the Wild Side”) Reed, [BELL, I., 6-1-93, p. 12] and Mountain’s Leslie [Weinstein] West. Donald Fagen co-founded Steely Dan. Marty Friedman of Megadeth is Jewish, as is Peter Green of Fleetwood Mac, Marty Balin of Jefferson Airplane, Marc Knopfler of Dire Straits, Paul Stanley (Stanley Eisen) and Gene Simmons (born Chaim Whitz in Haifa, Israel) of Kiss, Perry Farrel (Perry Bernstein; son of a diamond dealer) of Jane’s Addiction, Kevin Dubrow (lead singer of Quiet Riot), Slash of Guns ’n Roses, Geddy Lee (of Rush – born Gar Lee Weinrib), Eric Bloom (lead singer of Blue Oyster Cult), Robbie Robertson, Warren Zevon, Jeff Beck, Mick Jones (of the Clash), Gavin Rossdale (head of Bush), Jay (Blatt) and the Americans, Marc Bolan of T-Rex, Manfred Mann (Lubowitz), Norman Greenbaum, Phranc (a Jewish lesbian folksinger), and Howard Kaylan and Mark Volman of the Turtles. And on and on. Jewish interest in the subject notes that ukelele-rooted Tiny Tim’s mother was Jewish, Donovan’s mother was Jewish, Cyndi Lauper’s father is Jewish, Country Joe MacDonald’s mother is Jewish, Twisted Sister’s Dee Snider’s father was Jewish and on and on. [JEWWHO, 2000; BOUCHER, G., 4-17-01, p. 62; TAYLOR, L., 12-27-00, p. F5] Even the 1998 “Eurovision Song Contest winner” – featuring an event watched by 100 million people in 33 countries – was Israeli transsexual Dana International, born Yaran Cohen.

Not Jewish? Want to make it in the music business? Enhance your chances by learning Yiddish:

> “Even gentiles learned to salt their language with pinches of Yiddish, the industry’s vernacular. Courtney Love, not long before her own major label debut at Geffen Records, began boning up with the help of Leo Rosten’s The Joys of Yiddish. ‘I’m going to blow the minds of all those shemedricks at the record company,’ Courtney said. She would even sometimes refer to her dispute with Kat [of the all-female band Babes in Toyland] over who was the first to wear a baby-doll dress onstage as ‘that shmatte’ controversy.’” [KARLEN, N., 1994, p. 146]

From France, singer Serge Gainsbourg [born Lucien Ginzburg] “is still most famous in Britain for his number one Je t’aime moi non plus: the scandalous anthem which was in the British charts 30 years ago. He and [actress Jane] Birkin simulated their lovemaking so effectively that the single was banned by the BBC and formally condemned by the Vatican …Yet Gainsbourg is the greatest popular musician France has ever produced … Echoes of his favourite technique, of murmuring profanities against a delicate and beautiful harmony, can be heard in many contemporary records, not least the later work of Leonard Cohen … Towards the end of his life, the singer’s media appearances became ritual provocations: in one television broadcast, he subjected a veteran paratrooper – horrified by Gainsbourg’s dub version of the Marseillaise – to a torrent of obscenities, pausing only occasionally, to inflate condoms. On another notorious live show, sharing a platform with a young Whitney Houston, Gainsbourg, then 58, turned to the presenter Michel Drucker and declared, in English, ‘I want to fuck her.’” [CHALMERS, R., 1-4-00]

The magazine “Bible” of rock and roll music, Rolling Stone, was also founded by Jewish entrepreneur Jann Wenner [see elsewhere, Mass Media chapters]. Wenner also is “the single most important person behind” Cleveland’s Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum. [HINCKLEY, D., p. 9] Joel Siegel, later prominent as a film critic, was also “TV’s first rock and roll reporter.” [SLEWINSKI, C., 3-23-99, p. 102]

Jerry Wexler, the Jewish co-director of Atlantic Records – remembers with fondness the early rhythm and blues and rock and roll industry years with a curious perspective:
“How well I remember those labels and the grizzled infighters who owned them. Exclusive (Leon and Otis Rene), Modern (the Biharis), Imperial (Lew Chudd), Specialty (Are Rupe), Old Towne (Hymie Weiss), Herald/Ember (Al Silver), Chess (the brothers Chess), and on and on into the night – memorable logos, all. I am reminded of the tribes of the Sinai desert – the Hittites, the Moabites, the Midianites, the Amorites. Gone, perished, vanished from the face of the earth. Only one survived – the Hebrews.” [WEXLER, p. 183]

Wexler’s written memories also include stories about other fellow Jews in the later music world, including the music editor of Billboard, Paul Ackerman; his early Jewish bosses at MGM Records – Abe Olman and Mitch Miller, and A&R men Harry Myerson at RCA and Morty Palitz at Decca; and Nat Shapiro, the promotion man at Atlantic. “What [Wexler] achieved at Atlantic makes him a key figure in the history of post-war black masterworks.” [HOSKYNS, p. 10] Among Wexler’s most famous Black talents was Aretha Franklin. Also, “throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Jerry Wexler worked with several of the most influential R&B singers ever to hit the charts: Wilson Pickett, Otis Redding, Clyde McPhatter, the Drifters, Joe Tex, Ray Charles, Ruth Brown, the Clovers, Joe Turner, and La Vern Baker, to name a few. Rolling Stone has gone so far as to christen him ‘the Godfather of Rhythm and Blues.’” [BEGO, M., 1989, p. 90] In the building of Atlantic Records to power, non-Jewish co-founder Ahmet Ertegun feared collusion between Wexler and two Jewish songwriters, Jerry Lieber and Mike Stoller, to oust him. [HOSKYNS, p. 10] (Jerry Greenberg was also “one of Ertegun’s top lieutenants at Atlantic.” [KING, T., p. 166] Jewish mogul David Geffen once tried to create a rumor that Ertegun was anti-Semitic which “could hurt Ertegun’s business.” [KING, T., 2000, p. 292]

In 1992, Bill McKibben noted an interesting piece of music trivia that he had heard about on television:

“Neil Sedaka went to the same high school as Neil Diamond and Barbara Streisand, and while he was there he wrote a song about a girl called Carole Klein who went on to become Carole King and of course had several number one records.” [MCKIBBEN, p. 20]

The author doesn’t mention it, but, rather curiously, aside from the fact that they all became famous pop singers, they were also all Jewish. In fact, in the early 1960s, Don Kirshner and partner Al Nevins had a company called Aldon Music as a kind of last outpost of the seminal Tin Pan Alley complex at the so-called “Brill Building” in New York City. Their hires (mainly song writers at that time) were virtually all Jewish, including Carole King, Gerry Goffin, Barry Mann, Cynthia Weill, Neil Diamond, Neil Sedaka, and Howard Greenflens. Later came Phil Spector, Jeff Barry, Ellie Greenwich, Doc Pomus, Mort Shuman, Burt Bacharach, Hal David, Jerry Leiber, and Mike Stoller. [SCHEURER, T., p. 90] Ellie Greenwich and Jeff Barry, notes Rich Wiseman, were “one of the hottest songwriter teams in pop.” [WISEMAN, p. 31]

“To my surprise,” writes Jewish author Michael Billig,
“song after well-known pop song, revealed itself to ‘Jewish music,’ from [Elvis] Presley to the soft sounds of the drifters to [producer] Phil Spector. So much of the rebellion-music which I had loved in my youth and which seemed to be a window to a foreign, dangerous world, turned out to be a product of familiar surroundings. Surprise was mixed with delight.” [ARNOT, C., 10-4-2000, p. 6]

In the 1960s era, the Beatles’ agent/manager, Brian Epstein, was Jewish, as was the promoter, Sid Bernstein (“New York’s leading promoter in the mid-sixties,” [GLATT, p. 87] of their early Carnegie Hall and Shea Stadium concerts. The head of Bernstein’s employer – the General Artist Corporation – was Norman Weiss, also Jewish. A Jewish entrepreneur in America, Irwin Pincus, “secured foreign rights on six original Beatles recordings.” [ELIOT, M, p. 127] These seminal tunes appeared on the Vee Jay label (which also recorded the popular Four Seasons) in the early months of “Beatlemania” in America. (Meanwhile, the state of Israel banned the Beatles from performing there in 1965 “for fear of the decadent affect it would have on Israel’s youth).” [FRANKEL, G., p. 273] Sandy Gallin (also Jewish and, like Epstein, gay) “shot to stardom after booking the Beatles for their legendary 1964 American debut on The Ed Sullivan Show.” [KING, T., 2000, p. 93]

“The daughter of prosperous furniture manufacturers in Sheffield,” says Albert Goldman, “[Brian Epstein’s mother] had been educated in a school dominated by Roman Catholics, an experience that led to her to attribute all her subsequent misfortunes in life to anti-Semitism, another trait Brian adopted.” [GOLDMAN] “At age ten,” adds Chet Flippo, “[Brian] was expelled from Liverpool College for scrawling dirty pictures. He and his mother attributed the expulsion to anti-Semitism.” [FLIPPO, C., 1988, p. 143] Both Epstein’s parents “were from prominent Jewish families in Liverpool” and he was an heir to his family’s NEMS company: the North End Music Store chain, which was purchased in the 1930s. [FLIPPO, C., 1988, p. 143] “Brian didn’t care that much about the Beatles’ music,” writes Flippo, “They knew that early on and he always acknowledged it. He had absolutely no experience in managing a group and the Beatles knew that. His contacts, such as they were, were with the business side of record companies.” [FLIPPO, C., 1988, p. 142]

Epstein, notes the Jewish Forward, was a “gay, Jewish record-department manager – of the Liverpool store owned by his parents – who met the Beatles and in little more than a year turned them into the most successful musical act in the world. The life of the Beatles’ first manager has been familiar to Beatles fans for decades, though always as one of the sideshows to the record-shattering main attraction. With the focus reversed, some arresting tidbits emerge, such as when Paul McCartney explains his father’s immediate approval of Epstein. ‘He thought Jewish people were very good with money,’ Mr. McCartney says. ‘That was the common wisdom. He thought Brian would be very good for us … And he was right … If anyone was the fifth Beatle, it was Brian.’ MANDELL, B., 2001]
A biography of Epstein is entitled The Man Who Made the Beatles. “While none of his performing artists were Jews,” notes author Roy Coleman, “Brian veered towards the company of Jews in the music business, and some of his senior colleagues were Jews: Nat Weiss, Dick James [originally Richard Leon Vapnick], Dan Black, Vic Lewis, Bernard Lee.” [COLEMAN, p. 345] Weiss became partners with Epstein in a company called Nemperor Artists. Another Beatle-based company (called Stramsact in London and Seltaeb in America) was formed, in conjunction with Epstein’s lawyer, David Jacobs, to merchandise everything from Beatles chewing gum to wallpaper. Jacobs funneled considerable Beatles business in America to famous Los Angeles Jewish lawyer Marvin Mitchelson. [JENKINS, p. 85]

David Jacobs, note Peter Brown and Steven Gaines,

“adored the young Brian Epstein and took him under his wing. The two men were similar in many coincidental ways. Their families were both in the furniture business, both were born and bred of money, and both had doting Jewish mothers. Both were homosexual. David Jacobs became Brian’s chief solicitor. From then on, all legal decisions and contracts would be made with David Jacobs’ advice.” [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 122]

Victor Lewis, also Jewish, was the Managing Director of yet another Epstein company, NEMS Enterprises. The Beatles had a 10% interest in this company that was based on their profitability; Epstein and his brother held the other 90%. [COLEMAN, p. 305] As Decca writer Tony Barrow once noted, “As for hiring of staff, what John Lennon said to me upon our introduction – ‘if you’re not queer and you’re not Jewish, why are you joining NEMS?’ – proved to be pretty accurate. They weren’t all Jewish, but that was the ideal combination of the two things that were most close to [Epstein] or his family’s heart.” [COLEMAN, p. 178] Nemperor Holdings (formerly NEMS) was eventually sold to Jewish businessman Leonard Richenberg of Triumph Trust. “Trust became a 90 percent holder of Nemperor … The Beatles were stunned that they had lost Nemperor.” After various legal threats, they managed to reacquire it). [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 322]

The aforementioned Jewish businessman, Dick James, controlled the Beatles’ publishing licenses and was their publisher at Northern Songs. James, note Peter Brown and Steven Gaines, “became the for the Beatles a symbol of the music business. He was a balding Jewish ‘uncle’ to the boys, a man with a big cigar and a sly smile, who taught John and Paul one of the biggest lessons of their lives … John and Paul would form a songwriting partnership called Northern Songs … Dick James, in return for his responsibilities as a music publisher, would get 50 percent of the earnings. In literal terms Brian [Epstein] signed over to Dick James 50 percent of Lennon and McCartney’s publishing fees for nothing. It made him wealthy beyond imagination in eighteen months.” [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 186]

Chet Flippo notes the context of Epstein’s death (an overdose of sleeping pills):

“There were immediate rumors then, just as there are rumors now, that Brian Epstein was murdered as the end result of one or another of the many business deals that he had cut regarding the Beatles. There were so many murky deals, involving so many people and so much money, that it could even have been a deal that he failed to do that might have resulted in such rumors of vendetta and revenge. Subsequent court hearings over the years have showed that the Beatles were probably – there is no information for this kind of data – the most underpaid superstar performers ever. Given their worldwide acclaim and the millions of records they sold, one would have imagined that they were millionaires many times over. That was hardly the case … As Paul [McCartney] especially had started to try to dig into the Beatles business books, which they had never even thought to do during the Fab Beatlemania years, suspicions of Brian had started bubbling to the surface.” [FLIPPO, C., 1988, pl. 244]

Also after Epstein’s death, in 1969 James sold the rights to the Beatles songs from under them. “It was the single most contentious deal arising from the Epstein-James era,” says Coleman. “The Beatles were angry at what they regarded as betrayal.” [COLEMAN, p. 306] Marc Elliot notes that James sold “his interest in Northern Songs to the notorious [British Jewish media mogul] Lew Grade, known in the film industry as Low Grade.” [ELLIOT, p. 158] Epstein also had “good communication” with Grade’s brother, Bernard Delfont, “one of the czars of London show business.” [COLEMAN, p. 245-246]

Epstein also managed the career of singer Cilia Black. “After Cilia’s performance [in New York City],” notes Brown and Gaines, “Brian threw a party for her in a hotel suite upstairs. The party was crowded with press and New York show business personalities when some woman within Brian’s earshot remarked that the lobby of the Plaza Hotel looked ‘Jewish.’ Brian flew into a wild rage. The party came to a halt around him as he screamed, ‘Madame, I happen to be Jewish!’… It was a small miracle the incident didn’t find its way into the press.” [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 183]

Moving in the circles of rich and powerful, notes Coleman, “Brian had struck up a particularly warm rapport in London with Bernice Kinn, wife of the owner of the New Musical Express. An ebullient, intuitive Jew, she and her husband Maurice formed part of the core of London’s 1960s show business hosts and party goers.” [COLEMAN, p. 245-246] Another of Epstein’s “close friends” was Lionel Bart (Beglieter), the Jewish song writer for many of pop star Cliff Richard’s songs, and originator of the musical score for the musical play, Oliver! [PRESS ASSOCIATION NEWSFILE, 4-3-99]

The Beatles’ “official photographer” during their peak years (1962-67) was Jewish – Dezo Hoffman. Paul McCartney’s wife Linda (Eastman – originally Epstein) was also Jewish. [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 77, 172] Eastman’s father also became active in legal squabbles between the Beatles, especially between McCartney and Lennon. McCartney’s lawyer in this contentious era, Charles Corman, was an Orthodox Jew. [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 333] The producers of the Beatles first movie, A Hard Day’s Night, were Walter Shenson and Bud Orenstein. Richard Lester directed the movie. Famous Jewish singer Bob Dylan (Robert Zimmerman) introduced the Beatles to marijuana the first time he met them, a gathering arranged by music writer Al Aronowitz. [BROWN/GAINES, 1983, p. 150]

After John Lennon’s death, another Jewish agent, Elliot Mintz, has been for years Yoko Ono’s publicist (he has also worked as a public relations man for Bob Dylan, and other capacities with pop singers throughout the years). Immediately after Lennon’s assassination, an employee, Fred Seaman, and his “old college roommate,” “psychiatrist and New York diamond dealer” Bob Rosen, set up a network (termed “Project Walrus”) to market Lennon’s stolen journals and other memorabilia. [MINTZ, 1991]

One of the most famous popular music producers of the 1960s – Phil Spector – was also Jewish. Spector was renowned for his strange temperament and a music style described as a “wall of sound.” “Philip was a very strange person,” remarked pop singer Sonny Bono, “He always had a tough time staying rational, a real tough time.” [WADE, p. 100] Spector also founded Phillips Records with partner Lester Sil. “The most famous pop producer [Spector] of them all,” noted the Los Angeles Times in 1988,

“was a bigger superstar than any singers among his bullpen he kept on hand to belt out wonderfully disposable ditty after ditty – and he kept it that way by issuing most of the singles under the name of some generic group, not the actual lead singer.” [WILLMAN, C., 10-11-88, CALENDAR, p. 10]

Another top Jewish manager, Allen Klein – starting out with clients like Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme (both Jewish), Bobby Darin, and Sam Cooke – eventually owned the Cameo Parkway company, managing many of the biggest British musical acts of the 1960s, including the Rolling Stones (whose early agent was Sandy Lieberson), the Yardbirds, the Kinks, the Animals, and Donovan. Eventually, upon Brian Epstein’s death, Klein even managed the Beatles’ Apple company. “Klein was a New York accountant,” notes Mark Hertsgaard, “whose foulmouthed personality and street-fighter instincts masked a razor-sharp financial mind but helped explain his propensity for attracting lawsuits and tax fraud accusations.” [HERTSGAARD, p. 287] “At the peak of his career,” says Phillip Norman, “his company was involved in fifty lawsuits,” [NORMAN, p. 184] including one with the Beatles. The Rolling Stones once sued Klein for $29 million. [SANDFORD, p. 164]

Christopher Sandford notes that

“By midsummer [Rolling Stones singer Mick] Jagger was unable to mention his manager’s name [Klein] calmly. Later he gave an interview in which he stated, ‘Half the money I’ve made has been stolen. Most artists in show business suffer the same kind of thing… It’s all the hangerson and parasites. There are very few honest people in the profession.”
[SANDFORD, p. 139]

Klein had this interchange with a Playboy interviewer in 1971:
“Q: Would you lie?
A: Oh, sure.
Q: Would you steal?
A: Probably. Look. You have to survive. Whatever it takes … It’s a game for Chrissakes and winning is everything.” [GARFIELD, p. 257]

Another legendary Jewish manager, Albert Grossman, was “probably the best-known, most successful, and aggressive artist’s manager in the music business.” [SCADUTO, p. 105] He ran the careers of Bob Dylan, Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix, and many other top musical artists. (When Grossman’s business manager, Dick Asher, signed Joplin to a contract, he never forgot what she said to him: “I hope you didn’t fuck us too much.” [DANNEN, p. 76] The early booking agent for Joplin’s Big Brother and the Holding Company band was Todd Schiffman; its manager was Julius Karpen.

Bob Dylan was also signed to a song-licensing deal by Lou Levy, and later Early in songwriter’s career, “when a girlfriend’s mother challenged his lies and said she thought Zimmerman was his real name, he called her an anti-Semite, as if a mere description of the truth was bigotry.” [RUBIN, p. 94] Dylan, who early in his career hid his Jewish past and made up various lies (he was from Oklahoma, etc.) about his background, nonetheless joined the Jewish fraternity house at the University of Minnesota in 1959, Sigma Alpha Mu. [SCADUTO, p. 26] After becoming rich and famous singing about social justice, in the 1980s, “Dylantologist” A. J. Weberman declared that the famous singer “is an ultra-Zionist. He is doing the tour to raise money for Israel. He has given large sums of money to Israel in the name of Abraham Zimmerman.” [SPITZ, p. 430]
Newsweek and Time each reported that Dylan had indeed donated sums to the Jewish state, and even the far right-wing Jewish Defense League. [SPITZ,
p. 407] A biographer, Anthony Scaduto, noted earlier, in 1971,

“At this writing, Dylan’s search for personal salvation seems to be coming around full circle, back to the religion of his fathers. Bob has started to study Judaism, and Hebrew. Dylan, who gets so Gemini-enthused about everything, has made several trips to Israel in the last year to ‘sniff the breeze’ as his friends put it. He has reportedly donated some of his funds to help support at least one kibbutz there. Folksinger Theo Bikel [also Jewish, and a Zionist activist] adds: ‘Dylan has told me that Israel appears to be one of the few places left in the world where life has any meaning.’ He has even attended several meetings of the militant Jewish Defense League. The JDL’s head, Meir Kahane, [charged by many, including Jews, as a racist and fascist] will say only that Dylan has ‘come around a couple times to see what we’re all about’ and has promised to donate money to the organization. Dylan refuses to discuss it.”
[SCADTO, p. 274]
By 1977, the biggest rock concert promoters were San Francisco-based Bill Graham (a Jewish Holocaust survivor originally named Wolfgang Wolodia Granjanka, the owner of the famous hippie Fillmore Ballroom who had named his own northern California estate after the mythic Israelite fortress, Masada), Concerts West, Concert Associates, Chicago’s Frank Fried, and in New York, Ron Delsener and Howard Stein. [CHAPPLE, p. 152] In 1976, Howard Stein (whose “father, Jack ‘Ruby’ Stein, had been a loan shark, … ended up floating down the Hudson, sans head”) [HADEN-GUEST., 1997, p. 66] noted that the field of his endeavors in musical concert production had a “territorial overtone”:

“It’s hard for a major concert producer to get started in New York City and do battle with Delsener and myself. It’s equally difficult for a major concert producer to establish himself against Frank Fried and myself in Chicago. In Miami, I virtually don’t consider myself as having any real competition. In Atlanta, minor competition. In Texas, some competition. In New York there are three: Delsener, myself, and Jerry Weintraub. Bill Graham on the West coast … The power of an impresario or a concert producer is through associations. It’s very political. It’s very personal. It’s building reciprocal relationships.” [LEVINE, F. p. 262]

Jon Fischel at Billboard magazine named Jerry Weintraub and Bill Graham (sometimes described as the “Godfather of Rock and Roll”) as the “most powerful men in the [rock concert] business” in their era. [LEVINE, p. 275] “As Bill Graham became increasingly successful and achieved celebrity status in San Francisco,” says John Glatt, “he faced a growing hostility from many people who saw him as a capitalist pig growing rich on the backs of the Love Generation.” [GLATT, p. 61]

By the 1970s, lawyer Allan Grubman (whose partner was Arthur Indursky) became “the biggest music attorney in the history of rock and roll.” [DANNEN, p. 144] Irving Azoff, “one of the most loathed men in the movie business,” eventually headed the Front Line management firm, “the top management firm in rock and roll.” [DANNEN, p. 134] Top man at Front Line after Azoff? Howard Kaufman. [KING, T., 2000, p. 436] Azoff, short in stature, is known by enemies in the Hollywood world as the “Poison Dwarf.” Azoff’s acts included the Eagles, Boz Scaggs, Dan Fogelberg, Steely Dan, REO Speedwagon, Joe Walsh, and many others. Azoff eventually headed MCA, and later Giant Records. When he was president of MCA, three of four vice-presidents were also Jewish: Myron Roth, Zach Horowitz, and Larry Solters. [KNOEDELSED-ER, p. 26] The Leber-Krebs agency became “one of the biggest management companies in rock”; their acts included Aerosmith and Ted Nugent. Dan Wein- er founded the rock talent agency, Monterey Peninsula Associates. John and David Handleman (the Handleman Company) eventually became the largest rock and roll “jobbers” (distributors) in the United States; in 1991 they bought out their largest rival, also Jewish-founded – Lieberman Enterprises. [HULL, p. 181] “Almost every time you buy an LP, cassette, compact disc or book at K mart,” says Tim Kiska, “you’re putting a few dimes in the Handleman family fortune.” [KISKA, p. 91]
Lou Adler (formerly teamed with fellow-Jewish mogul Herb Alpert) was the backbone producer of the influential Monterey Pop Festival and head of the Ode record label. (Alpert and another Jewish partner, Jerry Moss, also founded A&M Records). The Monterey festival was originally conceived by Benny Shapiro and Alan Pariser who sold the project to Adler and Michelle Phillips. [HOSKYNS, 1996, p. 142] Ray Manarek remembers when he and the rest of the Doors rock group went (before they became famous) to Adler’s office, hoping he would sign them to a recording contract:

“He rejected the whole demo. Ten seconds on each song … and we were dismissed out of hand. Just like that. He took the demo off the turntable and handed it back to me with an obsequious smile and said, ‘Nothing here I can use.’ We were shocked. We stood up, the three of us, and [lead singer] Jim [Morrison], with a wry and knowing smile on his lips, cuttingly and coolly shot back at him, ‘That’s okay, man. We don’t want to be used, anyway.’” [MANZAREK, R., 1998, p. 153]

The landmark 1969 Woodstock Musical Festival was the entrepreneurial investment of four young Jews: Joel Rosenman, John Roberts (heir to a pharmaceutical fortune), Artie Kornfeld, and Michael Lang. The person hired to pull the whole project together was Stanley Goldstein. Mel Laurence (born Melvin Bernard Lachs) was also the Director of Operations for the festival creators, Woodstock Ventures. Bert Cohen, of Concert Hall Publications, soon joined the production team for various tasks. [SPITZ, 1979] The first employee of Woodstock ventures was Rene Levine, a bookkeeper and another Jew, Alex Jaffee, was the company’s accountant. In a book chapter called “Buying Off the Underground,” Joel Rosenman recalls when he and others of the Woodstock Ventures investment team went to Greenwich Village’s East Village Other “counterculture” newspaper to buy them off, guaranteeing that prominent members of that anti-capitalist community wouldn’t cause problems with the economic exploitation of the supposedly anti-materialist Love Generation. Famed radical (and Jewish) agitator Abbie Hoffman demanded $10,000 from Woodstock Ventures, “or else that fucking festival you guys are planning is gonna end up around your ass.” [ROSENMAN/ROBERTS/PILPEL, p. 102]

Others involved in the Woodstock project included Judi Bernstein (business manager for the sound company that handled the festival; she later became executive director of Boston’s Zionist Hadassah Organization) and her husband Harold Cohen; Lee Blumer (Assistant to the Director of Security); Steve Cohen (who was “largely responsible for designing and building the Woodstock stage”); Len Kaufman (who “headed the ‘elite black shirt’ security force”); and Rona Elliot (who worked in Woodstock Ventures public relations and later became the music correspondent for NBC’s Today show). Many of the Woodstock musical artists were even boarded at the famous Jewish resort hotel in the Catskill Mountains, Grossinger’s. Even Max Yasgur, the dairy farmer whose land was used for the festival, was Jewish. [JEWHŌO]
One of the four Woodstock festival entrepreneurs, Artie Kornfeld, was vice president of Capitol Records (1967-68). He “wrote and produced all the Cow-sills’ stuff.” In later Kornfeld recalled how Woodstock was started:

“My secretary said, ‘There’s a Michael Lang here to see you.’ And I said, ‘Who’s Michael Lang?’ And she said, ‘He says he’s from your old neighborhood.’ And I said, ‘Well, if he’s from the neighborhood, tell him to come in.’ Bensonhurst. It’s a section of Brooklyn that’s all Jewish and Italian. That’s how he got to see me; by saying he was from the neighborhood.” [MAKOWER, p. 25]

The two men shared some marijuana in Kornfeld’s office. Later, discussing the grand idea of a gigantic music festival, Kornfeld notes that much “was basically talked out that night, that first night, probably behind some Colombian blond, which had something to do with it. Overachieving, pseudo-intellectual Jewish kids with an idea that came from outside of us, I believe. It was the culture.” [MAKOWER, p. 27] The two men later paid a visit to join forces with Rosenman and Roberts (later partners in a venture capitalist firm called J.R. Capital and Woodstock was born.

The disastrous 1999 Woodstock Festival was also headed by Michael Lang, and John Scher. It ended in rioting, vandalism, injuries, arrests, and sexual crimes. [MORSE, S., 7-27-99] Also in the rock-and-roll entrepreneurial world, “the first Lollapalooza,” notes Neal Karlen, “was held in 1991 as the brainchild of Perry Farrell [born Perry Bernstein], former leader of the defunct Jane’s Addiction. That summer’s eight band line-up drew 430,000 fans, grossed $10 million, and was the surprise smash of the entire [music] industry.” [KARLEN, N., 1994, p. 160]

Another Jewish entrepreneur, Harold Leventhal, promoted folk acts like the Weavers and Woody Guthrie. “Jefferson Airplane was the creation of [their manager] Matthew Katz.” [GLATT, p. 57] Danny Rifkind managed the Grateful Dead. Paul Rothchild produced the Doors (and many other groups); Jac Holzman, head of Elektra, signed them to his record label. [DENSMORE, J., 1990, p. 79] (Todd Schifferman signed them to a talent agency). [KING, T., 2000, pl. 97] Rothchild was so integral to the Doors that band member Ray Manzarek calls him “the fifth Door.” [Manzarek, R., 1998, p. 203] Manzarek recalls Elektra owner Jac Holzman’s attitude towards his best-selling group:

“We were all excited at the prospects of breaking the cherry of a brand-new, state-of-the-art [Elektra] recording studio. And we thought it was going to be for free. Hell, Jac Holzman built the damned place with profits from the Doors’ record sales. Everybody called the new Elektra facility on La Cienga ‘the house the Doors built,’ so why shouldn’t we record for free? Besides, it was an in-house studio. It would be for all Elektra artists. Outsiders could hire the studio at the going rates, but Elektra’s own people could record there anytime they wanted and for free. Right? We were excited. Wouldn’t you be? Bullshit! No free time. No freebee recording sessions. Everybody paid. Strangers or family … everybody paid. However, Jac did say … ‘Boys, I’ll tell you what I’m going to do. For you …’ And you could see the calculator in his head whirling. You could see that he wanted to be generous to us, he was on the West Coast now, he wore love beads, he had grown his hair long, he was not a crass materialist, he was new man who believed in peace and love for all races, religions, creeds, nationalities. But he was also from New York. ‘For you … a ten percent discount!’ I almost snorted in his face. [Lead singer] Jim [Morrison] just spun around on his heels, unable to face Jac.” [MANZAREK, R., 1998, p. 302]

Early in their career the Doors practiced at home of Stu and Marilyn Kreiger in wealthy Pacific Palisades. [MANZAREK, R., 1998, p. 149] This was the home of the parents of Doors guitarist Robby Kreiger, also Jewish. Heiress Naomi Hirshorn literally bought the Byrds their first musical instruments. [CROSBY/GOTTLEIB, p. 86] Terry Melcher (whose father was Jewish) managed both the Byrds and Paul Revere and the Raiders. [WYNN, N., 1990, p. 197] Herb Gart “handled” the Youngbloods. [KING, T., 2000, p. 66] David Kapralik managed Sly and the Family Stone and Barbara Streisand. [SCADUTO, p. 105] Nik Cohn, a music critic for the Manchester Guardian, and later the New York Times, provided Peter Townsend of The Who important criticism in the development of his rock opera “Tommy.” Townsend, notes Larry Smith, had a “willingness to compromise his work for a favorable review from [this] respected journalist/friend.” [SMITH, L., 1999, p. 3] The Beach Boys story eventually centered around key member Brian Wilson’s destructive drug habit and his controlling psychotherapist, Eugene Landy [see elsewhere for the story of Landy’s exploitation of his famous patient, p. 1153]. The band’s road manager was also Jewish, Arnie Geller. At the peak of his success, Wilson also married a 16-year old Jewish girl, Marilyn Rovell. His autobiography was also written by Todd Gold, who was hired by Wilson and his psychotherapist Landy, to create the book (portraying the controversial Landy in an extremely favorable light) from tape-recorded interviews.

Top rock act Creedence Clearwater Revival was effectively destroyed largely by its Jewish overseers. The group signed with Fantasy Records in 1964. In 1967 the company was bought by Jewish entrepreneur Saul Zaentz (he also produced the films One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest and Amadeus). When CCR soon began a string of hit records, the group demanded a royalty increase, per a clause in their contract. Zaentz refused, but led the group to an acquaintance, an unscrupulous (and mob-linked) Jewish lawyer named Bruce Kanter, who developed a complicated scheme to secure the rock group’s earnings in a much lower tax bracket. Kanter shifted much of Creedance’s money into tax dodge companies created in the Bahamas; one such Kanter company was called King David Distributors, and later Sholom (Hebrew for peace) LTD. [BLOCK, A., p. 268-269]

As Alan Block notes:

“Over the years the Creedance Clearwater Revival repatriated much of their Castle [another Kanter-related firm] money by borrowing it from companies they actually owned, or thought they controlled, under Kanter’s plan. Nevertheless, when Castle went bust it took $4 million of the group’s and [leader singer/writer] John Fogerty’s money. Before that happened John Fogerty desperately tried to extricate himself from Castle and the Kanter grasp … Fogerty was particularly angry with Saul Zaentz because he held him responsible for bringing the group into the Kanter scheme.” [BLOCK, p. 271]

In the mess, Fogerty also lost the rights to every song he wrote with the band. [BLOCK, A., p. 271] In 1983, the group won a lawsuit of $1.5 million against Kanter for his part in the Creedance problems. The next year, recording again, Fogerty lyrics in his Centerfield album included obvious references to Zaentz that could certainly infer anti-Semitic overtones. He was described as a “little pig” who is “silent and quick / just like Oliver Twist.” [BLOCK, A., p. 272-273]

African-American singing superstar Diana Ross, originally of the Supremes, married a Jewish Hollywood public relations agent, Robert Silberstein, in 1971. J. Randy Taraborrelli, in his biography of Ross, suggests careerist dimensions to the marriage:

“Why Diana Ross decided to marry Bob Silberstein remains a mystery today. If the two of them were in love, it was the best kept secret in Hollywood … Bob Silberstein was both white and Jewish. Diana’s appearance and singing style were meant to appeal to Caucasians, so a white husband would certainly not hurt her image – in fact, it would enhance it – and Jewish men were perceived to be shrewd and intelligent.” [TARABORRELLI, p. 249]

(African-American singer-actress star Diahann Carroll’s first two husbands were also Jewish: Monte Kay (owner of the Birdland jazz nightclub), and Freddie Glusman, head of a Las Vegas dress shop. The second marriage collapsed after Glusman beat her).

Harvey Goldsmith is the manager of rock star Elton John, among others. He is recognized as “the best known rock promoter in England.” [GRAHAM/GREENFIELD, p. 551] Doug Goldstein manages Guns ‘n Roses. (Jerry Heller and Samuel Frankel manage Guns ‘n Roses guitarist Slash. [SNYDER, N., 2-19-01] Steven Levine produced Culture Club. Jerry Meyer “became one of the top independent record promoters in the country. He was part of an informal group of about 10 promoters known at the Network, which dominated airplay on Top 40 radio during the ‘70s and ‘80s. The Network had the power to make or break records … [Meyer] loves music, which next to his Jewish faith, has been the constant of his life.” [VIOLANTI, p. 8M]

Rock superstar Bruce Springsteen fell under the control of two agents of Jewish heritage, first

“the tutelage of sharpie Mark Appel, who simultaneously managed him, ran the production company through which his contracts were signed, and owned his publishing…. [Springsteen] managed to escape … Appel through a series of lawsuits prompted by rock critic/social climber Jon Landau. Landau ran Rolling Stone’s record review section even as he worked as a producer for major record labels … Landau came out the other end Springsteen’s manager, producer, and best friend and confidant.” [DOHERTY, p. 54]

Reviewer Brian Doherty noted Landau’s portrayal in a rock and roll history book as “an unethical, anti-art, money-grubbing climber.” [DOHERTY, p. 54]

Elsewhere, Dick Friedberg was a partner at the Premier rock and roll management service. Gil Freisen became the president of A&M Records (Janet Jackson, Sting, et al). Herb Abrahamson was a cofounder of Atlantic Records. Norman Granz owned Verve. Jac Holzman founded Elektra Records with “$600 of bar mitzvah money.” (President of Elektra? Mel Posner. [KING, T., 2000, p. 245] Simon Waronker and cousin Herb Newman founded Liberty Records in 1955 (Ricky Nelson, Jan and Dean, Bobby Vee, Fats Domino, Johnny Rivers, the Ventures, et al). Newman also founded another label, Era. Ted Wallerstein headed RCA records in its formative years. Art Kass, Phil Steinberg, Hy Mizrahi, and Artie Ripp founded the Kama Sutra recording label (financed in part by a known mobster, [WADE, p. 118] and later Buddah. Buddah producers Jerry Kasentz and Jeff Katz helped develop the trivial genre of “bubblegum music,” including the 1910 Fruitgum Company and Ohio Express. Both groups had the same lead singer, Joey Levine. [DANNEN, p. 164] Don Kirshner is credited with the supervision of the quintessential media-illusory artificial band, the Monkees; three of the four band members didn’t even know how to play an instrument. Jewish film moguls Burt Schneider and Bob Rafelson were their creators. Bob Ezrin’s Migration Records features acts like Peter Gabriel, Aerosmith, Lou Reed, Robert Flack, Kiss, et al. Trauma Records (owned by Rob Kahane and Paul Palmer) has featured acts like No Doubt, Bush, and basketball star Shaquille O’Neal. Israeli arms dealer and Hollywood mogul Arnon Milchan sought to purchase Trauma in the late 1990s and merge it into his own Restless Records company.

Eventually most of the small record labels were bought out or rendered extinct by large mega-media corporations. “The term ‘oligopoly’ is an apt one to describe today’s record business,” wrote Frederic Dannen in 1990, “Most Americans get nearly all their wares from six suppliers – CBS, Warners [including the labels: Warners, Atlantic, Atco, Elektra, Asylum, Reprise], BMG [the initials of the Bertelsmann Music Group, which includes RCA], Capitol-EMI, PolyGram [including Mercury, Polydor, London, Vertigo, Verve, Wing, A&M, Island, Motown], and MCA [including Decca, ABC-Dunhill, MCA, Geffen, DGC, GRP] … Far out in front there are the big two … A whopping one-third [of the record business] belongs to CBS and Warners … Today CBS and Warners can be viewed as the record industry’s equivalent of the world’s two superpowers.” [DANNEN, p. 112]

For years CBS Records was headed by Walter Yetnikoff. “The heart of Yetnikoff’s persona,” notes Dannen, “was his Brooklyn Jewishness … An outsized number of [record] label bosses were Jews from Brooklyn, but Walter wore his ethnicity like a gabardine … [He] fit well with the record business which was culturally Jewish … The goyim. With Walter it was always Us versus Them. When CBS Records had its annual convention in London, Walter forbade his people to stay at the Dorchester Hotel because it was Arab-owned ... One of Walter’s inconsistencies was that he dated only gentile women, preferring well-endowed blondes. Before his twenty-five marriage broke up in the early eighties, he had already begun to amass a stable of such girlfriends – his ‘shiksa farm.’” [DANNEN, p. 23] Yentnikoff was a “close friend” of record industry mobster Morris Levy, as was Sheldon Levy, another president of CBS Records. “Walter grew fond of Morris,” says Frederic Dannen, “and spent time at [Morris] Levy’s farm.” [DANNEN, p. 34]

(To rock star Sting’s credit, in 2001 he resisted unspecified “media” pressures to censor an Arab out of one of his songs. As the Associated Press noted, “Sting told the [Arab American Institute Foundation] that some people in the media had advised him not to put out his duet with Algerian vocalist Cheb Mami as a singer, ‘because of the Arab guy singing at the front. ‘They said, ‘If you take him out, we’ll play it on the radio.’ I said, ‘No can do. It’s an integral part of the song.’ His remarks drew cheers from Arab Americans across the ballroom.”) [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 5-2-01]

Bertelsmann Music Group (BMG) is a giant German-based entertainment conglomerate. The president and CEO of BMG Entertainment North America, since 1994, has been the Jewish executive Strauss Zelnick, formerly the president of Twentieth Century Fox. From this position he oversees “the operations of all North American divisions of Bertelsmann Music Group as well as Music Publishing and Interactive Entertainment operations worldwide.” [BUSINESS WIRE, 9-13-94] The division Zelnick heads accounts for over $4 billion in yearly sales. In 2001 another Jewish executive, Joel Klein, was named chairman and CEO of the U.S. operations of Bertelsmann AG. For years, another Jewish head, Clive Davis, has overseen the important Arista record division in BMG’s stable. In 1998, another executive at BMG (both a German convert to Judaism, and a rabbi) quit to become the director of Germany’s chapter of the environmental Greenpeace organization.

In 1997, Frank Woessner, the non-Jewish CEO of Bertelsmann’s giant book division, was awarded the (Jewish fraternal organization) B’nai B’rith of Continental Europe’s “Gold Medal for Humanitarian Work.” “Woessner,” noted the Jewish Week, “was lauded for supporting liberal Jewish causes in speeches by prominent members of the local Jewish community.” [AXELROD, p. 41] Among the most important of his “humanitarian work” was the publication of Jewish American author Daniel Goldhagen’s controversial work that affixed blame upon all Germans for the Holocaust (not just Nazis).

In 1998, the Jewish Bronfman family’s Seagrams firm (which already owned MCA) bought PolyGram NV – “the world’s largest music company” – for $10.5 billion. The International Herald Tribune noted that:

“The transaction would be the biggest in the history of the entertainment industry, eclipsed only by Walt Disney’s $18.9 billion purchase of Capital Cities/ABC Inc. and the $11 billion merger of Time and Warner Communications that created Time Warner Inc.” [INTERNATIONAL HERALD, p. 15]
The Polygram-MCA amalgamation now under the combined rule of Edgar Bronfman made him, at age 43, “the most powerful mogul in music land,” with a quarter of all world record sales on earth,” including the largest output of classics and jazz. [LEBRECHT, p. 25] Polygram alone, in the Bronfman empire, also owns over 320,000 song copyrights. Among its labels are A&M, Mercury, Decca/London, Phillips Classics, and Island. [HOOVER, p. 138] Worldwide, Polygram-MCA holdings include the Finnish Sonet Media AB company, Japan’s Nippon Phonogram, Polydor KK, and Rodven Records, “the leading independent record company in Latin America.” [HOOVER, p. 138] Prominent musical acts in the Polygram stable have included U2, Sting, Lionel Richie, Soundgarden, Kiss, the Village People, Janet Jackson and numerous others. MTV-like TV station projects include Atomic TV in Warsaw, Poland and (in association with MTV) 2 MTV in Asia.

Charles Koppelman was founder of the SBK record label, which recorded “white rapper” Vanilla Ice, and Wilson Phillips among others. Through the mid-1990s he was chairman of EMI Group North America, later founding a company called CAK Univeral Credits, geared to music stars looking for loans. In 2000, Monte Lipman, co-founder of Republic Records, was named president of Universal Records (part of the Bronfman empire), which had bought out the former company. And, in the same year, as the Cleveland Jewish News noted,

“Instead of forming on their own, megapop bands like Backstreet Boys and ‘N Sync are the manufactured creations of Transcontinental Records mogul Lou Pearlman, where inspired grooming and marketing has shepherded a number of record boy-groups to stardom.” [HOROWITZ, G., 3-24-2000, p. 37]

(In 2000, ‘N Sync played at young Rachel Colburn’s private Bat Mitzvah party. She is the daughter of American Online’s President of Business Affairs, David Colburn. “AOL spokeswoman Wendy Goldberg said the band has a relationship with Colburn, and they did the gig as a favor.” Such a performance by the singing group normally costs between $250,000 and a million dollars.) [DESERET NEWS, 6-8-2000, p. A2]

In the music executive scene, at Warners, for example, for years Mo Ostin headed the music company. “Warners,” notes Neal Karlen, in his book about the all-female band Babes in Toyland, “was run by Mo Ostin and Lenny Waronker; the company’s entire A&R department was headed by Mo’s son Michael. If [A&R man Tim] Carr could get his way, the Babes’ campaign would be largely orchestrated from Warner Records’ Burbank headquarters by a half-dozen Jewish music men ... Traveling the spectrum of popular music, one could still occasionally hear the word Jew used as an epithet. If one listened, one could catch bands talking of being ‘Jewed down’ by a record company executive or having to hire a ‘Jew lawyer’ to fix a thorny legal hassle. The attitude was no different in the shrunken universe of alternative music. True, three of punk rock’s spiritual godfathers were Jewish: Bob Dylan, né Robert Zimmerman, Lou Reed, né Louis Firbank; and Joey Ramone, né Jeffrey Hyman. Yet signing with a major label, one drunk English guitarist could be heard saying late one night in 1992 at the historic New York punk club CBGB, meant turning oneself into ‘Jew-bait.’” [KARLEN, N., 1994, p. 145].

At Sire Records, an affiliate of Warners, Seymour Stein’s artist stable has included Madonna, Talking Heads, the Ramones, and many other premiere talents. “Before long,” says Christopher Anderson, “[producer Mark] Kamins and Madonna became lovers … After a few days together, Madonna felt comfortable enough to spring her tape on Kamins … He had become friendly with an up-and-coming artist and repertoire man at Warner’s Sire label named Michael Rosenblatt … Rosenblatt took the tape to the mercurial [Seymour] Stein.” Madonna also got her start in movies in Susan Seidelman’s Desperately Seeking Susan. [ANDERSON, 1991, p. 96-98, 121] Guy Oseary, born in Jerusalem, is “a partner in Madonna’s Maverick Records” and he wrote a book called Jews Who Rock, about Jewish performers in the rock and roll world. “I keep getting calls,” he says, “And they say, ‘Why wasn’t I in your book? I rock. And I’m Jewish.’” [BOUCHER, G., 4-17-01, p. 62; TAYLOR, L., 12-27-00, p. F5] Oseary “as Maverick’s chief talent finder has become one of Madonna’s most trusted confidants.” [FURMAN, P., 6-17-98, p. 12]

When Bob Krasnow became the head of Elektra, “it was, he says, his ethnic credentials more than anything else, that got him the job.” [WADE, p. 58] “I could work for a big company like Warner Brothers [which swallowed Elektra],” said Krasnow, “because I had all the ethnic qualities – I was white, I was Jewish, they could invite me over to their home for dinner, and I could talk to Black people.” [WADE, p. 58]

Jerry Wexler was the co-founder of Atlantic. When the head of CBS Records, Clive Davis, was fired for embezzling $94,000 (including $18,000 for his son’s bar mitzvah) [DANNEN, p. 86], he was replaced by Irwin Segelstein. Dick Asher, also Jewish “was the number two man at Columbia Records” under Clive Davis.” [KING, T., 2000, p. 143] (“Since the days of Abraham,” notes the Jewish Forward, “machers in the entertainment business have used their sons’ and daughters’ special day to power-schmooze fellow moguls. In 1973, Clive Davis, then president of CBS Records, threw one of the most famous bar mitzvahs in show business history (that he was fired for it only adds to its mystique.”) [DORFMAN, J., 6-16-2000, p. 2] Davis later ended up as the head of Bell Records under Columbia Pictures president Alan Hirschfield. (Davis later had a successful career heading Arista Records, whose artists included Whitney Houston and the Grateful Dead. Davis’ business manager at CBS was Michael Levy; Goddard Lieberman was CBS Records’ second in command; Lieberman’s assistant was Norman Adler. Al Shulman was head of the CBS Special Products Division and Dick Asher was CBS Records’ Executive Vice President. Ron Alexenburg was a vice president for promotion at Columbia. Elliott Goldman was the number two man at Arista Records; Mitch Miller was a prominent producer and musical celebrity at CBS.

By 1998 Jay Boborg – co-founder of IRS Records in 1979 which began the careers of the Go-Gos, R.E.M., and others – was the president of MCA Records.
Jerry Greenberg, former head of Atlantic Records, “is now [in 1998, superstar] Michael Jackson’s right hand man and president of MJJ Records.” [VIOLANTI, p. 8M] (Jackson was the best man for Israeli psychic Uri Geller’s wedding. Geller’s drawing – minus a Star of David – graces a recent Jackson album). [REUTERS, 11-1-01] Alain Levy is chairman (1998) of PolyGram. In 1997 Danny Goldberg, chairman of Mercury Records, was described by the Jewish Week as being “among the most powerful executives in the entertainment industry.” [GREENBERG, E., MUST, p. 49] Among the divisions he directs is Motown Records and PolyGram Classics and Jazz in the United States. Goldberg was also formerly the president of Atlantic Records where he controlled, among other groups, Nirvana. By 1995 he was the chairman and CEO of Warner Records, but lost the position during the controversy over Warners’ support of particularly abrasive “gangsta rap” recordings. Goldberg is also a former chairman of the executive committee of the American Jewish Congress.

In 1987 Goldberg (then manager of Bonnie Raitt, Belinda Carlyle of the Go-Go’s, Don Johnson, and others) organized a record industry-wide propaganda effort for the state of Israel. As the Los Angeles Times described it:

“Israel’s Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, in an unprecedented appearance before a group of recording industry executives, personal managers, agents and lawyers, told them that rock music was ‘like praying’ to some Israeli youth and exhorted them to ‘come ‘pray’ with our young people so they will celebrate our [Israeli] 40th anniversary’ in 1988. The reception/brunch at the Beverly Hills Hotel on Sunday was organized by rock entrepreneur Danny Goldberg, the president [then] of Gold Mountain Records … The 100-plus guests represented a cross-section of the music industry, with strong ties to musical talents. Among them: Irving Azoff, president of MCA’s Entertainment Group; A&M Records vice-president Jeff Gold; and personal managers Fred DeMann (Madonna, Lionel Richie), Mike Gormley (The Bangles, Oingo Bonggo), and Michael Lippman (George Michael).” [CAULFIELD, D., 9-29-87, p. 6]

Goldberg told the Times that

“We talked about the fact that Israel needs to establish an identity with younger people. They’re currently only aware of the country as an item on the nightly news. In the 1950s, an alliance was formed between Israel and what used to be the heart of show business. I mean, Frank Sinatra and Elizabeth Taylor were associated with Israel, but that leaves out the people who grew up after them.” [CAULFIELD, D., 9-29-87, p. 6]

The brunch was sponsored by the CRB Foundation, founded by Jewish mogul Charles Bronfman “to create a mutual exchange between Israel and the rest of the world.” The Israeli Foreign Minister, Peres, noted the Times, received “a standing ovation when he arrived.” [CAULFIELD, D., 9-29-87, p. 6]

In England, Michael Levy headed Magnet Records, built to power with help in 1972 from the then head of (British) Columbia Records, Maurice Oberstein. Levy, known for “chasing people around the office and throwing ashtrays,” is also chairman of Britain’s Jewish Care organization. [BRIGHT, p. T2] Levy “made his personal fortune propelling pop acts – Alvin Stardust, Chris Rea, Darts and Bad Manners – to stardom.” [DAVIS, D., 2-10-2000, p. 5] “At one point [he] was selling 8% of all records in the UK.” [RED STAR RESEARCH] In 1991 British producer Ian Levine began recording old Black Motown record label acts for his new Motorcity label. Levine gathered over 100 former stars to Detroit. “I was in control of the entire Motown family,” he chortled, “[I brought] it back together again, and the press and the fans were standing there in awe.” [BULL, p. 14]

Perhaps the most famous agent/manager/record executive is David Geffen (also Jewish), former manager of Crosby Stills Nash and Young, and many others, who founded Asylum, and later, Geffen Records (the artist stable included Jackson Browne, the Eagles, Joni Mitchell, Linda Ronstadt, and many others). (Alan Cohen “structured the Asylum Records joint venture buyout [with Warner and] left Warner to become head of Madison Square Garden”). [KING, T., 2000, p. 287] Dennis McDougal notes that Geffen “spotted Aerosmith, XTC, Nirvana, and dozens of other pop acts in their infancy and nurtured them to monied maturity and more than fifty gold record albums … In 1989 alone, Geffen worldwide record sales came to over $225 million.” [MCDOUGAL, p. 474] A key Geffen partner was Elliot Roberts (Rabinowitz) – he was the “pre-eminent manager of L.A.-based folk rock in the seventies,” including, even later, Neil Young and Tracy Chapman. [GRAHAM/GREENFIELD, p. 553] The president of Geffen Records was Eddie Rosenblatt. Geffen’s business manager was Jerry Rubenstein. Gil Segel helped to get him into real estate. [KING, T., 2000, p. 160, 184] “The funny thing,” says Geffen, “is that I had to forge a letter that I graduated from UCLA [to get an early job], and today I’m on the Board of Regents of UCLA.” [SMITH, p. 303] (“He used his friendship with [his client] Linda Ronstadt, who was then dating California governor Jerry Brown, to obtain a seat on the University board of regents.”) [KING, T., 2000, p. 316]

Jews even came to prominence behind the scenes in the world of country music. The first important Jewish figure in Nashville was Paul Cohen, the A&R man for Decca in 1945-58 (the Decca company in the United States was founded in Chicago by Jack Kapp in 1934). Cohen, who lived in New York and visited Nashville for a few weeks at a time, was “called by some ‘the King of Nashville.’” [JONES, M., p. 73] Margaret Jones notes that

“As head of A&R for Decca’s country division, Cohen was responsible for a blue chip roster of talent that included the top acts of the time: Ernest Tubb, Red Foley and Webb Pierce … In 1952, Cohen signed the one and only female star of country to Decca, Kitty Wells, and by 1954 he had two other solo girl performers under contract: Goldie Hill and Wanda Jackson … After Cohen signed Webb Pierce, Pierce became the hottest artist in country … [JONES, M., p. 74] … Nashville was Cohen’s ‘fishing hole,’ and he galvanized the town, convincing Ernest Tubb to record there; soon all the other acts fell into line.” [JONES, M., p. 73]

“Paul was one of the first Jewish guys who actually came in to Nashville, once they saw country music was getting to doing something,” recalled singer
Faron Young. “Before that, most of the country people wouldn’t accept Jewish people. They were too clannish about that. He more or less broke the ice, then the rest of them came in and more or less took over this business. Hell, they own all the labels and everything else now. Them and the Japs.” [JONES, M. p. 73]

Cohen also signed Brenda Lee and eventual country superstar Patsy Cline, among others, to his stable. “Cohen was a wheeler-dealer in many respects,” notes Margaret Jones, “He started a dozen or more publishing companies of his own – all named after brands of whisky. Then he had the chutzpah to open his office two blocks away from Decca, so he would be operating right under their noses.” [JONES, M., p. 71] When Cohen’s career was finished in Nashville, another Jewish Decca agent, Milton Gabler, “took over for him.” [JONES, M., p. 73]

Among his finds, Gabler signed Bill Haley and His Comets in 1954. (Irvin Feld is also credited with “discovering” Bill Haley, as well as Paul Anka, the Everly Brothers, and Fats Domino, among others). [BLACKWELL, E., 1973, p. 164] In this same genre, years later, country star Waylon Jennings recalled that his big break in Hollywood came through Jewish producer and musician Herb Alpert.

The Atlanta Jewish Times notes the story of the birth of another country star, Willie Nelson:

“[Jewish agent Joel Katz] received a phone call from a man with a distinct Texas drawl. The man said he had read about the contract Katz had negotiated for [Black pop star] James Brown. He didn’t have money, but he wanted Katz to make him a star. Katz hopped on a plane for Austin, Texas, walked into a room at the Ramada Inn, and stared into the eyes of Willie Nelson.” [POLLAK, S., 1-7-00]

Katz has represented a wide range of singers: from country stars Tammy Wynette, Waylon Jennings, and George Straight to African-American artists The Temptations, B. B. King, Stevie Ray Vaughn, Jimmy Buffet, and the rappers Rone Thugs and Harmony.

Finding a niche wherever it is available, by the late 1990s Madeline Stone was even a “leading writer of Christian music,” working with top Christian acts CeCe Wilnan, and the group Anointed. “I see myself,” she explained, “as being a Jewish girl who writes inspirational songs, not a Christian writer.” [DREYFUSS, I., p. Y4] A Reform Jew, Steve Kaufman, is also “the only three-time winner of the National Flatpicking Championship held in Winfield, Kansas.” As the Jerusalem Post notes,

“His 50 books and videos include A Smokey Mountain Christmas for Guitar and Flatpickin’ the Gospels. ‘My mother said ‘Oy,’” he recounted. “I said, “mom, it’s going to sell.” In this business you fill the void. There weren’t many bluegrass gospel videos.’” [ROBINSON, R., 7-24, 2000]

In the “heavy metal” musical world, Jewish entrepreneur Jon Zazula of Crazed Management-Megaforce Records has a stable of acts that includes Method of Destruction (M.O.D.), Anthrax, Ministry, Metallica, and others. Cliff Burstein and Peter Mensch have managed AC/DC, Metallica, Def Leppard, Bruce Hornsby, Queensryche, Tesla, and others. Their Q Prime company also owns three radio stations in California. Howie Klein founded the “punk” rock label 415.

The “godfather of punk,” manager and “mastermind” of the seminal “punk” band – the Sex Pistols, was Great Britain’s Malcolm McLaren. He was also the manager of the New York Dolls, Adam Ant, and Boy George. According to Sex Pistol lead singer Johnny Rotten, his manager was “the most evil man alive.” [HARRIS, M., 8-19-94, p. 11; SHAW, D., 12-16-99, p. 5] McLaren “was brought up by his maternal grandmother, Mrs. Corre, a formidable woman from a very rich Sephardic Jewish family.” [BARBER, L., 12-22-91, p. 8] The anarchistic Sex Pistols, notes the London Independent, were “brought into being quite cynically by Malcolm McLaren as an advertising gimmick to promote sales of the fetishistic clothes and other devices designed and sold by himself and Vivienne Westwood.” [GRAHAM-DIXON, 8-19-95, p. 2] (The Ramones are also a candidate for the most influential punk band. The head of the Ramones, Joey Ramone – born Jeffrey Hyman – is also Jewish.) [TAYLOR, L., 12-27-00, p. F5]

Joseph Heller, formerly of Heller-Fischel, booked acts like Styx, the Electric Light Orchestra, Boz Scaggs, and a variety of others. “He represented top-drawer rock talent like Van Morrison, the Guess Who, Marvin Gaye, War, Elton John and Pink Floyd.” [SNYDER, N., 2-19-01] Stretching out as dangerously as possible to make a buck, Heller eventually gravitated towards a relative goldmine in the Black ghetto-based “gangsta rap.” He cofounded Ruthless Records and managed the pioneer rap group NWA (Niggaz With Attitude) from early in their careers. The musical genre of gangsta rap, notes Jory Farr, “thrives on misogyny, as well as homophobic and race-baiting rage … [It] was the perfect music for [a] lifestyle loaded down … with warnings of betrayal, murder, revenge, and a short life.” [FARR, p. 70] “I believed that rap would become the most important music of the nineties,” said Heller, “… [But] you can’t sell two million rap records to kids in the inner city. That’s a way to sell 200,000. You have to market it to the white kids.” [FARR, p. 68, 71]

Heller hired Ira Selsky as his corporate attorney and an Israeli-born security chief named Michael Klein to ward off angry, exploited Blacks who quite literally walked into his office threatening to kill him. Rap star Ice Cube even threatened Heller in one of his recorded songs, prompting the Anti-Defamation League to flag it as anti-Semitic. Ruthless Records released a Jewish rap duo called Blood of Abraham. As Chuck D, the lead vocalist for the Black rap group Public Enemy, noted, “There’s no way to get trained on the seamiest elements of the music business being on the street – that element is reserved for boardrooms.” [D, CHUCK, p. 85] Those in Chuck D’s reminiscences about “boardroom” behavior include Lyor Cohen (manager of Rush Productions, and an Israeli); Al Teller, an executive at MCA whose parents died in the Holocaust; Steve Ralbovsky of CBS; Bill Adler (a publicist); and Rick Rubin of Def Jam Records. (Jewish diamond dealer Jacob Arabo has made the news as a favored jewelry merchant to the Black rap crowd that seeks to symbolize wealth and power, or, as the New York Times put it, “the jeweler who gives most of today’s leading rappers their shine.” [CENTURY, p. 1]
In 2001, Heller was named the “Godfather of Latin Rap” by the Los Angeles Business Journal; he was joining in attempting to build a rap movement in the Latino market via Hit a Lick records. As the Journal noted:

“If Heller is convinced that Latin rap will emerge as the next big thing, it probably will be, said other music industry veterans … Indeed, Heller is widely acknowledged as one of the key forces behind gangsta rap’s crossover into the music mainstream … While Heller has the second-tier title of chief operating officer, he acknowledges that the other partners ‘generally run everything by me because of my experience and expertise.’” [Snyder, N., 2-19-01]

By 2001 too, the aforementioned Lyor Cohen had catapulted to power in the Rap world. Rolling Stone even magazine featured an article about him, sub-titled How Lyor Cohen – the White, Jewish Israeli-Raised President of Island Def Jam Records – Became One of the Most Important Men in Hip-Hop, and Why He May Now Become One of the Most Important Men in Rock & Roll. Cohen started out promoting punk rock acts like the Circle Jerks, Social Distortion, and the Red Hot Chili Peppers. He then became president of the rap music label Def Jam in 1988 and soon had become “perhaps the most powerful white executive in an African-American business.” (Def Jam was bought out by the Jewish-owned Polygram company in 1999). Irv Gott, a Black record producer, notes that Cohen is “a white Jewish guy, but I think everybody respects him like he’s black. He knows how to carry it too. He knows how to get gangster, how to fall back, when to shut the fuck up, when to say something. That’s why other white executives are scared of him. He knows how to deal with the hoods, the criminal element.” Cohen, continued Rolling Stone, has broadened his musical base and “oversees an empire that includes hundreds of artists performing in dozens of genres, a roster that features PJ Harvey, American Hi-Fi, Shelby Lynne, Lionel Richie, Bon Jovi, Melissa Etheridge, Saliva, Ludacris, Kelly Price and Sisqó.” Cohen’s nickname is “Little Lansky” (after famed Jewish mobster Meyer Lansky). He was born in New York City “where his father, an Israeli, worked in the consulate.” He was later raised on an avocado farm near Tel Aviv. [Cohen, R., 6-21-01]

Cohen has also been active in trying to readjust Black consciousness of Jewish exploitation of the African-American community. “In the late Eighties,” notes reporter Rich Cohen, when [Public Enemy’s] album It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back was topping the charts, the group’s minister of information, Professor Griff, made several anti-Semitic statements. As a Jewish exec working with the band, Cohen found himself in the middle of a rough, formative experience. ‘When Professor Griff from Public Enemy said what he said, and it caused this whirlwind, the whole industry asked me, ‘What the fuck are you doing?’ says Cohen. ‘Every president of every record company called and said, ‘Drop them: But I believe part of being Jewish is education. And I believe I was instrumental in changing Public Enemy’s views. I said, “Your voice is being muted because you say Jews are this or that. You can’t make blanket statements. If you want your message out there” – and it was profound, I think – “stop generalizing.” And I was the only Jew in their lives. What if I resigned? They would only be more alienated. I hadn’t quite being a Jew. I can’t quit being a Jew. Instead, I tried to have an impact. I felt like I was doing the right thing. Not just as a Jew, as a person. They had a big voice da nation of millions, to quote their album. I had the Holocaust Museum [the Simon Wiesenthal Center] shut down, and we had a private tour. The first thing you see is a Jewish skull plus a black person’s skull equals a baboon. The last thing is a monkey with enormous lips dressed with a Star of David holding a trumpet and a sign saying, ‘It’s these Jews that are bringing in this music call jazz.’” [COHEN, R., 6-21-01]

Then there is former tax attorney Joe Weinberger who drives a Jaguar S-200, wears a diamond-studded Rolex watch and “fat gold rings,” and carries a “9mm automatic pistol tucked in his pocket.” As the Miami New Times notes about his rise to power in the African-American rap music world,

“In the early Nineties, Miami’s reigning booty-rapper, Luther Campbell, hired Weinberger away from the carpeted hallways of a swash Brickell Key law firm to help manage a growing musical empire and its attendant lawsuits. Within five years Campbell was bankrupt and Weinberger had purchased the rights to his music. Rather than return to the comfortable confines of his former life, the 42-year old lawyer, who is single and childless, opted to launch his own label, Lil’ Joe … In a post bankruptcy fire sale overseen by Richard Wolfe [Weinberger’s lawyer/partner, also Jewish], Weinberger bought the rights to 2 Live Crew music for about $800,000, plus the outstanding money he claims Campbell owed him.” [KORTEN, T., 8-10-2000]

Weinberger has even been accused of ordering a car bombing and directing death threats against an employee.

Then there is Canada-born Bryan Turner, who founded Priority Records in 1985; he is also Jewish. [JEWHOO, 2000] By 1998, Priority had yearly sales of $250 million. As the Los Angeles Times notes:

“When the pioneering gangster rap group N.W.A. was looking for its first record deal, it found a distributor in Priority Records, which released an album so obscene it prompted a letter of complaint from the F.B.I. When Ice-T left Warner Brothers Records after police groups and the company’s shareholders objected to his song ‘Cop Killer,’ he found a new home at Priority. When Suge Knight, the imprisoned head of Death Row Records, who is known for his pugnacious business tactics, was looking for his first deal, Priority gave it to him. Through all the violence and controversy of hardcore rap music – from its roots in N.W.A to its current resurrection with Master P – the Los Angeles label Priority Records has been a major player.” [STRAUSS, N., 9-3-98, sec. E, p. 1]

And as the Times noted on another occasion:

“When Time Warner first parted ways with rapper Ice-T after the ‘Cop Killer’ flap and then with rapper Paris over a song that portrayed an assassination fantasy of President Bush, Turner wasted little time signing deals with both artists.” [HOCHMAN, S., 7-30-95, CALENDAR, p. 82]

Jewish entrepreneur Steve Rifkind has also become very successful in the rap music field. In 1993, Rifkind founded and still heads Loud Records (its president is Rich Isaacson). Earlier, Rifkind began the Steven Rifkind Company, “a consulting firm specializing in Rap and R&B.” Loud acts include Wu-Tang Clan, Mobb Deep, Yvette Michelle, Funkmaster Flex, Alkaholics, Raekwon, and Xzibit. The company’s value is estimated at about $100 million. [collegemusic.com/1-11-00] “Rifkind,” notes the online magazine Entrepreneur, “who trademarked the term ‘Street Teams,’ takes marketing to the street literally – by hiring youths to tell their communities about his artists’ music. ‘My philosophy has always been ‘You can’t stop word-of-mouth, explains Rifkind, who has street teams across cities, distributing free singles to teenagers at housing projects and schools, and scrawling the names of his albums in the dust on parked trucks, which then serve as mobile billboards.” [entrepreneur.com]

Yet another major Jewish rap entrepreneur is the aforementioned Rick Rubin, who, says Jory Farr, found his “biggest stars were former gangsters who used beats and rhymes to glamorize wealth, dope, and violence. Deciding who to sign could be a moral quagmire … but Rubin wasn’t one to be bothered by the trivia of social responsibility.” [FARR, p. 126] “I could do anything I wanted,” Rubin once said about his own family life in New York, “We were always upper middle class. We were wealthy for the community we lived in. In a sense I was spoiled.” [FARR, p. 119]

Rubin’s record company Def American is now called American Recording; at one time Geffen Records distributed Rubin’s material. Earlier in his career he had signed bands like Slayer (whose lyrics exhorted “everything from virgin sacrifice and satanism to sadistic mutilations and the atrocities of Auschwitz” [FARR, p. 109]) and the Geto Boys, who “pushed misogyny and sadism to new depths.” [FARR, p. 108]

Rubin’s own star rose so high that he eventually produced albums for Mick Jagger and the Red Hot Chili Peppers. Troubles, however, came from a lawsuit against him by Adam Horowitz of the Beastie Boys and threats from the Meir Kahane-founded Jewish Defense League. Outraged by Rubin’s promotion of violently anti-Jewish lyrics by Black ghetto groups, the Jewish group reportedly came looking to beat him up. Rubin couldn’t understand their anger. He told an interviewer that “They should’ve talked to me and found out what I felt before coming to attack me, because I was a JDO [Jewish Defense Organization] supporter. When I was at NYU I saw [right wing rabbi] Meir Kahane speak and he blew me away – he was amazing … After hearing him speak, I wanted to pack my bags and go to Israel … I called the JDO several times, wanted to join, but they never returned my calls.” [FARR, p. 123]

Among the most controversial “gangsta rap” labels was Death Row Records (including Tupac Shakur, Dr. Dre, and Snoopy Doggy Dog). A noted earlier, Death Row products were distributed by the Jewish-dominated Time-Warner company until “pressure from stockholders after an outcry over the flagrantly violent and misogynist lyrics” of its stars. Time-Warner dropped the label, but eighteen months later it was picked up (for $200 million) by the Universal Music Group, a subsidiary of the Jewish Bronfman family’s Seagram company. Universal too eventually abandoned the controversial label, only after “pressure from stockholders and regulators.” [HELMORE, E., 8-29-97, p. 10]

Still another Jewish push – more recently – into the rap world is Koch Entertainment’s In The Paint record label. Koch, one of the largest “independent music distribution companies,” is headed by founder and CEO Michael Koch and President Bob Frank. [http://www.kochentertainment.com]

Jewish author Nearl Karlen doesn’t like latent Black perceptions of Jewish exploitation surfacing in the rap world, writing: “I want everybody to try and find this book!” rapper Ice Cube said at a 1991 press conference where he held up a copy of The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews, a bogus piece of Nation of Islam scholarship.” [KARLEN, N., 1994, p. 146] Karlen later applauds one rappers stand against “antisemitism,” saying: “Easy-E, former leader of the gangsta rap group N.W.A., made a courageous stand, going so far as to appear on a Jewish rap group’s single entitled ‘Niggaz and Jews (Some Say Kikes).’ Easy-E was not long after lectured by Omar Bradley, the mayor of his hometown of Compton, California, with ‘I won’t name the specific racial group that’s using you, brother, but they are destroying us and having lunch and a bar mitzvah at the same time.” [KARLEN, N., 1994, p. 146]

And lastly for the music scene, the president and CEO of the Recording Industry Association of America — a lobbying group (with a staff of 72) for the big record companies – is also Jewish, Hilary Rosen, who was described in 1997 by the Washington Post as “a powerful woman in an industry dominated by men. One of the most influential yet least known players in the U.S. entertainment behemoth.” [WEEKS, p. C1] Rosen became the CEO when another Jewish executive, Jason Berman, stepped down from the position.

C. Delores Tucker, the founder of the National Political Congress of Black Women, has singled out Rosen’s organization for special condemnation:

“In terms of children, the RIAA is the most destructive lobbying force in America. It is incomprehensible that anyone with an ounce of concern for children would be demanding the promotion, distribution, and sale of gangsta/porno rap to children.” [WEEKS, p. C1]

Another organization often under public fire for negatively influencing children and adolescents is the Interactive Digital Software Association, which represents nearly fifty video game companies. Doug Lowenstein, also Jewish, [who was once the Legislative Director for Ohio Senator Howard Metzenbaum], became the first president of the organization in 1994, and he remains in power. Lowenstein is often called upon to defend the excessive violence and decadence found in many of the games. “Video games,” he insisted in 1998, “are not the source of violence in society.” “The producer of Flesh Feast, Eric Wahlberg,” noted one media report, “agreed.” [MEDIA AWARENESS NETWORK, 5-29-98; BLOOM, D., 9-23-99, p. L8]

The most controversial video game for the early 1990s was Mortal Kombat, produced by Acclaim Entertainment. In an appeal to video firms, asking for restraint from excessive violence, California Attorney General Dan Lundgren noted that “Mortal Kombat depicts bloody decapitations as well as scenes where a still-beating heart is pulled from a body.” [SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE, 9-9-94, p. C7] Acclaim Entertainment is headed by Gregory Fischbach, once hired by Elliot Goldman (the president and CEO of RCA/ARIOLA) to head RCA/ARIOLA Record International. (Fischbach represented musical acts Crosby Stills and Nash, Emmylou Harris, Boz Scaggs, among others.) In 1998, Lawrence Kassanoff, CEO of Threshold Entertainment, was making a weekly TV series based on Mortal Kombat.) [KNOEDELSEDER, W., 6-18-86, pt. 4, p. 3; O’HARE, K., 12-27-98, p. 45]

For all the Jewish complaints that they are “marginalized” in American society and subject to Gentile-inspired self-hate, Jews have for decades been afforded mass media dominance in literally telling everyone else how to run their lives. “Dear Abby” (Pauline Esther Friedman Philips) and “Ann Landers” (Esther Pauline Friedman Lederer) – the twin Friedman sisters from Sioux City, Iowa – have been mentioned before. One or both of them have been listed in polls as among “the most admired women in the United States,” “the most important women,” and “the most influential women in America.” By the late 1980s both women were in demand in the national lecture circuit, commanding $10,000 for a half hour talk. [POTTKER/SPEZIALE, p. viii, 4]

The sisters’ father, Abraham, began a successful theatre business as co-owner of a burlesque house in a seedy part of Sioux City. [POTTKER/SPEZIALE, p. 15, 312] Ann (Esther) once admitted that she “learned the facts of life from the girls in the chorus line.” [P/S, p. 16] Both women are remembered by locals in Eau Claire, Wisconsin, where they later lived, for their ostentation: “their flare for making an entrance.” [P/S, p. 65] Both women took separate routes to advice column stardom, although “neither twin has had formal training in social service work or journalism.” [P/S, p. 4-5] A non-speaking, competitive feud between them lasted eight years.

Sister “Abigail Von Buren” eventually married Morton Phillips, Jewish heir to a Midwestern liquor fortune. In Eau Claire, the Phillips family also owned a factory, Presto Industry, (which gained national fame as a maker of pressure cookers) which alienated some in the town. “Many of the town’s blue-collar workers, resentful of their dependence on the Jewish-owned Presto Industry, openly made anti-Semitic remarks … [P/S, p. 65] … Despite the profits Presto reported in 1953, including an astounding 48 percent return on net worth the year before, Presto managers shocked union employees with a proposal for wage cuts.” [P/S, p.89]
“Dear Abby” sits on her husband’s $70 million philanthropic foundation. A millionaire many, many times over, she has also done advertising commercials for English muffins and a milk lobbying organization. Telling the world with assurance how to solve its problems, her own daughter spent five years in therapy with (the aforementioned) Judd Marmor. [P/S, p. 178-179]

Sister “Ann Landers” was married to Jules Lederer, founder of the Budget-Rent-a-Car company. In her columns she was “ever mindful of maintaining the facade of a happy marriage, … presenting her readers with the image of a devoted wife and loving husband.” [P/S, p. 216] In 1975, her husband of 36 years dumped her for a younger woman. “Gossip about the affair,” note her biographers, “had an extra zing to it. Jules was cheating on the woman who had set herself up as America’s moral conscience …” [P/S, p. 222] … Perhaps her public statements, years before her divorce, reflected her fears and insecurities over an empty marriage.” [P/S, p. 216] A friend of the Lederer family, therapist Abe Franzblau, who knew Ann Landers well, noted that “All it took was a short time in the Lederer company to realize that [Ann] exhibited the classic, textbook traits of a cold, rejecting woman.” [P/S, p. 217]

Landers also lives a life of extreme ostentation:

“The ornate showplace at 209 East Lake Shore Drive is still [Ann’s] home. Wall panels and sconces imported from a British castle complemented the mullioned windows and intricately sculpted ceilings. Re-casts of fifteenth-century statuary in the living room, including a covey of kneeling angels…, provide a stunning counterpoint to Louis XV sofas and mother-of-pearl inlaid chairs. Works by Picasso, Renoir, and Dali cover the walls … [Her husband] was offended by the extraordinary amount of money [she] was lavishing on their apartment.” [P/S, p. 219]

In 1995, Landers got into hot water with some comments she made in New Yorker magazine about the Pope and the Polish people. “He has a sweet sense of humor,” she said, “Of course, he’s a Polack. They’re very anti-women.” Polish-Americans responded with outrage to the slur, wondering how and why she had singled them out as being “anti-women.” Landers issued a formal apology but refused to comment further. [O’CROWLEY, P., 12-1-95, p. A1]

The woman who tells the little people of the world how to handle their lives, also had a chauffeur and housekeeper. [P/S, p. 229] The values she champions also reflect her behind-the-scenes “facelift” and “extensive body surgery.” Her sister, Abby, has also had cosmetic surgery. [P/S, p. 255] Both women, but especially Ann Landers, survived scandal in the 1980s when it was discovered that the two millionaires were sometimes doing nothing for their pay – merely recycling advice columns (not identified as reprints) from two decades earlier. [P/S, p. 277-283]

Concerning Jewish identity, notes Landers’ daughter Margo, “[My mother] made the rule when I went to college that I could only date Jewish boys … Mother was simply ethnocentric. She made it a point to tell everyone she was Jewish and often mentioned it in her column.” [HOWARD, p. 142-143]
(In 1987 there was a much publicized search to create a new “Ann Landers” when Esther Lederer left the Chicago Sun-Times to work at the Chicago Tribune. 12,000 people applied to become the new syndicated advice columnist. Jeffrey Zaslow, male, and also Jewish, was selected as one of two people to replace Landers. Zaslow’s column was called “All That Zazz”; his wife is also in the media business, a “TV news anchor.”) [ZASLOW, J., 1990; MOMENT, 12-31-96]

Another syndicated troubles columnist, Judith Miller (“Miss Manners”) is Jewish as is the popular media sex therapist “Dr. Ruth” (Westheimer) whose shows include her “Sexually Speaking” radio show, “Good Sex!” cable TV program, and “Ask Dr. Ruth” TV program. She has also lent her name to a “Good Sex” board game, a “Terrific Sex” videotape, and ads for condoms, bras, and typewriters. She has been afforded acting spots in movies and was a panelist on the TV game show “Hollywood Squares.” “I raised my children with an emphasis on Zionism and idealism,” writes Westheimer, “… They both went to Zionist summer camps … [When my daughter graduated from college] she announced that she was going to Israel to live. I knew it was coming – I had encouraged it.” [italics in original: WESTHEIMER, p. 180-181] (In 1996, the Cleveland Plain Dealer noted another Jewish sex therapist, Sherry Levine, who was making appearances throughout the national media. Levine, headlined the paper, “is the Dr. Ruth of Northwest Ohio.”) [YERAK, p. 8] Dr. Joy Kuriansky is another prominent Jewish media sex-therapist.

Elsewhere, the second-most listened-to radio talk show host in America is “Dr. Laura” (Schlessinger), who has been known to have her rabbi as a guest in her studio during her show. (Schlessinger’s favorite therapist? Rhoda Markovich “is the best therapist I know of.”) [SCHLESSINGER, L., 9-1-2000] “Geoff Rich [the president of Radio Today, was] one of the key people in marketing Laura.” [BANE, V., 1999, p. 165] Schlessinger, whose father was Jewish and who asserts an activist Jewish identity, has even incorporated herself as Dr. Laura Inc. She also has a syndicated newspaper column and two books that have together sold over two million copies — How Could You Say That? and Ten Stupid Things Women Do to Mess Up Their Lives. By 1997, 60,000 people were calling her program per day, seeking her advice on how to solve their problems; that same year she sold the rights to her radio show for $71.5 million. [MYERS, p. B6]

In 1999, an unauthorized expose of Schlessinger’s life was published by Vickie Bane, which portrayed the talk show host as an extremely unpleasant personality behind the scenes and a steady hypocrite in both her past and present, rarely following in her personal life the moral dictates she demanded for others on her talk radio show. In 1998, the news world also noted that “her conservative message had been sullied by the publication of 12 color photographs of her, either topless or nude, on the Club Love web site.” [BONES, p. A21] The photos were taken over 20 years earlier by her former boss, Bill Bal lance, who gave Schlessinger her start in radio; the photos were taken when she was separated from her first husband. Schlessinger unsuccessfully sued both her former lover and an Internet company.
“Schlessinger,” notes Yvonne Crittenden, “hasn’t spoken to her mother for fourteen years, and is equally estranged from her younger sister and family – more fodder for critics who claim she’s a hypocrite for espousing strong family values … She fell in love with a married Zoology professor – Lew Bishop (who was married with children at the time they met) … Schlessinger converted to Judaism after watching a show on the Holocaust with her son … [An article written by Leslie Bennetts of] Vanity Fair found her to be “cold and condescending, defensive, evasive and spiteful about those she’d worked with and hated by many formers friends and colleagues, all long before she became successful.” [CRITTENDEN, 10-10-99]

Schlessinger, notes Evelyn Theiss, is “particularly tough on callers who have been divorced, but she herself is a divorcee … By the sheer numbers of documented episodes of such outrageous behaviors, [author Vickie] Bane persuades us that this is a woman with some serious problems … There is plenty more of such behavior – an almost stultifying amount.” In 1998, “Schlessinger received Israel’s 50th Anniversary Tribute Award for her contributions to humanity.” [THEISS, 10-10-99] The Jewish Forward notes the brand of Judaism she practices:

“Ms. Schlessinger was born to a Jewish father and an Italian Catholic mother, but was raised without religion, she has said in interviews. Prompted by questions from her son, Derek, while they watched a Holocaust documentary, Ms. Schlessinger began to research her Jewish roots and ended up converting under the auspices of Conservative Judaism. She later joined Chabad-Lubavitch of Conejo in the Los Angeles area and underwent an Orthodox conversion two years ago. The Chabad congregation’s rabbi, Moshe Bryski, said Ms. Schlessinger regularly attends.” [EDEN, A., 2001]

The author, David Reuben, of the popular volume, Everything You Wanted to Know About Sex But Were Afraid to Ask, was also Jewish. And for decades, the prim know-it-all Jewish psychologist, Dr. Joyce Brothers, (real surname: Bauer) was omnipresent in the mass media (her ride to fame began on a TV game show when she won “top prize on the first leg of the $64,000 Question, telling twenty million TV viewers that ‘cestus’ was the name of the leather glove worn by ancient Roman boxers.”) Brothers was “the only member of the American Psychology Association who was ‘repped’ by General Artists Corporation, which said [in its handout to journalists] for background: she looks like Loretta Lynn, walks like Marilyn Monroe, and talks like Dr. Freud.”) [KRIM, p. 139-140] “She’s obviously a fraud,” wrote journalist Seymour Krim, “but I can’t undress her in public. It’s too goddamn cruel.” [KRIM, p. 140] Brothers has a syndicated column in 350 newspapers, a daily program on NBC Radio/Westwood One and “is a long-standing member of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies.” [HYMAN, p. 191]

Another Jewish psychiatrist in the talk show business was David Viscott. “At his peak in the early ’90s,” noted the Los Angeles Times, “he advised millions on both radio and television programs.” [ZAMICHOw, p. 10] Viscott had his own greeting card line, therapy audio tapes, and he had written two autobiogra-phies. His personal therapy sessions cost $1,500 for two hours, which helped finance his ostentatious lifestyle including a Jaguar automobile and a Hancock Park mansion. Consummate hypocrite, police were often called to his home to break up family fights. “Abrasively confident on the air,” says the Times, “megalomaniacal off it, Viscott was never in doubt about what other people should do with their lives. But when his own life began to crumble, he turned out to be clueless.” [ZAMICHOW, p. 10]

Other prominent Jewish American radio “shrink” talk-show hosts in the last decade have included Elyse Goldstein, Harvey Ruben, Harry Sobel, and Sonya Friedman (her show was entitled, “Telling Secrets with Sonya Friedman”). The pioneer (in the early 1980s) of this radio genre, however, was Toni Grant, “the first in the growing ranks of ‘media therapists’ who give free advice on the airwaves.” [BOSWORTH, p. 112] “While Grant is a nationally recognized advisor on love,” noted the Los Angeles Times, “she almost gave up finding it for herself.” “I’ve been single eight years,” she admitted. “And I confess openly that I was starting to wonder if all I knew how to do was talk about it.” [FINKE, p. VIEW, 5] It is difficult to locate any ethnic information about Grant, born and raised on Long Island. She may or may not be Jewish, but, judging by Al Goldstein, publisher of the free love, semi-porno magazine, Screw, she has travelled in some intimate Jewish circles. Goldstein told People magazine that, “she was the hottest sexual partner I ever had. But basically it was a dishonest relationship. I loved her fame. She loved my excitement.” [CHAMBERS, p. 70]

In 1987, Los Angeles Times journalist Al Martinez – intrigued by the avalanche of local telephone call-in therapy programs – decided to randomly select one of the therapists advertising in the Hollywood Reporter. The psychologist-entrepreneur turned out to be a Jewish woman named Audrey Levy. Her ad was for call-in psychological help, offering “telephone counseling out of Beverly Hills by calling 2-RELATE, credit cards accepted.” [MARTINEZ, pt. 9, p. 2]

In 1991, Larry King introduced his (Jewish) guest and “inspirational speaker” Marianne Williamson, like this:

“Who is that petit brunette standing behind the pulpit and why are some of Hollywood’s hottest stars listening? … Her detractors say she is a New Age guru more interested in self-promotion than teaching others about self help.” [KING, L., 9-26-91]

Jewish mass media psychology profiteers also dominate the scene in England. “Few people,” noted the London Sunday Telegraph in 1997, “have been so influential in British life in recent years as the four famous agony aunts [i.e., mass media personal problem advisers] – Marjorie Proops, Irma Kurtz, Anna Raeburn, and Claire Rayner. They have been empresses of pelvic epics and laureates of female personal pleasure.” They are also all Jewish. [MYERS, p. 26] “The role of the agony aunt is up for examination,” noted the Telegraph in another piece, “What makes a good one? There is a joke among top practitioners that the key qualification is to be a Jewish mamma.” “Maybe Jews have been so good at it because we have such an intense curiosity,” suggested Claire Rayner. [GRICE, p. 17] “Have you noticed,” Irma Kurtz once asked an interviewer, “that three-quarters of the agony aunts in the world are Jewish? We have carried common sense with us. Why are Jews violinists? You can pick it up and run.” [SCOTLAND ON SUNDAY, 2-13-94]

And what of the personal background of such people who have given advice to the emotionally needy for decades? What are their qualifications – other than mass media connections and great drive – towards counseling millions about etiquette, ethics, and healthy emotional lives? Late in their careers, there were startling revelations about each of the famous four in Great Britain, underscoring a profound audacity and hypocrisy at base in their professional careers.

In 1995 Claire Rayner, agony aunt for the London Sun, publicly confessed that “I’ve been a depressive all my life … I’m ashamed to admit that I’m still ashamed … In America you show off if you need psychiatric help, and in this country you’d rather die than get it.” [(SCOTTISH) DAILY RECORD & SUNDAY MAIL, 8-14-95, p.16] In turn, her husband “has been suffering from severe depression for ten years which at time have left him feeling suicidal. Despite his wife’s career as an agony aunt, he says she hasn’t been able to help.” [MIDDLEHOUSE, 7-26-99, p. 41] “I was beaten to hell and back as a child, “ she says, “… I hardly knew my mother so I couldn’t love or respect her. I did not have any self-esteem to speak of…” At the age of 15, she spent 14 months in a psychiatric hospital because of a “misdiagnosed thyroid problem.” The kind of woman qualified to give advice to the psychologically and ethically troubled?

Irma Kurtz? In 1999 the London Daily Mail noted that Kurtz, for over 20 years Cosmopolitan’s “personal problem solver … has given advice on everything from promiscuity and its consequences to abortion and the advisability of getting married too young. There would be those who argue that her own flawed emotional life is hardly conducive to dispensing considered, unbiased advice to women … Irma admits she was a recklessly promiscuous young woman who stopped counting the number of her lovers when they exceeded 38. At the age of 30, she had an abortion when her married lover got her pregnant. And she chose a man to father her child, with no intention of ever marrying him.” Kurtz notes that “when [my son] was eight or nine, I can remember getting very low and sometimes I would drink too much. There were a lot of nights in a row when I didn’t go to bed sober.” [MIDDLEHOUSE, 2-27-97, p. 46-47]

Marjorie Proops? In 1992 the London Daily Mirror noted that “In her Mirror column … she has often referred lovingly to her husband, giving the impression that she was writing from the experience and security of a happy marriage.” [BROOKE, 12-24-92, p. 2-3] In her biography of that same year, however, she admitted that it was a disastrous marriage. “Britain’s best known agony aunt had a largely sexless marriage accompanied by a secret 30-year affair” with the Daily Mirror’s chief lawyer, Philip Levy. (For his part, it was later revealed that he always met Proops at a hotel and never told her that he lived with another woman, Meli Meitner). Proops also had three abortions, a divorce, an alcoholic mother, and “chronic depression.” “Every agony aunt has a murky past,” she once said. “Most use the problems that they’ve had in the past to share with their readers.” [GRANT, p.23]

Anna Raeburn? She built her reputation on Capital Radio with a call-in advice show, the first of its kind in England. In 1998 the London Evening Standard noted that “she’s the agony aunt who has suffered more than her fair share of anguish: rape, two abortions, three suicide attempts, four periods of therapy. What next?” She once told an interviewer: “I’m not a nice woman. I have never been a nice woman. I did try it once and it didn’t suit awfully well.” Pregnant by her husband, she told him that he couldn’t “cope” with a child and secured an abortion. [BILLEN, 7-22-98, p. 23]

In 1994, Ann De Courcy, a critic in the London Daily Mail, lambasted the profound hypocrisy of this genre of “agony aunt”:

“What makes these women believe that they are specially gifted to offer moral guidance? … They have no hesitation in telling their readers how to be happy, nor in laying down moral guidelines that often smack of pure hypocrisy … Most people seeking made a success of their emotional life, rather than one traumatized by it.” [De Courcy, 2-1-94]

Other prominent Jewish agony aunts in Great Britain include:

- Vanessa Feltz. In 1999, she signed a $4 million deal with the BBC. Her qualifications for this career included the fact that “she was known as ‘Vanessa the Undresser’ and her interest in sex was such that her mother would ring up hostesses at teenage parties and tell them: ‘Don’t let her go upstairs [with any boys].’” Feltz wrote a book called What Are These Strawberries Doing on My Nipples? I Need Them for Fruit Salad and was a columnist for the Jewish Chronicle; she also presented “Jewish London” on Greater London Radio. Her comedy routines she described as “nice smut … [like] ‘Is sperm kosher?’” Her TV program’s formula, noted one critic, “is not only moronic, but can be deeply wounding [to those participants on the program].” The London Sunday Times also noted that “Vanessa lives in some grandeur with her husband and two daughters in a Hampstead mansion with a marble hall, a ballroom, and a swimming pool. She plays the much-loved part of the Jewish princess to perfection, clothes with jewelry like a medieval knight togged out for a tournament … She says she cannot understand the ‘non-Jewish way of dressing.’” [SUNDAY TIMES, 8-23-98]

- Miriam Stoppard. Her 25th book was The Magic of Sex and she was by 1991 an anchor woman at BBC’s morning program People Today. “Hailed … as the vixen of permissive parenting,” one critic said that “some are born to controversy, some achieve it, and some have controversy thrust upon them. She luxuriates in all three, and her latest book, Sex-Ed – Growing Up, Relationships and Sex, has nothing to diminish that status.” [GLOVER, 9-219-97, p. 7] Stoppard, noted another media observer, “married playwright Tom Stoppard when he divorced his first wife because Miriam was expecting his child.” [DE COURCY, 2-1-94]
Suzie Hayman, mass media “sex counselor” and author of The Good Sex Guide. “The only thing my mother ever said about my father was that he was not Jewish,” she says. “And yet when Dad was with my mother, he threw himself into the Israeli War of Independence … Why had he been prepared to put himself at such risks, if he wasn’t Jewish?” Hayman’s husband’s father was “violently anti-Semitic”; later she discovered that he was Jewish too. “And so,” she resolved, “as I have found time and time again with counseling others, the subconscious drives towards ‘martial fit,’ keys to common ground that we are not even told is there.” [HAYMAN, 12-24-97, p. 11]

In America, decadent radio commentator Howard Stern (with the third-ranked talk show radio in America), sensationaely obnoxious “shock” radio agitator Michael Savage (Weiner), sports commentator Howard Cosell (William Howard Cohen), talk show host Larry King, radio personality Dennis Prager, popular Los Angeles talk show host Michael Jackson (from South Africa), talk show physician Dean Edell, woman-beating sportscaster Merv Albert, Jerry Seinfeld, Ed Asner, and Roseanne Barr were/are Jewish. (“I remember [my mother] taking us down to the basement [at their home in Salt Lake City] if someone just came and knocked on the door,” says Barr, “I really truly believed that if anyone found out we were Jewish they would kill us.” [LAHR, p. 126]

Gossip queen Rona Barrett (Burstein) was Jewish, as was/gossip columnist Sheila Graham (Lily Shiel), gossip columnist Louella Parsons (whose father was Jewish), “Let’s Make a Deal” game show host Monty Hall, 50s-era television puppeteer Shari Lewis, popular media astronomer Carl Sagan, Henry Winkler (the Fonz), Gilda Radner, Carl Sagan, and Israeli psychic Uri Geller. Prominent Jewish film critics include Pauline Kael, John Simon, Stanley Kaufmann, Judith Crist (born Klein), Gene Shalit, Leonard Maltin, Gene Siskel (of Siskel and Ebert), and Joel Siegel of “Good Morning America” (among numerous other Jewish movie commentators). Assassinated Denver talk show host Allen Berg was Jewish, as is financial columnist Sylvia Porter, and many, many others are familiar Jewish mass media “personalities” to the public.

In earlier years, prominent Jewish sports voice personalities included Marty Glickman, Bill Stern (Sterngold) – “one of the best known voices on the airwaves,” [LEVINE, p., p. 232] and Mel Allen (formerly Mel Israel). Even the ex-wife, Claudia Cohen, of billionaire financier and corporate raider, Ronald Perelman, was a gossip columnist for the New York Post and later a TV reporter. [BRUCK, p. 218] Not surprisingly, her father is Robert Cohen, “the wealthy book and magazine distributor.” [SPORKIN, p. 150]

Profoundly influential in shaping American popular culture, it is estimated that seminal gossip columnist Walter Winchell (original family name: Weinschel) had an audience (for his weekly radio program or his daily newspaper column) of two-thirds of all American adults. [GABLER, Winchell, p. xi] His focus was brash and sleazy. Like most who are driven towards power, he was, notes Neal Gabler, “vindictive, cruel, egocentric, paranoid, selfish, cheap and thoroughly reprehensible [GABLER, p. xiv] … What made him a national phenomenon was gossip … Winchell introduced a revolutionary column that reported who was romancing whom, who was cavorting with gangsters, who was ill or dying, who was suffering financial difficulties, which spouses were having affairs, which couples were about to divorce, and dozens of other secrets, peccadilloes and imbroglios that had previously been concealed from public view … He suddenly and single-handedly expanded the purview of American journalism [GABLER, p. xii] … Few lives are more instructive of the forces that shaped mass culture in America than Walter Winchell’s.” [GABLER, p. xv]

In 2001, Jews gathered for a “special program for student journalists sponsored by the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities.” “Do Jewish journalists have more obligations than others?” asked the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California, “Are they responsible first to their communities, and do they need to represent Israel in their newspapers?” [RAGOLSKY, H., 11-23-01] “On campus there is already so much anti-Israel sentiment that we have to be careful about any additional criticism against Israel,” Marita Gringaus told a reporter,

“This is our responsibility as Jews, which obviously contradicts our responsibilities as journalists.” [RAGOLSKY, H., 11-23-01]

“I’m a Jew before I’m a journalist,” added Uzi Safanov, a reporter for Long Island University’s school newspaper,

“before someone pays me to write. If I find a negative thing about Israel, I will not print it and I will sink into why did it happen and what can I do to change it.” (“If he eventually wrote about negative incidents that happen to Israel,” added the Jewish Bulletin, “he would try to find the way ‘to shift the blame.’”) [RAGOLSKY, H., 11-23-01]

What of the case of the New York Times’ Tom Friedman, “a Jew who was raised on all the stories, all the folk songs, and all the myths of Israel.” [DIAMOND, E., 1993, p. 44] Edwin Diamond notes the personal “crisis” Friedman faced when he was confronted with reporting honestly (which he eventually did) about Israel’s involvement in the notorious Shatila-Sabra massacre of civilian Palestinians in Lebanon:

“Shatila-Sabra became a ‘personal crisis’ for Friedman, convinced as he was of Israeli knowledge – and probably, approval – of what happened inside the camp. Sitting at his typewriter, trying to reconstruct the massacre, he felt driven by ‘two conflicting impulses,’ the truth-telling role of a Times journalist and his private Jewish sympathies. ‘One part of me wanted to nail [Israeli Prime Minister Menachem] Begin and [Defense Minister Ariel] Sharon … Yet another part of me was looking for alibis – something that would prove Begin and Sharon innocent, something that would prove that the Israelis couldn’t have known what was happening.” [DIAMOND, E., 1993, p. 45]
In a much more practical expression of this censorial world view, in 2001, the Canadian CanWest media conglomerate (headed by ardent Zionist Israel Asper) announced that “We do not run in our newspaper Op Ed pieces that express criticism of Israel.” CanWorld, with media holdings in Ireland, New Zealand, and other countries, had earlier announced that it had acquired “all of the major Canadian newspaper and Internet assets of Hollinger Inc., including the metropolitan daily newspapers in nearly every large city across Canada and a 50% partnership interest in the National Post.” [ELECTRONIC INTIFADA, DECEMBER 11, 2001] CanWest also has major television interests in Canada and other countries.

In 1993, a former reporter for the Washington Post, Jeffrey Goldberg, addressed the issue of the “disproportionate” Jewish presence in the mass media and its implications:

“[There is a] particular perception about the Jews and the press, namely, that Jews own the presses, and not only the ones off Times Square … There certainly is a disproportionate Jewish presence in the newsrooms of major media organizations; anyone who knows what the suffixes ‘berg’ and ‘stein’ generally indicate would agree. But there is, of course, no Jewish conspiracy to control the press, and when I am asked how I know there isn’t (as I was long ago by an official of the [Lyndon] La Rouche organization), I offered two forms of proof: 1) No one has ever asked me to join such a conspiracy, even though my credentials for membership are impeccable; 2) If ‘the Jews’ really did control the media, coverage of the Jewish community and the issues that interest it would be far superior to what we see today.” [GOLDBERG, JEFFREY, 1993]

Are Goldberg’s “proofs” convincing? Are there any legitimate signs of a “conspiracy” (whatever the semantic nuances of that word) in the American mass media about expressly Jewish and Israeli themes? By what reasoning should we ignore, in the mass media context, incessant in-house ethnocentric Jewish discourse about their collective superiority, international solidarity with other Jews, the sacredness of the Holocaust, and special attention to Jewish welfare? Need pan-Jewish activism express itself today in “conspiratorial” form, in the sense of a secret spy ring? How can the everywhere celebrated and distinct Jewish world view – religious or secular – be completely discarded in any reasoned analysis of Jewish dominance in the mass media? (Many Jews declare this in their in-house writings. As Eric Kahler observes, for example, about highly assimilated Jews of Europe, “Such distinguished personalities as [Heinrich] Heine, who was a skeptic, an intellectual adventurer, as [Baruch] Spinoza, as [Franz] Kafka, whose devotion was entirely unorthodox, unfixed, exploratory, a Bernard Lazare who was a freethinker, and as Werfel, who was almost a Catholic – all of them show attitudes and proclivities, clearly deriving from the Jewish religion.”) [KAHLER, E., 1967, p. 7] And is not transnational Jewish solidarity (so much highlighted and heralded by modern Jewish observers) manifest in a purely “naturalized” manner the virtual norm in today’s media workplace?
And what of Goldberg’s own case? Here’s an American-born reporter who, as we learn in his own writings about the lack of a “conspiracy” among Jews in the media, volunteered for service in the Israeli army. Is this of no consequence in speculating upon this man’s objective journalism as a former Washington Post reporter? Perhaps Goldberg will run across fellow journalist Bruno Schlumberger in Israel. Schlumberger is a staff photographer for the Ottawa Citizen who was sent on assignment to the Jewish state in 1998 to cover its fiftieth anniversary celebration. “I couldn’t sleep, so thrilled was I to be in Israel,” wrote Schlumberger in the paper, “… When I was in high school I joined Habonim, the Labour-Zionist youth movement.” [SCHLUMBERGER] (Although soured on religious Orthodoxy in Israel, former Cleveland Plain Dealer editor Stephen Esrati was once even a member of the Zionist terrorist Irgun Zvai Leumi organization. [GUTH, D., 12-8-00] Hank Greenspun, publisher of the Las Vegas Sun, as noted earlier, even broke American laws in delivering weapons to Israel.)

And what of the following observations by Israeli Ze’ev Chafets?

“In a study undertaken in the winter of 1979-80, Professor S. Robert Lichter found that fully ninety-one percent of the Jewish journalists he surveyed agreed with the statement “The United States has a moral obligation to prevent the destruction of Israel … [CHAFETS, 1985, p. 279]

Can we expect that these Jewish journalists have the same noble “moral” obligations about El Salvador, Argentina, Afghanistan, Poland, Russia, Kenya, France, Iran, the Philippines, or anywhere else? How about the “destruction” of the Palestinians by Israel?

Here’s Max Frankel (for years the Executive Editor of the New York Times) and his thoughts about Israel in his work:

“I was much more deeply devoted to Israel than I dared to assert. I had yearned for a Jewish homeland ever since learning as child in Germany that in Palestine even the policemen were Jews! Like most American Jews, however, I settled on a remote brand of Zionism, which rejected all importuning to move to Israel to share its hardships and dangers … I did indeed have many close Israeli friends, not only relatives and journalists but high officials, ranging from Yitzhak Rabin to Lova Eliav. That is why I well understood the full range of Israeli opinion on all of the country’s vital security concerns … Fortified by my knowledge of Israel and my friendships there, I myself wrote most of our Middle East commentaries. As more Arab than Jewish readers recognized, I wrote them from a pro-Israel perspective. And I wrote in confidence that The Times no longer suffered from| any secret desire to deny or overcome its ethnic roots.” [FRANKEL, M., 1999, p. 401, 402, 403]

When push comes to shove in the world of patriotic allegiance, or merely objective journalism, where do such men (particularly a Jeffrey Goldberg or Bruno Schlumberger) stand? And what about an American-born Israeli soldier who scoffs at the “conspiratorial” view of Jewry, asserting that no fellow Jews came around in the newsrooms of America, asking him to join a special underground organization? As Goldberg well knows, no one needs to ask him to join anything: by religious or secular perspective, the “organization” is a birthright. The modern state of Israel codifies this fact: any Jew can emigrate to Israel by virtue of his genetic identity. And pan-Jewish solidarity and its collectivist perspective is so widely enshrined in the American mass media (and American culture as a whole) that there is in fact nothing at all “conspiratorial” about it whatsoever, since it is, after all, the prevalent, naturalized norm of operation for all. And yet few recognize – and no one dares risk a challenge to – it.

And the charge of Jewish “conspiracy?” What does that mean? What are the word’s nuances? Do the “behind the scenes” unified wheelings and dealings of hundreds of Jewish organizations that seek to maintain the unpopular “separation of Church and state” fit the bill? Is a lack of public honesty and candor about Jewish belief, purpose, and identity part of the same paradigm? As Jewish sociologist Arnold Eisen notes about a veritable Jewish American cultural trait:

“Many [Jewish] informants [in one academic study] demanded assurance of the interviewer’s Jewish background before volunteering certain responses (especially those reflecting their less public attitudes about dominant [Gentile] groups) … [EISEN, p. 144] … [The Jew in public] represents his people before another, and knows that if his behavior is found wanting, his people as a whole will suffer. He must manipulate the opinion which others have of him and, as the sociologists observe, such manipulation is acceptable in secondary relations but not in friendships requiring candor and trust.” [EISEN, p. 144]

In this regard of Jewish protective self-censorship, Lesley Hazleton notes the case of an Israeli journalist:

“One of Israel’s top journalists had been asked by an American magazine to write an article called ‘Has Israel Lost Its Soul?’ He turned down the assignment. ‘Why?’ someone asked. ‘You’ve been saying it often enough in the Hebrew press.’ He gave a despairing shrug: ‘I can’t. It’s read differently in the States. Knowing that, I’d only end up writing an apologia.’” [HAZELETON, L., 1984, p. 26]

In other words, the man felt that he couldn’t write the truth about Israel in English (perhaps in part because American Jews/media powers were biased towards apologia), but, more importantly, his critical thoughts would be revealed in a language that could also be read by a non-Jewish audience. As Peter Novick notes about journalists in the ethnic Jewish press: “They are ‘less Jewish’ in that their public role, the fact that they know what they say is being listened to by a gentile audience, may make their utterances less frank, less expressive of spontaneous feelings, more ‘correct,’ than conversation around the kitchen table.” [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 38]

And the formal, institutionalized Jewish apologia for the subject of Jewish dominance in the mass media? After conceding the obvious in the year 2000 (that even a Jewish scholar, Steven G. Kellman, noted that “most” of the “100 most powerful people” in Hollywood were Jewish, and that “boosters and anti-Semites agree: Jews have been prominent and predominant in all phases of the [motion picture] business: production, distribution and exhibition”), the Anti-Defamation League was still taking the only apologetic spin on these facts available to it:

“Though individual Jews control Hollywood, Jewishness does not … The ADL believes that the recitation of numbers and percentages is not the answer to the false charges of Jewish ‘control’ of the motion picture industry, or, indeed, of similar accusations involving the media, banking, finance and other businesses. Reliance on statistics alone plays into the hands of anti-Semites.” [ADL ONLINE, SEPT 1999]

Indeed it does. This is a profound concession in formally admitting the obvious. What else can the ADL say, lest it be caught as a public liar in refuting the notion of Jewish “predominance” in the mass media? Yet the key, however untenable, to the ADL’s Jews dominate the media, so what? argument, is that Jews don’t “in any field act in concert with other Jews similarly situated simply because they happen to be Jewish.” [ADL ONLINE, SEPT 1999]

Maybe not in whether they root for the Los Angeles Dodgers or New York Yankees, but what reasoned analysis of Jewish identity and politics can possibly assert that they have no collective agenda in the mass media? [See also, for example, later discussed Jewish collective efforts in American government towards molding American foreign policy in support of Israel]. A recurrent subject on entertainment television, for example, as noted by Jewish researchers Jonathan and Judith Pearl, is anti-Semitism, a subject that – as we have earlier seen – is virtually non-existent in modern America. But it is a crucial antithetical foundation (against non-Jews) of Jewish identity and socio-economic advantage/advancement. As the Pearls note about their fifteen years of television research:

“The various manifestations of anti-Semitism that popular television has portrayed have been almost unlimited … The continued existence of modern anti-Semitism is reflected in the numerous programs that dramatize its many manifestations … [TV] invariably depicts anti-Semitism as an ugly, abhorrent trait that must be fought at every turn … Non-Jews often have a strong and prominent role in the battle against anti-Semitism … For the vast majority of Americans who are not Jewish, watching their favorite TV character do battle with religious bigots can be an important influence. And often, non-Jewish characters can make inroads against anti-Semitism on their own turf in ways that Jews cannot … [PEARL/PEARL p. 103-104] … Anti-Semitism is clearly presented in the television dramatic programs as an injustice that should be constantly fought. In virtually no program is the derogation of Jews or Judaism left unchallenged either by inference, word, or action … This kind of portrayal projects the important message that fighting anti-Semitism is not solely a Jewish concern but the responsibility of all people.” [PEARL/PEARL p. 130]

In 1980, Patricia Erens, noted Jewish dominance throughout the mass media and its self-protection:

“Although anti-Semitic literature [in America] has appeared in every decade, anti-Semitism has not been a dominant or even prevalent aspect of the mass media (newspapers, radio, film, television) or the fine arts (painting, literature, drama). Therefore, it is not surprising to discover that although negative portrayals of Jews exist in film, little overt anti-Semitism occurs. The large number of Jews who hold the reins of Hollywood’s power prevented this.” [ERENS, P., 1980, p. 117]

And what about the ceaseless avalanche of Holocaust-related material throughout the mass media, (as noted in detail elsewhere) including, for example, the front page 1999 article in a Los Angeles Times by Jewish author Josh Geitlin? Again and again, special sympathy is demanded by the public for “Jewish survivors” (and Jews in general), now in their old age. In this case, readers are informed that “as they get older, a lot of these people feel like they’re facing extinction for a second time.” [GEITLIN, p. 1] This “extinction,” as the article notes, is death itself, something – apparently lost to the author of the piece – no Jewish suffering, of “survivor” quality or not, has a corner on.

As Jewish scholar Peter Novick notes why Jewish victimology themes – especially the Holocaust – of the Jewish power elite is so omnipresent in popular culture:

“There are many reasons why concern with the Holocaust among the 2 or 3 percent of the American population that is Jewish came to pervade American society. I will mention one important reason here, if only because it is often nervously avoided. We are not just ‘the people of the book,’ but the people of the Hollywood film and television mini-series, of the magazine article and the newspaper column, of the comic book and academic symposium. When a high level of concern with the Holocaust became widespread in American Jewry, it was, given the important role that Jews play in American media and opinion-making elites, not only natural, but virtually inevitable that it would spread throughout the culture at large.” [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 12]

Let us also turn to other specific Jewish/Israeli issues in the mass media and widespread Jewish-enforced censorship against addressing, let alone scrutinizing, the dominant Jewish presence at the upper echelons of the mass media and its influence in shaping American popular culture. The taboo against this subject is itself institutionalized, usually by dismissing any queries about the subject as both groundless and nakedly anti-Semitic. At a New York Times-sponsored question-and-answer session for the foreign press in 1987, for example, Mato Sato, a press officer at the Japanese mission to the United Nations, made waves for daring to ask Jewish New York Times Foreign Editor (later Executive Editor) Joseph Lelyveld why the Times covers “so many Jewish stories” and “how many Jewish editors are employed at the New York Times?” Sato apparently did not realize that asking such questions are forbidden and considered “bizarre” (to use Lelyveld’s description of them) in American society. Lelyveld responded, said the Jewish Week, by saying “that he was unaware of employees’ religious backgrounds.” (This is a curious response for someone whose own father is a rabbi). [ATLAS, J., 6-7-2000] (Lelyveld was appointed to be Executive Editor by the Times ‘Jewish owner Arthur Ochs Sulzberger in 1994, fol-
JEWISH INFLUENCE IN THE MASS MEDIA (PT. 3)

Jewish scholar David Grossman (who coauthored a book with a Japanese scholar about Japanese “cultural stereotypes” about Jews) noted the Sato incident, saying that the inquirer’s “questions were tactless and displayed astonishing naïveté, but they were probably not malicious and the intense reaction he received bewildered Japanese observers, who failed to understand what he had done wrong.” [GOODMAN, p. 10] (Meanwhile, while Jews and Israel are institutionally protected from examination of their collective power in the mass media, economic, social, and political worlds, it is apparently no problem for anyone that Marvin Wolf wrote a book in recent years entitled The Japanese Conspiracy, that Daniel Burstein wrote Yen! Japan’s New Financial Empire and Its Threat to America, or that Pat Choate called his own work Agents of Influence: How Japan Manipulates the American Political and Economic System. At least two of these three authors are Jewish: all three surnames can be found in Jewish surname databases. In Burstein’s case, he links Japanese self-identity to Hitler’s Master Race concept and even mentions the Japanese reporter’s inquiry [about how many Jews work at the New York Times and why there were so many articles about Jews] to be an example of Japanese anti-Semitism). [BURSTEIN, D., 1988, p. 72-73]

Sato might well have asked the same questions about the Jewish stories in the Washington Post. A Jewish scholar, Barry Rubin, notes that “Three of four main articles in the July 22, 1990 Washington Post features section were about assimilating Jews who had made widely different choices – Andrew Dice Clay [Silverman], Sandra Bernhard, and Allen Ginsberg. That newspaper’s October 18, 1992 reviews section is full of books by or about Jews: on sports and the American Jewish experience; a biography of Bill Graham, a Holocaust survivor and leading rock and roll impresario; the story of a upper-class New York family infected by anti-Semitism; a South African woman’s group portrait of her set of Jewish friends; a Jewish couple’s volume on foreign investments in America, analyzing problems of multiple loyalties and foreign influence paralleling issues in assimilation; and a Jewish author’s book on politics in higher education, discussing multiculturalism in terms drawn from the integration of Jews into American society.” [RUBIN, p. xiii]

Earlier, Rubin (whose specific interest is declared to be Jewish assimilation into American society), notes that “An author knows a subject is compelling when it seems omnipresent. For example, the April 1991 Vanity Fair contains four relevant articles concerning Alfred Stieglitz, scion of a rich German Jewish family who founded art photography in America and wed Georgia O’Keeffe; Lady Mary Fairfax, whose family migrated from Poland in the 1920s and who became a powerful press lord and doyenne of Australian society; Charles Feldman, head of Famous Artists Agency and the great love of Jean Harlow; and the actress Ali McGraw, whose Hungarian mother would never admit to being Jewish.” [RUBIN, p. xii]

Of course the American mass media is regularly flooded with stories about Israel. As Doug Bloomfield, “former chief lobbyist for AIPAC, the pro-Israel lobby on Capitol Hill”, remarked:

“If E.T. had stayed in the U.S. and read the New York Times, the Washington Post, or the Christian Science Monitor, or had watched the network news instead of riding around in bicycle baskets, when he finally returned home and they asked him, ‘What is it like on earth?’ – the first thing he would have said is, “There are three superpowers. There is Israel and two others.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 33]

The Judeo-centric world view of film director Mel Brooks suggests, increasingly, a useful paradigm in analyzing the Jewish entertainment world. As Andrea Most observes,

“The humor in Brooks’ movies originate in the idea that everything and everyone is Jewish – and it is his job to reveal it as such. So the oldest man in the world is Jewish (The Two Thousand Year Old Man), the Indians are Jewish (Blazing Saddles), Sherwood Forest’s Merry Band is Jewish (Robin Hood: Men in Tights), the past is Jewish (History of the World), and the future is Jewish (Spaceballs).” [MOST, A., 1999, p. 337]

In the Arab-Jewish political field, in 1985 American media reports were swamped with stories about the horrible death of wheelchair-bound Leon Klinghoffer, an American Jew murdered by Palestinian ship hijackers of the Achillo Lauro. Yet, notes Israeli Amnon Rubenstein, “In the aftermath of the hijacking, the United States media covered his death in great detail … The same week, Alex Odeh, a United States citizen of Palestinian descent who was the West Coast Director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, was murdered by a bomb explosion [later attributed by the FBI to an act of terrorism by the Jewish Defense League]… Odeh’s death was virtually ignored by the national media.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 157]

“The truth of the matter,” said novelist Truman Capote on the Johnny Carson Show in 1973, “… is the entire cultural press, publishing … television … theatre … film industry … is almost 90% Jewish-oriented. I mean, I can’t even count on one hand five people of any importance – of real importance – in the media who aren’t Jewish. Here’s this God-damned Jewish mafia working tooth and tong on the New York Review of Books, the New York Times, whether they’re doing it consciously or not. And mostly they’re doing it consciously.” [FORSTER, p. 108-109] Needless to say, Capote’s public comments are mainstays in Jewish-written books about Anti-Semitism.
In 1988 John Hohrn, a Black official at the Mississippi film commission, was assailed by the Anti-Defamation League and other Jewish groups for the following comment:

“You hear people say, ‘Well, that’s civil rights – that story’s been told already.’ But no one has questioned the right of the Jewish community, which controls the media, to retell the story of the Holocaust.” [JEWISH WEEK, 1-15-88]

ADL attorney Betsy Ross denounced Hohrn’s clause about Jews to be “obnoxious ... This person needs an education. His comments about Jews controlling the media is completely inaccurate. It’s an age-old anti-Semitic canard.” [JEWISH WEEK, 1-15-88, p. 33]

This “anti-Semitic canard” of Jewish media dominance has held credence, albeit discretely, in some pretty high places. According to the memoirs of H. R. Haldeman, President Richard Nixon’s Chief of Staff, during one closed door session with his boss, “there was a considerable discussion of the terrible problem arising from the total Jewish domination of the media and agreement that this is something that would have to be dealt with.” [NEW YORK TIMES, 5-18-94, p. A19] Nixon’s vice-president, Spiro Agnew, even spoke publicly about Jews and the mass media, complaining that the American media “was unduly influenced by Zionist opinion ... All you have to do is look around and see who owns the networks, who owns the Washington Post ... the New York Times ... As you look around in ... the big news business you see a heavy concentration of Jewish people.” [VOLKMAN, p. 104] Even when Richard Nixon signed with Warners to write his memoirs, the people (including his press secretary) who arranged the deal were all Jewish:

“The price, according to the agent, Irving ‘Swifty’ Lazar, would be $2 million. Lazar met with William Sarnoff and Howard Kaminsky of Warners Communications and Nixon’s former press secretary, Ron Ziegler, and sealed the deal with handshakes.” [BAGDIKIAN, p. 34]

In the entertainment world, country singer Dolly Parton was forced to apologize to the Jewish community for telling Vogue magazine that “everybody’s afraid to touch anything that’s religious because most of the people out here [in Hollywood] are Jewish and it’s a frightening thing for them to promote Christianity.” TV personality Kathy Lee Gifford (whose own father – Epstein – was Jewish) also publicly apologized for complaining that “they’re changing who crucified Jesus,” during a TV show that discussed recent New Testament changes. [ROSENFELD, p. 61] “When the NRA [National Rifle Association] exercises political power,” noted Jewish journalist Philip Weiss, “it’s a hot-button issue. When Jewish money plays a part [in politics], discussing it is anti-Semitic. If you say anything about [Jewish power in] Hollywood, you are shouted down.” [WEISS, p. 32]

In 1990, Giancarlo Parretti, an Italian financier (with alleged links to the criminal underworld) complained to an Italian newspaper that “the Jews have ganged up on me ... The fact is that the Jews don’t like the idea that I represent the first Catholic communications network … There isn’t a single [media] holding company in the world that isn’t in the hands of the Jews.” [TUGEND, T, p. 37]

Parretti was widely attacked for anti-Semitism for this statement. The Los Angeles Times quoted a “veteran Hollywood leader” as saying that “it’s one thing to note that many prominent figures in all aspects of Hollywood are Jewish and always have been. It’s quite another, however, to make hostile statements on that fact.” “As an anti-Semite,” said another movie executive, “I don’t see how he could ever function in this town.” Rushing to Parretti’s defense was Yoram Globus, a Jewish co-President of Paretti’s Pathe Communications Corporation (which had earlier taken over the Canon Group, owned by the Israeli-born Globus and his cousin Menahem Golan). “There is not even an inch,” proclaimed Globus, “of anti-Semitism in him.” [TUGEND, T, Hollywood, p. 37]

In 1994, William Cash’s aforementioned comments in Great Britain’s the Spectator about Jews controlling Hollywood drew widespread attack and publicity. Both the New York Times and Chicago Tribune featured prominent articles about Cash’s speaking the unspeakable in a distant overseas publication. The Toronto Star even joined in with a headline proclaiming, “Anti-Semitic Article Shakes Hollywood.” [TORONTO, p. C4] A group of Hollywood actors wrote a letter (see http://jewishtribalreview.org/cash.htm) to the Spectator accusing Cash’s piece of “racist cant” and “anti-Semitic stereotypes.” Jewish author Neal Gabler, in condemning Cash’s ideas of excessive Jewish power in Hollywood, told a Jewish newspaper that Cash was “only contrite to the extent that he feels he has damaged his career – which of course he has. [Cash was a Hollywood-based reporter for London’s Daily Telegraph.] I can’t imagine anyone [in Hollywood] wanting to meet with him after that article.” [CENTURY, p. 1] This danger of Cash losing his entire journalistic career, of course, is the paradigm for the reason that those who know well Jewish dominance in the mass media cannot give public voice to the fact.

Among those formally complaining directly to Cash’s regular employer – the aforementioned Conrad Black, owner of the Daily Telegraph – was Britain’s powerful Jewish Board of Deputies lobbying body. Not only does Black own the Telegraph, he also owns the Spectator, the journal in which Cash’s offending article appeared. Jewish omnipresence in the mass media is so great that even the editor of the Spectator itself, Dominic Lawson, was Jewish – the son of former British chancellor Nigel Lawson. [WOOLF, p. 1] For Cash’s simple telling of the truth, Rabbis Marvin Hier and Abraham Cooper of the Los Angeles Simon Wiesenthal Center charged the sensationally absurd libel that the British author “has actually plagiarized a page from the playbook of [Nazi theorists] Julius Streicher and Joseph Goebbels … fanning the flames of bigotry and genocide.” [RICHLER, p. 32]

Referring to the Vanity Fair article addressing 16 Hollywood media moguls that Cash used as reference in his own piece, apologist Gabler – author of a book on (in his own words) the “Jewish invention of Hollywood” – complained that those 16 “are not predominantly Jewish at all. Only nine of the 16 are Jewish.” When the (Jewish) Forward pointed out that Gabler’s own books focused predominantly on Jews, he responded, “What I’m interested in are the figures who shaped popular culture in the 20th century, and because such a disproportionate number are Jewish, the subject inevitably arises.” [CENTURY, p. 1]

Richard Neuhaus in the National Review pointed out the craziness, and even sinister intent, of the Jewish Cash crucifixion:

“Some Jews have ratcheted up to an almost painful degree their antennae for the detection of anti-Semitism. A few months ago, the New York Times went ballistic when the London Spectator ran a little article on the self-described dominance of Jews in Hollywood. The somewhat naive Spectator author thought he was doing nothing more than reporting on interesting circumstances; as it turned out, he was in large part relying on what Jewish writers had said about Jews in Hollywood. The young man did not understand that non-Jews are not supposed to notice when Jews publicly celebrate Jewish influence and success. As anyone familiar with the large role of Jews in American history knows, the large role of Jews in American popular entertainment goes back to the nineteenth century and, far from being a secret, has been frequently extolled in film and song. With weeks of letters and commentary in the Spectator, our British cousins had great fun with this little squall, chalking it up as yet another instance of American hypocrisy about our professed devotion to free speech.” [NEUHAUS, p. 52]

British journalist Charles Cummings noted that

“It’s a delicate subject. Mention the relationship between Hollywood and Jews and you can land in some very hot water. Journalist William Cash discovered this in 1991 when he wrote an article for the Spectator about the increasing influence of Jews in the American entertainment industry. More than a dozen movie luminaries – including Charlton Heston, Barbara Streisand, and Steven Spielberg – sent an impassioned letter of complaint to the magazine, chastising Cash as a latter-day Nazi and complaining about the trite and vulgar stereotypes in which he had couched his argument. Yet the thrust of the piece was accurate.” [CUMMINGS, p., 15]

As James Atlas noted in 2000:

“The Jewish dominance in the media, in newspapers and magazines and Hollywood and the publishing industry, is an old story (not that its implications have been very arduously explored); I continue to find myself baffled – and not a little amazed – by the popularity of an insipid narcissist like Jerry Seinfeld, but he has certainly achieved market penetration as a representative Jew.” [ATLAS, J., 6-2000]

In 1997, British author John Le Carre (David Cornwell) also found himself in hot water with the Jewish Thought Police. In the best interests of his writing career, he had to grovel before England’s Anglo-Israel Association “to lecture them on his reasons for detesting anti-Semitism, and to defend himself against charges which had been made against him on another continent.” Years earlier, his third novel, The Spy Who Came In from the Cold, had stirred “Jewish American organizations,” noted the London Sunday Telegraph, “to know whether he equated Jew with communist.” Le Carre recounted worse charges against his last novel, The Tailor of Panama:

“We sat head in hand in my American editor’s office, the New York Times review of The Tailor of Panama before us, telling us that consciously or not I had been listening to the internal voices of my English anti-Semitism as I wrote my novel. What could I possibly say in reply? … I wanted to tell the New York Times that to publish a smear of anti-Semitism on such arbitrary grounds was a serious act of editorial irresponsibility. But a tumult of alarm broke out among my well wishers. 'If you write that, your career in the United States will be ruined.’” [WAUGH, A., p. 39]

In a rare case of justice against Jewish-directed persecution, in 2000 William Quigley was awarded $10.5 million in a suit against the Denver, Colorado, regional Anti-Defamation League. A jury trial found the ADL to be itself guilty of defamation for publicly accusing Quigley and his wife of anti-Semitism. As the Cleveland Jewish News observed:

“William Quigley, an executive in the film industry, claimed that as a result of the public anti-Semitism charged against him, his career was severely damaged. After the charges he was shunned by colleagues, most of whom were Jewish, he said.” [KARFELD, M., 5-19-2000, p. 24]

This man, surrounded by Jews in the film industry, lives in Denver, not Los Angeles or New York.

Jewish censorship of free speech about them in the mass media has taken an even more sinister form in Canada. In 1994, Doug Collins, a veteran journalist for Vancouver’s North Shore News, (with a circulation of only 60,000) wrote a review of Stephen Spielberg’s Holocaust movie, Schindler’s List, thereby launching into a critique of the Jewish Holocaust mythology as a political and economic weapon, and a lambaste of Jewish power in Hollywood. His article was entitled “Hollywood Propaganda.”

“I think [Collins] made some valid points,” said his editor, Tim Renshaw. “I wouldn’t have approved the column if it was over the top.” [BROOK p. 58] “I’ve published Doug Collins for fifteen years,” added Peter Speck, the publisher of the North Shore News. “He has written 1,500 columns for me, and he’s a fine man, a fine journalist, he’s a pro, he’s the recipient of a military medal, he served with distinction in the Second World War, and he was captured by the Germans and he escaped ten times. Ten times!” [BROOK, p. 58]

In response to Collins’ article, the Canadian Jewish Congress solicited a handful of other organizations to join it in pressing criminal charges against Collins under a 1993 British Columbia “anti-hate” law which the B.C. Press Council and B.C. Civil Liberties Union decried as a suppression of free speech in a democratic society. The law, for the first time tested, prohibited the publication of material “that is likely to expose a person or group or class of persons to hatred or contempt because of race, color, ancestry, place of origin, religion, martial status…” etc., etc. etc. [BROOK, p. 58]

In 1997 Collins went to trial.
The lawyer for the Canadian Jewish Congress, Gregory Walsh, “argued [that] the column exposed Jewish people to hatred.” [TODD, JEWS, p. A4] Collins’ crime, declared Walsh, was saying that “Jews are responsible for false Holocaust propaganda, which is itself hateful; they are master manipulators who use their extensive ownership of the media to widely disseminate Holocaust ‘nonsense’ for profit, to the great harm of innocent people and society generally.” [TODD, JEWS, p. A4]

A University of Toronto professor, Bart Testa, noted the Ottawa Citizen, testified that Collins’ article “portrayed Jewish people as powerful, manipulative and dedicated to keeping alternative views of the Nazi Holocaust of Jews, the subject of Schindler’s List, out of public view.” [TODD, p. F11] Another Jewish professor, Leonidas Hill, “a specialist in the history of anti-Semitism,” testified that Collins’ column infers that “Jews are deceitful and conspire to swindle the non-Jewish world for their own gains … Mr. Collins poses as a dauntless civil libertarian and a champion of free speech. This pose made it possible for him to continue publishing his anti-Semitic diatribes.” [TODD, p. F11]

In reply, the British Columbia Press Council lawyer, Roger McConchie, denounced the B.C. Human Rights Code under which Collins was tried, calling it “the most significant legislative infringement of press freedom in the history of British Columbia.” [TODD, JEWS, p. A4]

In 1997, the B.C. Human Rights Commission decreed that Collins’ Schindler’s List column was “likely to make it more acceptable for others to express hatred or contempt against Jewish people,” but that it did not have enough “calumny, detestation or vilification” to punish him. [BOLAN, p. A1] Nonetheless, a Jewish Victorian businessman, Harry Abrams, filed another complaint against Collins. (Abrams’ tact was to file as an individual, although he is the British Columbia’s representative for B’nai B’rith Canada. The earlier complaint was filed by another Jewish organization, the Canadian Jewish Congress). This complaint focused on the cumulative impact of four Collins columns that had critical commentary about Jews. This time, Collins lost. “The columns,” decided the Commission’s next tribunal report, “repeatedly reinforced some of the most virulent forms of anti-Semitism, and perpetuate the most damaging stereotypes of Jews: that they are selfish, greedy, and manipulative.” [MOORE, D., p. A8] … “Mr. Collins perpetuates the stereotype against Jews, especially those which allege widespread power and influence … The ideas and statements in these four articles reflect and, in fact, reinforce common anti-Semitic stereotypes. Mr. Collins not only expresses discriminating attitudes, but also exposes Jewish people to hatred and contempt.” [VANCOUVER SUN, p. A19]

The Commission’s final report was even ordered to be published in the North Shore News. Managing editor Tim Renshaw responded with amazement that his paper would be forced to publish “government-dictated content.” “Basically,” said Renshaw, “we have been tried on the same thing [and] they got the desired result the second time around. I guess if it wasn’t the second time, then there would have been a third time.” The B.C. Press Council declared that the tribunal dictate was “an unjustified violation of the principle of the freedom of the press.” [MOORE, D., p. A8]

Author Doug Collins (whose trial costs were $200,000) was ordered by the Commission to apologize and pay Abrams $2000 “as compensation for the injury [Collins’ words] have caused to his dignity and … self-respect.” [VANCOUVER SUN, p. A19] The North Shore News was also ordered not to publish anything more “contemptuous” of Jews. The Commission “ordered Collins and the paper to stop publishing statements that expose or are likely to expose Jewish persons to hatred or contempt in violation of section 7 (1) (b) of the human rights code.” [BOLAN, K., 12-3-99, p. 5]

“What is particularly odious in its ruling,” noted journalist Claire Hoy, “is that although the tribunal found Collins had not explicitly violated hate laws (and one could argue hate laws themselves are an outrageous violation of free speech, incidentally), the collective wisdom of his columns is enough to give the impression of hate-mongering.” [HOY, p. 5]

After the decision in his favor, Mr. Abrams said that the Collins columns “soften the ground” for another Holocaust. “They want to complete the job Hitler didn’t finish,” he said. In response to this wild charge, the 78-year old Collins – a prisoner of war at the May 31, 1940 battle of Dunkirk – asserted that “I was fighting Hitler when that louse bag was in diapers.” [DE CLOET, p. 27; Sinoski, p. B3]

Collins sought to appeal the Commission’s ruling. But the North Shore News could not join in the appeal. By 1999 the paper was itself owned by Hollinger International, the ardently pro-Israel media giant discussed earlier. Its Jewish CEO, David Radler, noted the reason why Hollinger’s North Shore News was abandoning its fight for free speech: “We support Collins’ right to write whatever he wants. Where we break with Collins is I don’t want Collins’ view in our newspaper. Basically, I find them inaccurate and offensive.” [TORRANCE, K., p. 24-25]

In the midst of the Doug Collins episodes, in 1998 Jewish journalist Paula Brook of the Vancouver Sun wrote an editorial about yet another successful Jewish censorial effort in the Vancouver area. After complaints by the Canadian Jewish Congress, journalist Greg Felton at the Vancouver Courier was forbidden by the paper’s owner, Sam Grippo, to write about Israel again. “I have received a directive not to publish any anti-Israel commentary in the newspaper,” Felton said in an interview. Noting this case, editor Tim Renshaw of the North Shore News (of Doug Collins notoriety), wrote that “the forces of censorship headed by the Canadian Jewish Congress continue to steamroll over any criticism of Israel or other things Jewish.” [BROOK, p. A17]

The title of Paul Brook’s article in reply to accusations of repeated Jewish censorship was “Business Rights Versus Free Speech.” She concluded her editorial, saying: “If those offended people [to articles like Felton’s] have the numbers behind them, and are represented by an advocacy group, more power to them. And if the owner [of the paper] responds by saying, you’re right – reprehensible speech is no longer free around here – then decisions are taken and life carries on, and as long as the government stays out of it we do not call this censorship. We call it business.” [BROOK, p. A17]

In response, Rafeh Hulays, Director of External Affairs for the Arab Community of British Colombia, wrote that “the bottom line of Ms. Brook’s argument is that instead of entering a debate, a special interest group with powerful friends has the right to silence the views of journalists with whom it disagrees, no matter how legitimate these views are.” [HULAYS, p. A15]

By 2001, the aforementioned Doug Collins, in his own independent Internet column, noted the state of Canadian “freedom of the press.” Jewish media mogul Izzy Asper had bought out “Hollinger/Southam’s 13 daily newspapers, 126 community newspapers, Canadian Internet operations, and fifty per cent of National Post.” The North Shore News was now an Asper paper, and both its publisher, Peter Speck, and Executive Editor, Tim Renshaw – supporters of Collins right to free speech about Jews and Israel – were fired. Likewise, the aforementioned Greg Felton, critic of Israel, was dumped from the Vancouver Courier (even before that paper became part of the Asper chain). [COLLINS, D., 2001] to read Collins’ explanation of the matter see http://jewishtribalreview.org/collins.htm

Jewish censorial efforts to squelch free speech, as noted in an earlier chapter, are manifest in many ways across the world. Even in western democracies, citizens can face criminal conviction merely for expressing negative opinions about Jews. Take the case of Robert Holzach, the honorary chairman of Switzerland’s largest bank, who the made the mistake of speaking too freely to a reporter from New Yorker magazine. In 1997 Holzach faced prosecution by Swiss courts for remarks he made to Jane Kramer that there was “a Jewish conspiracy” to take over the world’s most important banks. Formal, legal charges against Holzach for this comment was made by Marcel Hess, a Jewish politician in Basel. Holzach denied he ever made the remarks.

Conservative syndicated columnist Joseph Sobran, (charged often to be an anti-Semite), formerly of the National Review, notes in overview the problem at stake in all these cases:

“Not only persecution of Jews but any critical mention of Jewish power in the media and politics is roundly condemned as ‘anti-Semitism’… It’s permissible to discuss the power of every other group, from the Black Muslims to the Christian Right, but the much greater power of the Jewish Establishment is off-limits. That, in fact, is the chief measure of its power: its ability to impose its own taboos while tearing down the taboos of others … Power openly acquired, openly exercised, is one thing. You may think organized labor or the Social Security lobby abuses power, but you don’t jeopardize your career by saying so. But a kind of power that forbids its own public mention, like the Holy Name in the Old Testament, is another matter entirely … Journalists are as afraid of Jewish power as politicians are. This means that public discussion is cramped and warped by unspoken fear – a fear journalists won’t acknowledge, because it embarrasses their premises of being fearless critics of power.” [SOBRAN]

Another conservative critical commentator, Wilmot Robertson, noted the same thing in 1973:

“Any critical discussion of Jewish wealth – or for that matter any critical discussion of any aspect of Jewish power – immediately exposes the author or speaker to charges of anti-Semitism … [ROBERTSON, p. 179] … Instead of submitting anti-Semitism to the free play of ideas, instead of making it a topic for debate in which all can join, Jews and their liberal supporters have managed to organize an inquisition in which all acts, writings, and even thoughts critical of Jewry are treated as threats to the moral order of mankind.” [ROBERTSON, W., p. 180]

One has to look long and far to find any observer willing to stick his (or her) neck out in the mass media to raise the Jewish issue. A rare example occurred way back in the 1970s, when the directors of the Anti-Defamation League noted (as a severe example of irrational anti-Semitism) an article that appeared in a little Gentile-owned newspaper in Vermont:

“In May 1972, the Bennington Banner of Vermont, a liberal newspaper, carried a column headlined ‘Decline and Fall’ by Samuel Ogden who wrote about ‘WASP’ decline resulting from the fact that ‘the news media, the recent books, the books reviewed, all speak the viewpoints of the Jews,’ that the doctorates and professorships are principally held by Jews, that as a result ‘the American culture is rapidly becoming Jewish in character,’ which may be its ‘manifest destiny’ but which has contributed to a society that is ‘taking on the aspects of a dreadful nightmare.’” [FORSTER/EPSTEIN, p. 111]

All in all, the mass media itself and Jewish lobbying efforts have been astonishingly successful in cloaking Jewish mass media dominance, and framing Jews in America as relatively meek, oppressed, disenfranchised, and invisible. And victims. No mainstream media venue dares to address the dominating Jewish mass media presence. But generic “whites,” however unjustly, and incorrectly, are fair game. In 2001, for example, the Los Angeles Times, in an article about the lack of minorities in Hollywood, blamed “whites” for this discrepancy, condemning the Hollywood power structure, specifically that “90% of each major [Hollywood] guild (Screen Actors, Directors, Writers and Producers) is white, the majority of them male.” [MUNOZ, L, 3-24-01]

In 1945 a national poll found that 67% of the American population felt that Jews “had too much power” in America. As Jewish power actually grew dramatically over the following decades, it was veiled, and the perception of it was socialized away. By 1962, the perception of “too much Jewish power” was down to 17%. [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 117] In 1945, according to one survey, 19% of Americans believed that Jews were a “threat to America.” By 1950, this percentage was only 5 percent. “This short term shift,” noted Jewish psychoanalysts Bruno Bettelheim and Morris Janowitz, “may well have been influenced by the exposure of Nazi genocidal practices.” [BETTELHEIM/JANOWITZ, p. 6-7]
These authors were especially troubled, however, by the results of a 1952 survey question that found that college-educated people were more nearly twice as likely (17 to 10 percent) than grammar school-educated Americans to believe that “Jews were more likely to be Communists than others.” [BETTELHEIM/JANOWITZ, p. 19] [See evidence elsewhere in this volume that points to this as an obvious fact]

Always monitoring their fellow citizens, in a 1986 Anti-Defamation League national survey of 1,000 Christian conservatives, “Jews ranked far down the list of those thought to have too much power [in America]. Big business was too powerful for 67% of the group, organized labor for 55%, Arabs for 38%, Catholics for 23%, and 11% for blacks, compared to only 7% who thought Jews were too powerful.” [LIPSET, p. 157]

Such beliefs bear repeating, that we might ponder their implications: In 1945 67% of Americans felt that Jews had “too much power” in the United States and by 1986 only 7% of a religious section of them felt that way. In the more recent survey, five and a half times as many people thought that Arabs have more power in America than Jews. Over 50% more of these people understand the “power” of the largely impoverished Black community to be more than that of Jews. What evidence, one must wonder, has been disseminated to (or been withheld from) such people, and through what channels, to create, maintain, and enforce such preposterously skewed opinions? (“Jewish defense agencies,” notes Ronald Bayor, “helped create a climate in which Jew-baiting was no longer respectable. The assault upon anti-Semitism found in movies, the press, and general and politically oriented magazines by 1947 all contributed to its decline as a reputable movement.” [BAYOR, 1986, p. 187])

Such recent perceptions about Jews from the likes of “Christian conservatives” are not unusual to Americans in general. A 1986 Roper Poll of the American public at-large revealed that only 8% thought that Jews had “too much power” in the United States. [PENKOWER, p. 321] In 1998, the Anti-Defamation League conducted a survey of Americans about the fact that the “presidents of the three national television networks, ABC, CBS, and NBC, are Jewish” (not mentioning the far deeper cultural hegemony of Jews in the Hollywood world). 80% of respondents didn’t think Jewish executives “tend to allow more sex and violence programming than non-Jewish executives” and 80% opined that there was “no connection between the amount of Christian-oriented programming on TV and the fact that the executives of the major networks are Jewish.” [ADL, NOV 1998]

But we are still very far from finished with the story of Jewish influence, and “power,” in popular culture.

One last word here, however, about polls and public opinions of “Jewish power” within America. While American awareness of Jewish economic and mass media influence in America is miniscule and considered – when it is rarely evidenced – as an “anti-Semitic” view, across the world, in 1983, the Hanoch Smith Research Center conducted a national poll of the Jews of Israel. Colin Shindler notes that “When Hanoch Smith asked his Israeli respondents whether the Jews of America have control of important branches of the American economy, 73 per cent replied in the affirmative … In a non-Jewish society, this would have aroused suspicion of anti-Semitism, but emanating from a Jewish society, it seemed both a matter of pride and bewilderment.” [SHINDLER, p. 94-95]
Likewise, a 2001 survey of Israelis by the World Jewish Congress found that “the most admired characteristic of U.S. Jews is ‘their cultural and political influence’ – 34 percent – followed by ‘Jewish pride’ – 22 percent – and their ‘sense of unity and community’ – 21 percent.” [AXELROD, T., 10-29-01]
“By the early 1960s … Jews were even more heavily represented in the knowledge professions than they had been a decade earlier. They clearly dominated the political culture of New York, where their style and views had been adopted by relatively large numbers of non-Jewish intellectuals. They also became increasingly influential in other cosmopolitan centers such as Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Berkeley. In all these cities, they played an important role in educating non-Jews to a more cosmopolitan perspective.”

Stanley Rothman and S. Robert Lichter, 1982, p. 103

“It is ironic that many of the literary figures who shied from Jewish themes embodied in their writing more alleged Jewish traits than more consciously Jewish writers. There remains in their innermost self unsuspected residues of their inherited culture which no amount of rejection or denial could wholly eradicate. In both the self-hater and the detached, the affinity of supposed Jewish characteristics has been observed by both critics and laymen alike.”

Lothar Kahn, Jewish author, 1961, p. 31

“If the literary output of 1999 reveals anything, it reveals that Jewish writers are among the privileged citizens of the global village … Given the unprecedented international reach of their imaginations, their absorption in Jewish history and theology, and the staggering diversity of emergent American voices, it just may be that these young Jewish American writers find that they share more in common artistically with their Jewish contemporaries writing in Israel, Europe, Asia, and the rest of the Americas than they share in common with their non-Jewish contemporaries writing in the United States.”

Andrew Furman, one of the judges for the National Jewish Book award, MAY/JUNE 2000, p. 30]

In a 1974 book, The American Intellectual Elite, Charles Kadushin produced the results of his studies. He had tabulated lists of contributors to leading American “intellectual” publications, narrowed the names down to 200, and in a series of queries or interviews asked his subjects who were the most influential intellectuals around. Of the top 21 most highly rated (by others in this publishing circle), 15 were Jewish, including Hannah Arendt, Daniel Bell, Saul Bellow, Noam Chomsky, Paul Goodman, Richard Hofstadter, Irving Howe, Irving Kristol, Norman Mailer, Herbert Marcuse, Norman Podhoretz, David Riesman, Robert Silvers, Susan Sontag, and Lionel Trilling. [KADUSHIN, p. 30] Half of the total 200 were also reputed to be Jewish. As Kadushin notes, “Jews are indeed much more strongly represented among leading intellectuals than the population at large. They compose about half of the American intellectual elite. Catholics are vastly underrepresented, but Protestants, who are one-third of the group, are also relatively underrepresented … [KADUSHIN, p. 23] … Even in comparison with elite American professors (those who published more than 20 articles in academic journals and who teach in high-quality colleges and universities) of the same age and in the same fields, there are between two and five times as many Jews in the intellectual elite.” [KADUSHIN, p. 24]

In the world of academia (professorships) at-large, 60% of the “intellectual elite” were found to be Jewish. [KADUSHIN, p. 24] The “intellectual elite” also had a geographical flavor – half of the academic elite held positions at four East Coast universities – Columbia, New York University, Harvard, and Yale. [KA-
DUSHIN, p. 23]

Another (Jewish) professor echoes this study in claiming that by the late 1970s 50% of the “top intellectuals” in America were Jewish, the percentage rising to 51% of all “elite” academics in the social sciences and 61% in the humanities. [RUBENSTEIN, p. 64] Stephen Whitfield cites evidence that as many as 30% of the professors at “major universities” by the 1980s were also Jewish. [WHITFIELD, American, p. 9] Yet another Jewish professor used such figures to declare that 76% “of the most influential intellectuals had at least one Jewish parent.” [DAVIS, D., p. 29]

To begin to understand the implications of all this, (other than the popular Jewish explanations that Jews are “just smart,” or socially positioned as marginialized “others” to recognize greater philosophical insights) one must examine how someone gets on such a list of prominent people. Kadushin’s study sample was selected from those published in “twenty or so leading intellectual journals.” These included the New York Review of Books, the New York Times Book Review, the New Republic, Commentary, Partisan Review, Daedalus, Ramparts, Dissent, the Village Voice and other such periodicals. All of these were founded, controlled, or edited by Jews, as were many of the others on the list. “As might be expected,” noted Kadushin, “the persons most often named as having the power to make or break reputations were the editors of the key journals – Robert Silvers, Jason Epstein [and his wife Barbara], and Norman Podhoretz. [All are Jewish] A few persons [of the intellectuals surveyed in Kadushin’s study] commented on the alliance between journals and book publishers represented by Silvers and Jason Epstein.” [KADUSHIN, p. 53]

Kadushin’s definition of a “leading intellectual” underscores its incestuous current; a “leading intellectual” is “simply any person who writes regularly for leading intellectual journals and/or has his books reviewed in them.” [KADUSHIN, p. 8] Kadushin himself confronts the inbred dimensions of the “intellectual elite”: “I have the impression from reading autobiographical accounts of intellectual life that young intellectuals tend to be sponsored by older intellectuals and into intellectual prominence through a combination of journals, circles, and political parties controlled by the older intellectuals.” [KADUSHIN, p. 25]

In order to fully understand this scenario, one must begin with the 1930s and a group of mostly Jewish individuals that have sequentially risen en masse in New York City as part of an interconnected literary, publishing, and “intellectual” network, often self-referred to as “The New York Intellectuals” or “The Family.” The Family, wrote Philip Nobile, is “an elite array of critics, editors, novelists, and poets that manage the country’s high culture.” [NOBILE, p. 13] “The New York literary world,” says Family member Gregory Podhoretz, “began to acquire a recognizable identity …. [one could] think of it as a Jewish family.” [PODHORETZ, Making, p. 109] To those outside the Family circle in the literary world, they – and their heirs today – are the Jewish (literary) Mafia. Homogeneous only in that they are almost all Jews (not uncommonly warring among themselves), they inevitably linked with the many webs of the expanding Jewish-predominated mass media; a few “intellectuals” even became household names. As a group, they are credited with profound influence in the shaping of the twentieth century American cultural, social, and even the political scene.

“During the last few years,” wrote Family member Irving Howe in 1969, “the talk about the New York Establishment has taken an unpleasant turn. Whoever does a bit of lecturing about the country is likely to encounter, after a few drinks, literary academics who inquire enviously, sometimes spitefully, about ‘what’s new in New York.’ … As polite needling questions are asked about the cultural life of New York, a rise of sweat comes to one’s brow, for everyone knows what no one says: New York means Jews.” [HOWE, p. 267]

Of course the New York Intellectuals were – and their descendants are – not a formal organization, but rather an informal clique, a communally self-promotive camaraderie of writers, critics, editors, and publishers. Alexander Bloom suggests that the following individuals may be considered to be part of the Family’s inner ring:

Other candidates for connective inclusion include Henry Roth, Michael Blankfort, Leon Uris, Meyer Levin, Arthur Cohen, Louis Utermeyer, Herman Wouk, Arthur Miller, Muriel Rukyeser, Louis Zara, Paul Goodman, Barbara Epstein, Steven Marcus, John Simon, and many others.

Rings radiating outward include I. F. Stone, Herman Kahn, Hans Morgenthau, Sidney Hertzberg, Ronald Steel, David T. Bazelon, Nat Hentoff, Oscar Handlin, Daniel Boorstin, and others.

In 1980, Daniel Bell, a prominent Family member, broke down his version of the Jewish contingent of the New York Intellectuals and their “fields of interest” into the following categories:

- Art: Meyer Schapiro, Clement Greenberg, Harold Rosenberg
- Philosophy: Sidney Hooks, Hannah Arendt (Ernest Nagel)
- Literary Criticism: Lionel Trilling, Philip Rahv, Alfred Kazin, Irving Howe, Leslie Fiedler, Paul Goodman, Lionel Abel, Steven Marcus, Robert Warshow, Robert Brustein, Susan Sontag, Diana Trilling
- Intellectual journalism: Elliot Cohen, William Phillips, Irving Kristol, Robert Silvers, Norman Podhoretz, Jason Epstein, Theodore Solotaroff, Midge Decter
- Theology: (Will Herberg) (Emil Fackenheim) (Jacob Taubes) (Arthur Cohen)
- Sociology: Daniel Bell, Nathan Glazer, S. M. Lipset, (Philip Selznick) (Edward Shils) (Lewis Coser)
- History: Richard Hofstadter, Gertrude Himmelfarb
- Economics: (Robert Heilbroner) (Robert Lekachman)

Bell further lists eight Jews as the “Elders of the Family” (1920-1930), with six Gentile afforded “cousins” status. Bell adds ten more Jews as the Family’s “Younger Brothers” (1930-40) and seven more Gentiles as “cousins.” In the “Second Generation” of the Family (his own group), Bell lists ten new Jews and, rather noteworthy, the Gentile “cousin” group has dropped to two. The 1940-1950 new “Younger Brothers” category lists ten more Jews and, alas, we are down to one non-Jewish cousin. [BELL, Intelligentsia, p. 126-127] “These political intellectuals,” says Stephen Isaacs, “include a number of people who have known one another well for many years and who have been tagged the “College of Irvings” after Irving Kristol (a professor at New York University and co-editor of the Public Interest and Irving Howe (a professor at the City College of New York and editor of Dissent). [ISAACS, p. 53]

However one portrays the best known American “intellectuals,” New York-oriented or not, a huge proportion invariably came up Jewish. In the 1970s one commentator, Michael Novak, framed his own Most Important American Intellectuals List like this:

- Ivy league pragmatists and humanists: Henry Steele Commager, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.
- Literary modernists: Lionel Trilling, Louis Kampf, Irving Howe, Leslie Fiedler
- Pluralists: Nathan Glazer, Daniel Moynihan, David Reisam, Talcott Parsons, Will Herberg
– New radicals: Noam Chomsky, and “the New York Review of Book” gang – Conservative liberals: Sidney Hooks, Norman Podhoretz, Irving Kristol – Europe-oriented humanities: Hannah Arendt, Philip Rahv, George Lichtheim, Saul Bellow

Jack Porter responded to Novak’s Intellectuals List with his own about the subject, specifically focusing on a compilation of Jewish intellectual “insiders” who “despite their political differences, agree on two essential points: the survival and integrity of the Jewish people and the survival and integrity of the state of Israel. If any intellectual opposes either one of these, he or she stands outside the Jewish people.” [PORTER, p. 38 -39] Porter’s group includes David Brudnoy, Milton Friedman, Meir Kahane, Norman Podhoretz, Irving Kristol, Milton Himmelfarb, Nathan Glazer, Leonard Fein, I. L. Horowitz, Irving Howe, Arthur Waiskow, Morris U. Schappes, and Paul Jacobs.

The most notable factor in these last two lists is that Noam Chomsky, a Jewish professor of linguistics, is mentioned on the first, and is “left standing outside the Jewish people” on the second. Chomsky has in fact long since been ostracized and marginalized by the Jewish “Family” for his attacks against Jewish chauvinism and Israel. “What sets Chomsky … apart,” notes David Herman, “is his fierce attack on his fellow intellectuals as a class … Instead of producing truth, he argues, they often betray their vocation and produce amnesia about the past and distortion of the present … Intellectuals in the universities, think tanks, and media create a consensus of public opinion. All criticism is then marginalized by placing it beyond the pale of informed debate.” [HERMAN, p. 39] Not unusually, an American-born professor at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, Barry Rubin, cited Chomsky as someone who was “intellectually unbalanced or psychologically disturbed.” [RUBIN, p. 217]

The New York Intellectuals, says Alexander Bloom, “held out for their personal independence but maintained their connections … They moved across the political landscape together … occupying the same large area at the same time … There is no question that these individuals embodied many of the most important political and social forces of recent years, that they helped shape what America thought – in its universities, its leading journals, and its political debate.” [BLOOM, p. 7] “Once journals have attained positions of eminence,” notes Charles Kadushin, “they have independent power to make or break the prestige of individual intellectuals. This power is exercised through the clique and star system, the ability to publish some people and not others, and the ability to select some ideas and not others. And as will be evident, the power to support one idea while ignoring or denigrating another gives one the key to the kingdom of the intellectuals.” [KADUSHIN, p. 51]

By the time [Jewish mogul] Punch Sulzberger [inheritor of the New York Times] occupied his father’s chair in 1963,” says former Times Executive Editor Max Frankel, “American society had shed many of its anti-Semitic prejudices and permitted the rapid advancement of Jews in professional life and corporate suites. The general revulsion against fascism turned into a revulsion against bigotry itself, as demonstrated by the election of the first Catholic president, John F. Kennedy. Exploiting this atmosphere, and Gentile guilt about the Holocaust, American Jews of my generation were emboldened to make them themselves culturally conspicuous, to flaunt their ethnicity, to find literary inspiration in their roots, and to bask in the resurrection of Israel.” [FRANKEL, M., 1999, p. 400]

“Jews play a markedly disproportionate role in political intellectualism in the United States,” wrote Stephen Isaacs in 1974, “Jewish intellectuals tend to stand out because many of them have been heavily advertised and, having a touch of the tummler, they themselves are often experts at self-promotion. They thrive not on mass awareness of their concepts but on the quality of their audience. The Jewish intellectuals predominate among the editors of the small but influential intellectual journals…” [ISAACS, p. 53] “Careers like those of [non-Jew] Margaret Mead, David Riesman, and Daniel Bell,” notes David Hollinger, “indicate the extent to which social scientists replaced the clergy as the most authoritative public moralists for educated Americans.” [HOLLINGER, p. 23]

“These people are the Diores and Shiaperillis of intellectual fashion,” the novelist George P. Eliot observed about the Family, “What they think today, you’re apt to find yourself, in a Sears-Roebuck-ish sort of way, thinking tomorrow.” [BLOOM, p. 313] “The literary field in which Jews are without qualification in the highest rank is that of the essay,” wrote Jewish author Marie Syrkin in 1964,

“be it column or book-length exposition. As social analyst, political commentator or literary critic, the American Jewish writer occupies a major role. In journalism every shade of political opinion has Jews among its ablest exponents. The gamut runs from the conservative Arthur Krock through the less predictable Walter Lippman to the liberal Max Lerner on to extreme radical pundits. In literary criticism the same variety and excellence are present.” [SYRKin, M., 1964, p. 231]

The Family took shape around the journal Partisan Review in the 1930s; they initially expressed a radical, confrontational and communist posture towards mainstream non-Jewish American society. The central theme of their communal identity – not yet overtly expressed as being Jewish – was that they were all outsiders, “alienated,” struggling in the margins of mass culture. Eventually, distinctly as Jews, notes Alexander Bloom, “they claimed … an expertise in marginality based on hundreds of years of experience.” [BLOOM, p. 169] “[The Family],” notes Norman Podhoretz, “did not feel that they belonged to America or that America belonged to them.’ [PODHERETZ, p. 117] “There was something decidedly Jewish about the intellectuals who began to cohere as a group around the Partisan Review in the later 30s,” notes Family member Irving Howe, “and one of the things that was ‘decidedly Jewish’ was that most were of Jewish birth!” [HOWE, p. 240] (What was/is a common situation for a non-Jew who sought/seeks to crack the Jewish-dominated publishing world? Take the case of British novelist George Orwell, of Animal Farm and 1984 fame. “His first publisher, Victor Gollanz,” says Milton Goldin, “was a Communist who described himself as a Christian socialist and had been born into an Orthodox Jewish family. Orwell’s second publisher, Frederic Warburg [also Jewish, was] a descendant of the Swedish branch of the Warburg banking family … Jewish editors of the Partisan Review (then located in New York) acquainted a readership across the Atlantic with Orwell’s views. And when Jewish editors at the Book-of-the-Month Club chose Animal Farm as a club selection, the breakthrough at last provided him with a decent living.”) [GOLDIN, M., 11-29-2000]

“The chic word among the best Jewish writers today is ‘alienation,’” wrote Arthur Hertzberg in 1964, “which is a way of recognizing the truth that a Jew is irretrievably different. Writers like Norman Mailer and Leslie Fiedler, and a host of others, have the merit of seeing this fact continues to exist even where Jewish learning or active commitment have evaporated. They may not know why, and they may deny those reasons that they do know, yet these writers proclaim that the Jew in his very existence is alien to the world … the Jew is not becoming like everyone else they say; it is that everyone worth mentioning is really becoming just like the Jew. There is some superficial truth to this assertion at a moment in American life when so much of its literature is being written by Jews.” [HERTZBERG, p. 294] Jewish poet Delmore Schwartz once noted this “alienation which only a Jew can suffer, and use, as a cripple uses his weakness in order to beg.” [ATLAS, J., 1977, p. 166]

Among the literature promoted and disseminated by many Family members was the secular Jewish “religion” of Freudianism. One Partisan Review staffer noted that, “We were all more or less saturated with psychoanalytic jargon. Psychoanalysis was at that time very much in the air, and everybody seemed to be in it or contemplating it.” [TORREY] Partisan Review editor William Phillips edited two books on psychoanalysis as a basis for socio-cultural perception, Art and Psychoanalysis (1957) and Literature and Psychoanalysis (1983). Lionel Trilling’s influential volume, The Liberal Imagination, had chapters on “Art and Neurosis” and “Freud and Literature.” Louis Fraiberg wrote in his own Psychoanalysis and American Literary Criticism that “No other critic (than Trilling) has shown a comparable grasp of the significance of psychoanalysis; no other critic has so well incorporated it into his criticism.” [TORREY] “Many Jewish intellectuals,” suggests E. Fuller Torrey, “sought expiation of their guilt and remorse (about the Holocaust) in psychoanalysis.” [TORREY] In 1990 a random survey of New York psychiatrists, 50 to 80% of local book and literary journal editors were believed to be veterans of psychoanalysis. [TORREY]

Norman Podhoretz even described the Family’s bitter arguments among themselves in psychoanalytic – and Jewish – terms:

“To be adopted into the Family was a mark of great distinction … But once adopted, you could expect to be spoken of by many (not all) of your relatives in the most terrifyingly cruel terms … Transposed into a different key, it was the Jewish self-hatred that has always been the other side of the coin of Jewish self-love.” [PODHORETZ, p. 152]
While most of these Great Thinkers, in the beginning, distanced themselves from issues of their “Jewishness” (although, notes Irving Howe, “this severance from Jewish immigrant sources would later come to be a little suspect” [HOWE, p. 241], their collective path to money, status, and power is manifest in a most distinctly Jewish way: they were an influential clique, a clan, initially homogeneous only in that they were all part of the same mutually promotive network. Over the following decades their radicalism softened into an assertion of “anti-communist liberalism”; ultimately individuals spread from there across the political map. Increasingly however, after World War II, their most pressing common link was a strong reaffirmation of their Jewish identities, allegiance to Jewish parochialism, and emphatic support for the state of Israel.

Ironically, history has proven the Jewish Mafia’s essential self-image of being “alienated” and “marginalized” (later understood by them to be an ancestral reservoir of special Jewish insights) to become ridiculous. The Family has proven to be exactly the opposite of what they proclaimed themselves at first to be. History has revealed them as a group of literary hustlers and self-promoters who were profoundly influential and centrally located in deconstructing the institutions of the surrounding non-Jewish culture they so much despised until they gained entre to prestigious empowerment, at which time they vigorously struggled to affirm the status quo of which they had become so much a part, save overt adjustments to their new-found “Jewishness,” and a reconstruction of the world in that image.

Family member Harold Rosenberg explained the way modern Jewry seeks to rationalize Jewish particularism as being beneficial to American universalism like this:

“Since modern life is so complex that no man can possess it in its entirety, the outsider often finds himself the perfect insider.” [BLOOM, p. 153]

“In addition to their notions of group marginality,” observes Alexander Bloom, “which differs from individual feelings of aloneness, [the Family] also attempted to carry their alienation with them to the central position they felt they should occupy [in American society].” “What began in the 30s,” says Richard Kostelanetz, “as a collection of ambitious young writers became, by the 60s, the most powerful establishment ever seen in literary America, and they dominated the scene as it had never been dominated before.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 39] “Upwardly mobile Jews,” notes Alan Wald, “comprised a disproportionate number of intellectuals in all radical movements in New York in the 1930s. The veterans of the [Jewish-founded left-wing magazines] New Masses and New Leader were not qualitatively different in their Jewish composition from those of the Partisan Review.” [WALD, p. 9]

In historical retrospect, it is obvious that noble intellectual endeavors and enlightenment really were not the only – and probably not the fundamental – driving forces behind most of the New York Intellectuals. “A strong desire of class was also buried in the whole dynamic,” notes Alexander Bloom, “Only subsequently did some of the young men come to see how clearly their own progress was tied to a desire to rise.” [BLOOM, p. 27] Norman Podhoretz called the Jewish Mafia’s deepest motivation in their struggles “a dirty little secret,” and he wrote an entire book, Making It, about his own – and others – obsessions with self-promotive hustling and status-seeking within the Family. “The lust for success,” he wrote, “… had replaced sexual lust … especially for writers, artists, and intellectuals, among whom I lived and worked.” [BLOOM, p. 360] “After all,” noted Irving Howe, “it had never been dignity that we could claim as our strong point.” [HOWE, p. 265]

(It was also, as noted earlier, a parallel situation in the largely Jewish left-wing Group Theatre world in New York City – many actors, directors, and producers abandoned their proclaimed purist principles to migrate to Hollywood for wealth and fame. Even in the folk music world, singer Dave Von Ronk recalls the climate of some of the socially-minded, anti-materialist, left-wing folk singers of the 1960s, naming Jewish singers Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, David Cohen, and Gentile Eric Anderson: “They wanted to get rich. They were hungry, scuffling cats looking to grab the brass ring. I felt it, I saw how hungry they were. They wanted to be honest, but they suddenly realized they could say what they wanted to say and make a million dollars. Dylan was a terrible influence … Bobby always wanted to be a superstar. When he discovered the reality of being a superstar he freaked out.” [SCADUTO, p. 227]

“Among aggressive young intellectuals, ghetto-bred and seeking big reputations,” said Alfred Kazin, [Saul] Bellow was making the world’s powers resist him … he was ambitious and dedicated in a style I had never seen in an urban Jewish intellectual; he expected the world to come to him. He had pledged himself a great destiny.” [BLOOM, p. 292]

Concerning Norman Mailer, Kazin once noted that “I’ve never known anyone whose career was always in public and who constantly put himself forward the way movie people do so much as Mailer.” [MANSO, p. 274]

“[Jason] Epstein’s literary chutzpah is indeed legendary,” says Philip Nobile, “He is possibly the only editor in the history of publishing who reviewed a book he himself edited … and who even edited a book he himself had written.” [NOBILE, p. 91]

“Most of my friends and I were Jewish,” wrote Seymour Krim of his experiences around the Family, “we were also literary; the combination of the Jewish intellectual tradition and sensibility needing to be a writer created in my circle the most potent and incredible intellectual-literary ambition I have ever seen.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 12]

In 1963, Richard Hofstadter, another member of the Jewish intellectual Family, decided that “intellectuals” were an elite class in modern society:

“It is rare for an American intellectual to confront candidly the irresolvable conflict between the elite character of his own class and his democratic aspiration. The extreme manifestation of the general reluctance to face this conflict is the writer who constantly assault class barriers and yet constantly hunger for special deference.” [HOFSTADTER, p. 408]
The underlying paradoxical paradigm here, of course, which Hofstadter does not acknowledge, is the standard Jewish universalist-particularist tension: to dominate the inner machinations of American culture and society, but be alienated from it; to be democratic in abstract philosophy in public life, but a self-anointed elitist in one’s personal and confidential worlds; to be a universalistic American on the outside, and a particularist Jew within. Hofstadter never mentions Jews in his entire volume about American “anti-intellectualism”; instead, he sublimates the Jewish dimension to all this, as exemplified by a quote he selects from Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.: “Anti-intellectualism has long been the anti-Semitism of the businessman.” [HOFTSTADTER, p. 4]

The great ambitions that encompassed the Family at-large were ultimately accomplished, causing members to reflect from time to time upon their phenomenal success and influence in American society. Citing examples like fellow Family members Clement Greenberg, Harold Rosenberg, Lionel Trilling, and Alfred Kazin, “there emerged,” wrote Daniel Bell, “a ‘cultural elite,’ and this was primarily a ‘university culture’ … [but] the notion of elites extended beyond campus boundaries. Many of the new cultural arbiters have affected not only serious painters and novelists, but the standards of the larger public as well.” [BLOOM, p. 200] As Irving Horowitz notes, “The Jew at the start of the century was identified as the pure marginal, the outsider, the immigrant incapable of integration. As this century draws to a close the Jew is now identified as the very apotheosis of American dominant values and culture.” [HOROWITZ, I., p. 90]

“The growing complexity of our society,” Lionel Trilling observed about himself and his Family, “had helped create a new intellectual class, which stood in a new relation with power. In addition, intellectual life itself took on a new character, providing the means of social mobility and social ascent … [BLOOM, p. 206] … The needs of society have brought to the top of the social hierarchy a large class of people of considerable force and complexity of mind. Intellect has associated itself with power as perhaps never before in history, and is now conceded to be itself a kind of power.” [BLOOM, p. 200]

“The most pervasive event in American letters over the last ten years,” joined in Clement Greenberg in the Partisan Review, “is the stabilization of the avant-garde, accompanied by its growing acceptance by official and commercial culture.” [BLOOM, p. 297] Among those disturbed with this trend of largely Jewish intellectual status and reward seeking was sociologist C. Wright Mills, a non-Jew, and author of critical attacks of American society called The Power Elite and White Collar. Despite his proximity, as a professor at Columbia University, to the New York Family, he was not part of it. Russell Jacoby notes that

“where Trilling celebrated cultural progress, Mills bemoaned decline, the degeneration of political discourse into slogans and toothpaste commercials … [Mills argued in 1955 that] when a stringent opposition [to social and governmental norms] had disappeared, intellectuals embrace a ‘new conservative gentility.’ Instead of criticizing the mediocrity and mindlessness, they savor their new status, instead of acting as ‘the moral conscience of society,’ they confound prosperity with advancing culture. Mills named Trilling as one of the intellectuals succumbing to this confusion … From the end of the war until his death, he railed against intellectuals who traded ethics and vision for salaries and status.” [JACOBY, p. 79]

“[As] radical intellectuals,” says Alexander Bloom, “the New Yorkers had once felt that their best hope of access to intellectual prominence and authority lay with a reconstruing of society. In the postwar years, they found the very society which they once scorned, and which had once scorned them, much more hospitable. They discovered a ‘place’ and a ‘role’ for themselves in it.” [BLOOM] “We are witnessing a process that might well be described as the embourgeoisement of the American intelligentsia,” Philip Rahv observed, “This change, coupled with the new liberal policies, accounts for the fact that the idea of socialism … has virtually ceased to figure in current intellectual discussion.” [BLOOM, p. 201] “Instead of standing in opposition to the prevailing cultural flow– mass, popular, middle-brow,” notes Bloom, “highbrow thought and an avant-garde orientation now molded society.” [BLOOM, p. 298]

Indeed, in their earlier years, many of the Family were communist activists, their later worldview adjusted to success and the comforts of capitalism. “In light of the neo-conservative self-portrait being created by many of the New York intellectuals,” noted Alan Wald in 1987, “one is tempted to conclude that they have a stake in perpetuating an amnesia that avoids a forthright disclosure of their previous political history as revolutionary but anti-Stalinist Marxists.” [WALD, p. 8–9]

The much-published ideas and arguments of the New York Intellectuals and their rise to status and power took them into university classrooms everywhere and even the very seat of government power in Washington DC. “Intellecutals established intimate connections with government as never before,” says Bloom, “Some took jobs in Washington … While most did not take employment, they nonetheless felt the connection.” “President Kennedy began to flatter the intellectual,” Midge Decter recalled, “which is to say he invited them to his house for supper.” [BLOOM, p. 324] “We became a touch of minor royalty,” says Norman Mailer. [BLOOM, p. 324] “All of us in the family,” says Norman Podhoretz, “were even friendly with members of the White House staff; they read our magazines and the pieces and books we ourselves wrote, and they cared – it is even said that the President [Kennedy] himself cared – about what we thought.” [PODHORETZ, 1967, p. 312]

Alan Wald notes that:

“The skills and experience [the New York intellectuals] had acquired as polemicsists and ideologists during their radical years, and especially as authorities on communism with an insider’s knowledge, enabled them to move rapidly into seats of cultural power in the 1950s. In more recent decades, some even came to have access to national power. Irving Kristol, for example, became an intellectual consultant to the Nixon administration, Nathan Glazer’s work was much admired by the Reagan administration, and neoconservative articles in Commentary magazine influenced White House policy in the 1980s.” [WALD, p. 8]
As Jewish commentator Earl Shorris noted in 1982 about these once-Leftist, now influential “neoconservative,” individuals:

“The neoconservative Jews [Shorris notes, as examples, Norman Podhoretz, Daniel Bell, Irving Kristol, Nathan Glazer, Midge Decter, and Sidney Hook] have not codified their views. They are still best identified by the half dozen middle-aged former leftists who led the garrulous conversions [to the political right] ... [T]hey enjoy money as Norman Podhoretz has so loudly said. They are unashamedly ambitious, almost greedy. They do not know or wish to know the risks of daily life in the world of business; they are more comfortable in the role of consultant, advising others on which risks to take.” [SHORRIS, E., 1982, p. 10]

Even those intellectuals without university degrees sooner or later gravitated to teaching positions at universities. Irving Howe, Alfred Kazin, and William Phillips found positions without PhDs; Philip Rahv even became a professor without a Bachelor’s degree. At Columbia, Nathan Glazer and Daniel Bell (who also became an editor at Fortune) were deeded PhDs for “research already published.” [BLOOM, p. 311]

“Once intellectuals had come in from the cold and established connections with power,” says Alexander Bloom, “it became clear that their intellectual endeavors no longer represented opposition to the prevailing ethos. They were ‘chic’ because they were ‘in’ – they had achieved what they had long ago set out to achieve.” [BLOOM, p. 325] “Where young writers once faced the world together,” wrote Irving Howe, “they now sink into suburbs, country homes and college towns … They not only lose their traditional rebelliousness but to one extent or another they cease to function as intellectuals.” [original author’s emphasis: JACOBY, p. 82]

The Family – most of them former communists of various brands – became so entrenched in the mainstream corridors of power and influence that a number of them even ended up having the covert backing of the CIA. During the height of the post-World War II anti-communist hysteria in America, many Family members joined an organization called the American Committee of Cultural Freedom. “Anticommunism became its only prerequisite,” says Alexander Bloom, “.....New York Intellectuals … provided the solid center of the organization and filled many positions.” [BLOOM, p. 264]

Diana Trilling remembers that “Even before I came onto the Executive Board of the American Committee, I was aware, and it was clear impression that everybody else on the Board was also in some measure aware, that the institutional body with which we were associated was probably funded by the government … We strongly suspected that the Fairfield Foundation, which we were told supported the Congress, was a filter for the State Department or CIA money.” [BLOOM, p. 264]

The ACCF’s parent organization even funded a British-based “intellectual” journal, Encounter, edited by Irving Kristol and Stephen Spender. A later editor, Melvin Lasky, is generally presumed to have been the CIA agent-editor publicly alluded to by a former CIA-employee. [BLOOM, p. 267]

Throughout the rise to prominence, status, and power, the incestuous, connections-laden, interlocking of the New York Intellectual clique ran deep in mutual self-promotion. “What might seem the result of a ‘conspiracy,’” notes Richard Kostelanetz, “[is] actually caused by a confluence of attitudes, historical precedents, and initially independent discriminations, all of which combine to function with a conspiratorial effectiveness … It is de facto censorship [of non-Family writers]. [KOSTELANETZ, p. xvii]

“Intellectuals and publishers,” notes E. Fuller Torrey, “… are often related or familiar with each other through marriage or shared consorts, recommend and review each others work and pass promising manuscripts around for publication … The New York intellectual community and the publishing industry are essentially two parts of a single whole.” [TORREY]

Midge Decter, for example, the secretary of the first editor of Commentary (Elliot Cohen), became the wife of the second editor of that journal, Norman Podhoretz. She also worked for the Saturday Review and eventually rose to become an executive editor at Harper’s where Norman Mailer became a featured contributor and Irving Howe a regular contributor. [KOSTELANETZ, p. 101] John Podhoretz, son of Norman, attained jobs at the Washington Times and George Bush’s White House before settling in as a television critic for the New York Post. By 1998 he was the paper’s Editorial Page Editor. Podhoretz’s daughter, Ruthie Bloom, moved to Israel and became a regular columnist for the Jerusalem Post. Podhoretz’s wife – the aforementioned Midge Decter – has a daughter by another marriage who married Elliot Abrams, an adviser on Latin America in Ronald Reagan’s State Department. [TWERSKY, p. 45]

“Family” members Lionel and Diana Trilling were married. Alfred Kazin remarked in 1976 that he didn’t like fellow Family member Daniel Bell (co-editor of Public Interest), “even though he is my brother-in-law.” Irving Kristol, another co-editor of Public Interest (and the editor-in-chief at Basic Books) was the brother-in-law of Milton Himmelfarb, a Contributing Editor for Commentary and also co-editor of the Jewish Yearbook.” [BLOOM, p. 278] Lionel Trilling’s former students included Jason Epstein, who at Doubleday published Trilling’s The Liberal Imagination. Trilling also selected the book titles for the Reader’s Subscription and the Mid-Century Book Society, each organization managed by former Trilling students, Gilman Kraft and Sol Stein, respectively. [KRUPNICK, p. 102] Likewise, “the writers from Partisan Review now came to dominate the New Yorker,” Daniel Bell once asserted to Midge Decter, Partisan Review was getting to be like a farm team for the New Yorker.” [BLOOM, p. 311]

The self-promotion and clannishness are clearly reflected elsewhere in the interconnectedness of those selected in Family journals for publication. Elliot Cohen, the first editor of Commentary, brought on board Clement Greenberg and Nathan Glazer as editorial assistants and Sidney Hooks as a contributing editor. Irving Kristol and Robert Warshow later joined the staff. By the end of the first year, Harold Rosenberg, Paul Goodman, Alfred Kazin, Hannah Arendt, Saul Bellow, Robert Warshow, Sidney Hooks, Isaac Rosenfeld, Daniel Bell, Diana Trilling, Irving Howe, Philip Rahv, and Clement Greenberg had articles or reviews in Commentary. [BLOOM, p. 160]

“Just as Willie Morris [a rare non-Jewish member of the Family],” says Richard Kostelanetz, “assuming the chief editorship of Harper’s, prepublished sections of Norman Podhoretz’s Making It, so did Podhoretz feature sections of Morris’ North Towards Home in (Podhoretz’s) Commentary.”

The kind of interrelated media circles Norman Mailer traveled in, for example, include – aside from the central New York Intellectual luminaries – the following people who were solicited for stories for a book of oral histories about his life (Mailer himself was a co-founder of the Village Voice with Jerry Talmer, Ed Fancher, and Dan Wolf):

– Bernard Farber, fiction editor at the Saturday Evening Post, later senior editor at Trident Press, Simon and Schuster, and then CBS Legacy Books. He also served as Vice-President of Mailer’s film company, Supreme Mix.

– Benjamin DeMott, columnist for Harper’s and The Atlantic, a contributing editor to the Saturday Review.

– Jules Feiffer, cartoonist at the Village Voice.

– Henry Geldzahler, former curator of twentieth century art at the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

– Allen Ginsberg, Beat Poet.

– Lionel Hellman, screenwriter, playwright.

– Lionel Abel, “longtime contributor to Commentary, Dissent, Partisan Review.

– Max Linenthal, Director of the Poetry Center at San Francisco State University.

– Adeline Naiman, Editor at Little, Brown.

– Sol Stein, one of ten founding members of the Playwright Group of the Actors Studio.

– Al Wasserman, producer, director, and writer for NBC News. Married to Mailer’s sister.

In 1996 a Mailer quote was used on the back cover of friend Lawrence Schiller’s book about the O.J. Simpson trial. “I couldn’t stop reading American Tragedy,” he said. “My old friend and colleague Larry Schiller has come up with a book that is impossible to put down.” [SCHILLER, 1996] Mailer had good reason to be so engrossed in the accusation that Simpson murdered his wife with a knife. Mailer had once stabbed his own wife, Adele, in the upper abdomen and back, sending her to the hospital. “One of the wounds was near the heart,” notes biographer Carl Rollyson, “and the cardiac sac had been punctured.” Within a week of the assault, “Mailer appeared on the Mike Wallace television show. He announced his intention to run for the mayor of New York City.” [ROLLYSON, p. 137, 138] In an obvious reflection upon the violent incident, one of his 1962 published poems, entitled “Rainy Afternoon with the Wife” (in a volume he called Deaths for the Ladies) stated that

Some of Mailer’s other associations were – in view of his public image as a “liberal” – peculiar. Roy Cohn – a driving force behind right-wing McCarthy anti-communist witch hunts in the 1950s – helped negotiate a lucrative writing deal between Mailer and the continually morally dubious Newhouse (Advance) media empire; Mailer was initially commissioned on projects for Parade magazine and Random House. Mailer even rented a cottage to Cohn next to Mailer’s own summer home. “Newhouse’s overtures to Norman Mailer, made through Roy Cohn,” says Thomas Maier, “would pay [Mailer] sizeable fees and commissions, throughout the decade of the 1980s and well into the 1990s, with some of the most lucrative deals ever seen by an American novelist ... By the early 1990s, Mailer was listed on [Newhouse’s] Vanity Fair masthead as writer-at-large.” [MAIER, p. 108-109]

Seizing the opportunity of the New York city newspaper strike in 1963, Jason Epstein, a Vice President at Random House, and editor of Viking Books, was instrumental in setting up the New York Review of Books (which extended its own mini-empire by purchasing the Kirkus Reviews book reviewing periodical from Maurice Friedman in 1971). Robert Silvers (formerly at Harper’s and the Paris Review) and Epstein’s wife, Barbara, were installed as editors. [BLOOM, p. 326] “In the second year of the Review,” says Alexander Bloom, “Harold Rosenberrg, Diana Trilling, and Midge Decter contributed; Daniel Bell and Norman Podhoretz did so in the third. The degree to which the New York Review swept the field of contemporary writers and critics led Richard Hoftstadter to refer to it jokingly as “the New York Review of Each Others Books.” [BLOOM, p. 329] Philip Noble, who chronicled the Review’s early history, characterized the era as prey to ‘nepotism, fratricide, and incest, and even a dose of narcissism. Establishment liberals were reviewing one another wholesale.” [NOBILE, p. 29]

As Jewish scholars Stanley Rothman and S. Robert Lichter noted:

“The New York Review of Books was edited by Robert Silvers and Barbara Epstein, and the bulk of its political contributions (especially articles on American politics) in the mid-1960s was written by Jews. By and large then, as Tom Wolfe has pointed out, ‘radical chic’ in New York was a heavily Jewish phenomenon, and the influence of such people spread well beyond their own circle.” [ROTHMAN/LICHTER, 1982, p. 105]

“In the course of the New York Review’s rise,” notes Bloom, “two of its prime movers joined the upper ranks of the New York Intellectual world. Robert Silvers ... climbed slowly up the intellectual social ladder. Jason Epstein sprang to the top ... Epstein had helped created the paperback revolution at Doubleday...
… Epstein wore his ambition … openly.” “Jason has the mind of a scholar but the instincts of a pushcart peddler,” recalled a former colleague at Doubleday. Dwight MacDonald called him “a caricature of a New York intellectual; a nineteenth century entrepreneur, a robber baron, only his market is not copper, but intellectuals.” [BLOOM, p. 327]

“There is no such thing as a New York Intellectual establishment,” Epstein said to those not part of the Family, “it just looks that way.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 61] “It is fashionable,” wrote Victor Navasky, editor of Nation (of whom Diana Trilling once worked as a literary editor), “for the New York Intellectuals to not only deny its existence but, as a corollary, to deny its influence.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 79]

As the New York Jewish Mafia built a foundation of interconnectedness and self-promotive power, “the Upper West Side, Wellfleet, and Martha’s Vineyard now replaced City College and the Village as centers of their social whirl,” says Alexander Bloom, “They all still attended each others parties, still gossiped to one another …” [BLOOM, p. 277] … They remained vitally aware of one another, even as they expressed their criticism [of each other] in extremely harsh terms. Like prizefighters in a traveling carnival, they might be combatants but they remained part of the same show.” [BLOOM, p. 279]

Allen Ginsberg, the famous Jewish-born Beat poet, remembers Norman Podhoretz coming up to him at a party and offering him entre into the Jewish Mafia:

“Ginsberg, [said Podhoretz] you really have some talent and I realize that you’re an intelligent writer and really gifted. You could have a career in New York, be part of the larger scene with us if you’d only get rid of those friends of yours like [non-Jews William] Burroughs and [Jack] Kerouac. You have much better taste than they. Why aren’t you working with us instead of those people that are so nowhere? …. I remember the incident as an ephiphanous moment in my relation with Podhoretz and what he was part of – a large right-wing proto-police surveillance movement …. The Beat group was more or less based on Vachel Lindsay, Whitman, populism, and individualism.” [MANSO, p. 314]

Upon a visit to New York City, the novelist George P. Eliot observed that “What strikes me, as a visitor, ever more strangely than the intensity with which these Jews attack and praise each other, is the attention they pay to each other.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 25]

Whether hugging or warring, says Norman Podhoretz, the Family was “preoccupied with each other to the point of obsession.” [PODHORETZ, p. 110]

The novelist Theodore Dreiser (1871-1945) believed a Jewish-inspired plot was amuck to suppress his work for his crime of writing critically about the Jewish community. “He suspected,” writes A. A. Swanberg, “that Arthur Pell, head of the Liveright firm, and Simon and Schuster, were parties to the plot … [To a friend] he wrote: Get me the names of a number of fairly recently organized non-Jewish publishers … Can you tell me whether W. W. Norton or anyone connected with his organization in a financial control sense is Jewish?” [GOULD]

Alas, Dreiser was securely marginalized by the American literary-cultural establishment by the early 1960s. “The decline of Dreiser’s reputation,” notes Irving Howe, “has not been an isolated event. It has occurred in the context, and is surely a consequence, of the counterrevolution in American culture during the forties and fifties … Dreiser became a symbol of everything a superior intelligence was supposed to avoid … He represented the boorishness of the populist mentality, as it declined into anti-Semitism.” [HOWE, p. 168]

Likewise, notes Ann Douglas, prominent Beat author Jack Kerouac eventually became “ever more paranoid,” thinking that “the New York Jewish critics were plotting against him; he joked bitterly about titling Big Sur (1962), ‘Another idea for the Jews to Steal.’” [DOUGLAS, A., 19-99] In 2001, Jim Irsay (whose father’s original name was Robert Israel), owner of a professional football team, bought Kerouac’s original manuscript for On the Road, at auction, for $2.2 million dollars. (Jewish author Franz Kafka’s The Trial had “held the previous record for an original manuscript sold at auction.”) [HERMAN, J., 5-22-01]

“[There is] a Jewish Mafia in American letters …, “said popular writer Truman Capote, risking censure and the inevitable charge of anti-Semitism in 1973, “There is a clique of New York-oriented writers and critics who control much of the literary scene through the influence of the quarterlys and intellectual magazines … All these publications are Jewish-dominated and this particular coterie employs them to make or break writers by advancing or withholding attention … Bernard Malamud, Saul Bellow, and Philip Roth, and Isaac Bashevis Singer are all fine writers, but they are not the only writers in the country as the Jewish Mafia would have us believe.” [FORSTER, p. 109]

The Partisan Review crowd, for instance, is generally acknowledged to have “made” Saul Bellow. “From the first,” says Alexander Bloom, “Bellow established a recognizable and, ultimately, uneasy relationship with the New York Intellectuals, as friends and patrons. Yet he has resisted any notion that they made him famous.” But, says Leslie Fiedler, “[Bellow] really owed a big debt to them, because they did help introduce him to the world. Rahv thought of him as one of their boys.” [BLOOM, p. 291]

Early in his career, from 1941-1951, Bellow published six short stories and two novels; five of the short stories first appeared in Partisan Review. [BLOOM, p. 291] His second novel, was reviewed in Partisan Review by Family member Delmore Schwartz and favorably compared with Mark Twain’s Huckleberry Finn, Henry James, and Walt Whitman. “Bellow’s success,” says Alexander Bloom, “was more than just personal. whether or not he was ‘made’ by the Partisan writers is less significant than the degree to which his success and the history of the achievement of the New York Intellectuals in general intertwined … Lionel Trilling … made it clear that a Jew could be a great literary critic; Meyer Schapiro, a great art historian; and Saul Bellow a great American novelist.” [BLOOM, p. 293]
“Bellow,” said Norman Podhoretz, “was the Family’s White Hope, as it were, in fiction.” [BLOOM, p. 291] “Bellow was their novelist,” observes Alexander Bloom, “because he wrote about them, sometimes literally, but more often socially and culturally.” [BLOOM, p. 293]

“What makes Bellow’s work so unusual,” decided Alfred Kazin in 1959, “is the fact that his characters are all burdened by a speculative quest, a need to understand their particular destiny.” [BLOOM, p. 295] In the 1960s, Leslie Fiedler proclaimed Bellow to be “America’s most important living novelist.” [BLOOM, p. 292] Earlier he had declared that of all the contemporary novelists, Bellow “was the one we need most to understand, if we are to understand what we are doing at the present moment.” [BLOOM, p. 292]

“It is said,” wrote Edgar Siskind in 1978, “that more PhD dissertations have been and are being written on Bellow than any other contemporary writer. No aspect of his work has been more fiercely analyzed than the question of its Jewish component.” [SISKIN, p. 90]

“Complementing Bellow’s individual success,” notes Alexander Bloom, “was his preeminence in what has been called the emergence of Jewish-American literature in postwar years … What is striking about the writers included in this literary category is the degree to which they all had close connections with the New York Intellectuals.” [BLOOM, p. 295] Such authors include a vast field, including most of the Jewish names in this chapter. Many of Bernard Malmsud’s stories, for example, first appeared in the Partisan Review and Commentary. Norman Mailer often had pieces published in Dissent in the 1950s. [BLOOM, p. 296-297] Paul Goodman’s book, Growing Up Absurd, turned down by nineteen publishers, was promoted by Norman Podhoretz, and serialized in his Commentary. Podhoretz also persuaded Jason Epstein at Random House to publish it, even though his firm had already rejected the manuscript. [BLOOM, p. 322] Commentary also serialized the Diary of Ann Frank, as we have seen earlier, one of the first popular books about the later so-called Holocaust, bringing the subject to public eye.

“I cannot prove a connection,” wrote Irving Howe, “between the Holocaust and the turn to Jewish themes in American fiction, at first urgent and quizzical, later fashionable and manipulative … but it would be foolish to scant the possibility.” [HOWE, p. 265]

“The larger questions of Jewish existence,” notes Alexander Bloom, “as well as the narrower ones of Jewish intellectuals – the themes mined by Saul Bellow – became the material for a growing literary œuvre.” [BLOOM, p. 297]

By 1975, this “literary œuvre” had sparked Jewish critic George Steiner to proclaim

“It is commonplace that recent American fiction and criticism have to a drastic extent been the product of Jewish tone and explosion of talent.” [MADISON, C., p. 271]

Russell Jacoby had another take on this Jewish “explosion of talent”:
“By quality alone, it is simply not possible to distinguish the œuvre of New York intellectuals from that of non-New Yorkers. Essay by essay, book by book, the collective work of New York intellectuals is neither so brilliant nor so scintillating that all else pales. It is almost more feasible to reverse the common opinion: the significant books of the fifties were authored by non-New Yorkers … New York intellectuals received the lion’s share of attention less by reason of genius than by … their New York location and their personal and physical proximity to the publishing industry. In addition, their tireless monitoring of themselves lays the groundwork for further studies (and myths). For those padded cultural histories with reports on what writer X said to editor Y at Z’s party, the New York scene is a mother lode … [JACOBY, p. 102]

… New York intellectuals specialize in the self; theirs is the home of psychoanalysis, the personal essay, the letter to the editor.” [JACOBY, p. 103]

As one unnamed “intellectual” responded to Charles Kadushin’s study of American intellectuals, “Power is in the circles around Commentary, Dissent, the New York Review of Books, and Partisan. Ninety-nine percent of what goes on in these circles is bullshit.” [KADUSHIN, p. 52]

Norman Podhoretz noted the crucial importance of hustling and politicking to further one’s career in the Literary In-Crowd, and the desperate Status Chase of it all:

“Did so-and-so have dinner at Jacqueline Kennedy’s last night? Up five points. Was so-and-so not invited to the Lowell’s to meet the latest visiting poet? Down one-eighth. Did so-and-so’s book get nominated for the National Book Award? Up two and five-eighths. Did Partisan Review neglect to ask so-and-so to participate in a symposium? Down two.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 129]

This “explosion of talent” within the Jewish Mafia’s self-promotive web has been profoundly successful. As example, of all the thousands of talented writers in America, “for several years in succession,” wrote Charles Angoff and Meyer Levin in 1970, “Jewish authors won the National Book award with works about Jews. Jewish novels headed the bestseller list.” [ANGOFF/LEVIN, p. 13] “[The New York] mob writers,” complained Richard Kostelanetz in 1974, “usually sit on the selection juries of the National Book Award … and win these awards regularly (Bellow getting an unparalleled three).” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 124] Among the National Book Award winners, twelve years later Family member Irving Howe even took the prize with his nostalgic look at early Jewish America, World of Our Fathers. National Book Award winner for fiction in 2000? Jewish author Susan Sontag.

Likewise, in the Nobel Prize for Literature world, Jewish author Elias Canetti won the award in 1981, notes the (Jewish) Forward, “shortly after Saul Bellow and Isaac Bashevis Singer, in a sequence that some anti-Semites in the Hispanic world shamelessly called ‘Stockholm’s Jewish triumvirate.’” [STAVANS, 1999, p. 1] In 1987, Jewish writer Joseph Brodsky also took the Nobel prize.
In 1994, Jewish author Lois Lowry won for the second time the American Library Association’s Newberry Medal for books for young adults. She had won the award in 1990 for Number the Stars, “the stirring tale of the Danish people's heroic efforts to protect their Jewish population from the fate that befell their brothers and sisters in the rest of Europe.” [HOFFMAN, M., 4-10-94, p. 23]

“We live in a moment where everywhere in the realm of prose Jewish writers have discovered their Jewishness to be eminently a marketable commodity,” wrote Jewish author Charles Madison in 1976, “the much vaunted alienation to be their passport into the heart of Gentile American culture.” [MADISON, C., p. 272] “Everyone is by now aware,” noted Robert Alter in 1965, “of the fact that literary Jewishness has become a distinct commercial asset.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 13] “The new atmosphere has created a phenomenon which is especially evident in intellectual circles and on college campuses,” noted James Jaffe in 1968, “Jewishness is now acceptable, sometimes even fashionable. At the opera and other important cultural battlegrounds in New York, socially prestigious women are constantly seen with Jewish escorts … Yiddish words pepper the speech of television personalities from Jerry Lewis, who is Jewish, to Johnny Carson, who isn’t.” [JAFFE, J., 1968, p. 45]

Pop singer Linda Ronstadt read Herman Wouk’s Marjorie Morningstar (first published in 1955) as a teenager: “It screwed me up about love and romance and everything. But I loved it then, and it made me wish I was Jewish.” [WHITFIELD, AMERICAN, p. 12] Marilyn Monroe once expressed an affinity for the Jewish world that surrounded her in Hollywood, saying, “It’s like the Jews are the orphans of the world. Maybe that’s why I feel so close to them.” [STRASBERG, S., p. 56] Upon marrying Jewish playwright Arthur Miller, she declared that “if I have kids, I think they should be Jewish. Anyway, I can identify with the Jews. Everybody’s always out to get them, no matter what they do, like me.” [STRASBERG, p. 112] As Susan Strasberg notes, “Over the next year she’d pepper her conversations with Jewish expressions as if reaffirming her conversion to Judaism. ‘Hi Bubuleh, oy vay, what tsures.’” [STRASBERG, p. 112]

A Jewish friend of Elvis Presley, Larry Geller, even “introduced Elvis to new ways of thinking about Judaism … Both he and Marty [Lacker, another Jewish friend] claimed credit for encouraging Elvis’ decision that Christmas to have a new headstone placed on [Elvis’ mother’s] grave – with a Jewish star on one side, a cross on the other.” [GURALNICK, p. 190] (Elvis’ world of Jews included music agents, movie directors, his Beverly Hills dentist Max Shapiro, and the South African doctor (later exposed as a fraud) Laurenz Johannes Griessel Landau who, while treating Elvis for acne, made a homosexual pass at him. [GURALNCK, p. 47, 620]

“The mostly Jewish New York intellectuals and their magazines – Partisan Review, Commentary, Dissent, New York Review of Books, Public Interest – have assumed an almost mythic position among American intellectuals,” says Edward Shapiro, “Thus, Elizabeth Hardwick once noted that she had left Kentucky to become a New York Jewish intellectual (her conversion took place in the office of the New York Review of Books). Hardwick was not alone in assuming mistakenly that to be a New York intellectual (or any intellectual) one had to be Jewish. Victor Navasky [also Jewish] editor of the Nation, jested in 1966 that ‘rumors to the contrary notwithstanding, you don’t have to be Jewish to be an intellectual.’” [SHAPIRO, Sidney, p. 153]

The commercial pluses to being Jewish (and its attendant homage as eternal victims) in a Jewish-controlled environment were obvious. Even Gentile writers like Robert Lowell and Mary McCarthy stretched back to claim distant Jewish blood in their family trees. [KOSTELANETZ, p. 28] “The exotic appeal that ethnicity offered to the participants in mass culture,” says Stephen Whitfield, “has sometimes even seemed to put the dominant group on the defensive. Nelson Rockefeller found it advantageous to ventilate hints of his admittedly distant Jewish ancestry. Caroline Kennedy marched down the aisle of a church [with a Jew]; a character in the film Pete ‘n Tillie (1972) emphasized his one-fourth Jewish ancestry because, ‘I’m a social climber.’” [WHITFIELD, American, p. 11]

African-American radio personality Howard Lester, once emphatically decried as an anti-Semite by New York Jews (even threatened and physically assailed by Jewish protest rallies), eventually decided that, considering the fact that he had a great-grandfather who was Jewish, he would convert to Judaism. A key influence in his decision was all the information he was hearing about Jews in the Holocaust; it is the key entre to empathy for Jews for many: the Jewish victim paradigm. “The more I read [about the Holocaust],” Lester wrote, “the greater my numbness at the horror, the greater my numbness as I read of Jews affirming God even in the midst of their own negation.” [LESTER, H., p. 122] One day Lester wakes up “and my lips are moving. I listen. I am trying to say ‘Sh’ma Yisrael Adonai Eloheenu Adonat Ehad’ [Hear O Israel. The Lord our God the Lord is One]. At night those words resound in me and when I awake, they are the first words I hear from my lips” [LESTER, H., p. 123] … I have lived these past nine months amidst the ashes of the crypt in heaven. Auschwitz and Treblinka are part of my daily pain. The spirits of murdered Jewish children shoot marbles with me in the dirt of a parsonage yard.” [LESTER, H., p. 133]

In 1998, Ross Wetzsteon, a Montana-born WASP (who made the pilgrimage to New York City), wrote an extraordinarily definitive explication of WASP-self hate, and his cravings to be a Jew, in a Village Voice (Jewish-owned and edited) article. The strange product of Freud’s Judeocentric psychotherapy, a journalism career dominated by Jews, alienation from the norms of American popular culture, long-term romantic relationships with ONLY Jewish women, and estrangement from his own family lead him to the rescuing life jacket of Jews. Wetzsteon embraces all Jewish-enforced stereotypes of the Jew: Jewish moral superiority, Jews as eternal victims, Jewish powerlessness, Jewish blunt- ness and vulgarity as a form of liberation, and Jews as being more intellectually interesting. What one begins to recognize at core here is a kind of ideological indoctrination process, in Wetzsteon’s case deeply rooted in his psychotherapy sessions. Wetzsteon below maps his metamorphosis into his configuration as an ‘honorary’ Jew:
“Everyone always assumes I’m Jewish … So why do people think I’m Jewish? My name? My profession? But more interesting than why I pass for Jewish is why it pleases me so … I was immediately drawn to the Jews because they seemed so attractive and because the WASPs seemed so repellent. It was at this time, in one of the most painful choices of my life, that I decided to become a scholar rather than play centerfield for the Yankees … It became clear … that the Jews represented … an acceptable rebellion, in that they embodied both a rejection of unfulfilling values and a repository of honorable new ones … Jews were both homeless and universal, which appeals to a mind enamored of ‘disengaged’ sensibilities. And, since most of the Jews I knew were leftists … [there was] radicalism as the Jewish version of juvenile delinquency … What Jews seemed to be saying was, ‘In our powerlessness, we have a superior moral heritage’ – an appealing conceit for a teenage intellectual who faced the dilemma of being at the center of his culture while feeling both socially ill at ease and psychologically estranged … I came to see WASP life as a rigid, deceitful facade that had to be penetrated if one cared at all about what was real. Self-control, self-restraint, self-effacement were the pious names given to what were really decorous lies … [I had] a yearning affection for what I perceived as ‘Jewish openness’ … So-called Jewish vulgarity, in short, became a kind of intellectual and moral critique of WASP mentality … I’ll never forget how much my therapy had to do with my pleasure. For me, therapy was primarily a means of liberating inner vulgarity, of releasing a kind of pushiness and ostentation in my psychic life – it was a way of discovering that the things I valued most were radically opposed to the WASP ideals that I internalized … The important point is that it was quite clear to me that the Jew and the psychotherapist joined forces in the abolition of WASP hypocrisy, WASP decorum, and WASP censorship. I even came to see a parallel – while obviously aware of the disparities – between Jewish social liberation and my own psychological liberation. My ghetto was my head, my assimilation was through therapy … I’ve always been attracted to Jewish women – in fact, every long relationship I’ve ever had, including my marriage, was with a Jewish woman … I regard myself as an ‘honorary Jew … [But] I realized … that by seeking my identity in Jews … I was denying their identity to themselves.” [WETZSTEON, R., 9/6-12-98]

Chaim Bermant notes the necessary pro-Jewish metamorphosis that often takes place among non-Jews in Jewish-dominated environments – in this case Hollywood:

“One met the occasional gentile [in Hollywood], like the Skouras brothers, who were Greek, or Winfield Sheehan, who was Irish, but the whole ambience was Jewish and even the gentiles acquired Jewish mannerisms, expressions, and habits of speech. As the Scottish director, John Grierson, observed after a stay in Hollywood, ‘After a few years in the place, your foreskin falls away.’” [BERMANT, C., 1977, p. 92]
Indeed, this kind of anti-WASP deconstructionist world view needed strong ideological encouragement to prosper. After World War II, and militantly after 1967, the Family and its various satellites began to pay more and more attention to their Jewish identities. “New questions arose,” says Alexander Bloom, “… and an essential component of [the Family’s] character – their Jewishness – re-emerged to demand attention.” [BLOOM, p. 125] Largely children of immigrants (or immigrants themselves), “we knew,” wrote Irving Howe, “that but for an accident of geography we might also be bars of soap.” [BLOOM, p. 137]

Unable to talk about the Holocaust itself,” says Bloom, “[the Family] began in postwar years to talk about themselves as Jews, something they had rarely done before … By the 1950s … many had become ‘enthusiasts of Martin Buber, while the whole of the New York literary world was ringing with praise of the Yiddish storytellers, the Hassidim, Maimonides, medieval Hebrew poetry, and even Rabbis of the Talmud.” [BLOOM, p. 142] “To ‘write Jewish,’” noted Charles Angoff and Meyer Levin in 1970, “is in fashion, but recently the Jewishness in much of our fiction has been one of bland nostalgia … or else it is a Jewishness of mystification cum mysticism, in which the ancient wisdom-image of the Jew is invoked through Hasidic themes or the idea of Buber … or it is a Jewishness treated satirically – basically an attack on the complacent middle class.” [ANGOFF/LEVIN, p. 15]

The move away from Jewish allegiance to the American melting pot, universalism, and left-wing causes to rationales for Jewish parochialism within American universities and public life had begun. Some members of the family – Irving Kristol, Daniel Bell, and Nathan Glazer – even joined Milton Himmelfarb, an official of the American Jewish Committee, for group study of Maimonides’ texts and other Jewish religious literature. “One after another,” notes Alexander Bloom, “under the influence of political pressure, social analysis, and personal awareness, the intellectual began to reassess and reconsider their Jewish past.” [BLOOM, p. 143]

Susan Sontag found overwhelming connection to photographs of concentration camp victims:

“Nothing I have seen – in photography or real life – ever cut me as sharply, deeply, instantaneously. Indeed it seemed plausible to divide my life into two parts … Some limit had been reached, and not only that of horror; I felt irrecoverably grieved, wounded, but a part of my feeling started to tighten; something went dead; something is still crying.” [TORREY]

The classic irreconcilable dialectic of divisive Jewish values in an all-inclusive, universalistic society began to be addressed by the Jewish Mafia and explained away:

“Insistence upon being ‘one-hundred-per-cent something,” wrote Harold Rosenberg, makes us “uncomfortable when they debate whether one can be an American and a Jew.” [BLOOM, p. 145] “I was born in galut and I accept, now gladly,” wrote Daniel Bell, one time editor of the New Leader, and editor at Fortune, and a co-editor of the Public Interest, “though once in pain, the double burden of my self-consciousness, the outward life of an American and the inward secret life of a Jew.” [BELL, Reflections, p. 322]

Leslie Fiedler found it useful to tie the particulars of “being Jewish” into its traditional messianic subsuming of all humanity under the dominion of ennobled Jewish suffering:

“In this apocalyptic period of atomization and uprooting, of a catholic terror and a universal alienation, the image of the Jew tends to become the image of everyone; and we are approaching the day when the Jew will come to seem the central symbol, the essential myth of the whole western world.” [BLOOM, p. 150]

“Some, like [Gentile] social critic Dwight MacDonald,” says Steven Zipperstein, “felt sickened by much of what he read in Commentary, where, as he saw it, his friends engaged in self-indulgent trivia. Why, he asked, were such bright people devoting so much time to ‘uninteresting exercises in Jewish culture?’” [ZIPPERSTEIN, p. 20]

But the first steps of the “Holocaust is Unique” formula, and the “humankind should look to the Jews for guidance” enforcement had begun in earnest, and the maze of Jewish guilt and self-obsession was spread like a tablecloth over the American scene. “The Jews’ life and wanderings, “ decided Daniel Bell, “are, in a sense, the image of the world’s destiny. His heightened sense of his own alienation is a prescient tremor of the quake to come.” [BLOOM, p. 153] (This “alienation” from the American power structure has been, of course, at key points a complete delusion. Chaim Bermant, for example, notes the Jewish “outsider” status in Hollywood, the most profound influence upon popular culture: “An essential part of Jewishness is the feeling that one is an outsider, not part of the crowd. In Hollywood the entire crowd was so Jewish that non-Jews felt outside. Nor did they have to feel strange whenever they moved east to confer with the New York end of the business, for that too was Jewish.”) [BERMANT, C., 1977, p. 99]

“Whereas [the Family] had earlier argued for a role as the modern ‘cleric’ and arbiter of modern culture because of their intellectual calling,” says Alexander Bloom, “they now claimed to offer a uniquely appropriate view of modern society, thanks to their ethnic background.” [BLOOM, p. 151] “One cannot … simply discount the possibility that some essentially Jewish qualities may adhere to the writing of the most thoroughly acculturated Jews,” wrote Robert Alter in the 1960s, “Most readers have sensed in at least some of the ‘post-traditional’ or ‘transitional’ Jewish writers certain modes of imagination or general orientation towards art and experience that seems characteristically Jewish, even though the writer scrupulously avoids all reference to his ethnic origins.” [ALTER, p. 54] “A Jewish book,” declared Ludwig Lewisohn years earlier, “is one written by someone who is well aware that he or she is Jewish. Jewish literature, therefore, consists of all the works – written in every age and language – whose creators knew they were Jewish.” [SHAKED, p. 169]

Clement Greenberg (who was for a while the editor of the Contemporary Jewish Record), says Bloom, “asserted that [the Jewish author Franz] Kafka held a steady belief in halakhic order, the belief that Jewish history stopped with the extinction of Palestine and will begin again when the Messiah comes. Until then, Jewish life is to be kept ‘humdrum, thoroughly prosaic and historically immobile within the fence of the law. Such history as persists in Gentile history.’” [BLOOM, p. 154]

Whereas in earlier years Harold Rosenberg was “bothered by the chauvinism of certain Jewish zealots in Commentary,” [BLOOM, p. 160] and William Phillips “complained throughout the 80s that intellectuals were now asking whether or not policies were good for Jews, [TWERSKY, p. 40] the New York Intellectuals had come, says Alexander Bloom, “to accept and, largely, to proclaim their Jewishness. Their ethnic identity overcame their former universalism … Now self-defined Jewish intellectuals, they laid claim to a special appropriateness for their personal viewpoint and to a high value for their insight.” [BLOOM, p. 153]

“The Alfred Kazin who proclaimed his revolt from Jewish sentimental chauvinism,” notes Edward Shapiro, “was the same person who wrote in an autobiography titled New York Jew how the Holocaust became the consuming event of his life.” [SHAPIRO, p. 156] Irving Howe had come to believe that “the only subject truly worthy of a serious writer … [is] the problem of collective destiny, the fate of a people.” [KOSTELANETZ] At Philip Rahv’s death, it was found that he had donated his estate to Israel. [SHAPIRO, p. 287] “I remember,” notes Mary McCarthy, “Philip Rahv saying that all Gentiles, without exception, are anti-Semitic.” [MCCARTHY, p. 98] Midge Decter’s views of Israel? “What I do know,” she says, “is that Zionism was bred in my bones … As for me, the unswerving Zionist, there was the miracle of the establishment of the state of Israel.” [DECTER, M., 1999, p. 185, 187] Susan Sontag? She was awarded Israel’s Jerusalem Prize for 2001. As Alexander Cockburn notes:

“[Israeli minister Shimon] Peres has been quoted as admiring Sontag’s definition of herself. ‘First she’s Jewish, then she’s a writer, then she’s American. She loves Israel with emotion and the world with obligation’ … Sontag has always been appreciative of irony. Does she see no irony in the fact that she, relentless critic of Slobodan Milosevic (upon whose extradition to face trial in its Hague Court as a ‘war criminal’ the US is now conditioning all aid to Yugoslavia) is now planning to travel to get a prize in Israel, currently led by a man, Ariel Sharon, whose credentials as a war criminal are robust and indeed undisputed by all people of balanced and independent judgement … Does Sontag sense no irony is getting a prize premised on the author’s sensitivity to issues of human freedom, in a society where the freedom of Palestinians is unrelentingly repressed?” [COCKBURN, A., 3-20-01]

Hannah Arendt, a German-Jewish refugee, accelerated this interest in Jewishness and, especially, the Holocaust, with her controversial 1963 volume, Eichmann in Jerusalem (first serialized in the New Yorker). Her evidence for Jewish complicity in their own demise in Europe (and her critique that the Israelis’ focus upon only crimes against Jews by the captured Nazi was a disservice to wider justice) provoked a firestorm of Jewish outrage. “It is this tension between the parochial and the universal,” wrote Daniel Bell, “that explains the furrious emotions over Miss Arendt’s book. For she writes from the standpoint of a universal principle which denies any parochial [Jewish] identity.” [BELL, AL-PHABET, p. 312] Irving Howe wrote that, in Jewish reaction to her book, “the long-suppressed grief evoked by the Holocaust burst out. It was as if her views, which roused many of us to fury, enabled us to finally speak the unspeakable.”
[BLOOM, p. 329]

What, wondered Howe, would the goyim say to this Jewish dirty laundry?

“Hundreds of thousands of good-middle class Americans will have learned from those articles that the Jewish leadership in Europe was cowardly, inept, and even collaborationist, and that if Jews had not ‘co-operated’ with the Nazis, fewer than 5 to 6 million would have been killed. No small matter: and you will forgive some of us if we react strongly to this charge.” [BLOOM, p. 330]

Dissent, of which Howe was editor, organized a public discussion about Arendt’s book. Mary McCarthy, a non-Jewish member of the Family, thought the book “splendid.” “Apparently,” she noted, “this is so because I am a Gentile
… I don’t ‘understand’ … It is as if Eichmann in Jerusalem had required a special pair of Jewish spectacles to make its ‘true purport’ visible.” [BLOOM, p. 330]

“The emotions tapped,” says Alexander Bloom, “demonstrated the degree to which Jewishness remained a sensitive issue. Having worked out their own personal sense of Jewishness in the first postwar years, after the decade of cosmopolitan universalism, the New York Intellectuals had not fully resolved the more general questions of Jews in society. Did Jews constitute a particular social grouping with unique collective attributes?” [BLOOM, p. 331]

Disbanding allegiance to universalistic values, says J. J. Goldberg, throughout the Jewish community “a new set of basic values came to replace them: loytalty to the Jewish people, commitment to its survival, and hostility to its enemies.” [GOLDBERG, p. 162] Norman Mailer set sights on one of them:

“In their immaculate cleanliness, in the somewhat antiseptic odor of their stringent toilet water and perfume, in abnegation of their walks, in the heavy sturdy moves so many demonstrated of bodies in life’s harness, there was the muted tragedy of the WASP.” [SCHRAG, p. 187]

Mailer points the way to what Jewish observer James Yaffe outlined in 1968 as the nature of the generic “Jewish intellectual”:

“The Jewish intellectual, whatever else he may do, seldom stretches under a tree and just thinks. And then, the intellect can’t be just a tool for him; it has to be a weapon too. He doesn’t use it simply to discover what the world is like, or to create something beautiful, or to communicate his ideas. He must use it to beat down his competitors, to prove his superiority. From him controversy is inseparable from intellectual activity. Watch him at a party: note the vicious delight with which he backs lesser intellects into a corner. He’s implacable; neither social decorum nor human compassion can soften his attack … Above all he is very concerned about his ‘significance.’ He must always have something profound to say, even if he has nothing profound to say. There is nobody like a Jewish intellectual for making Important Statements.” [YAFFE, J., 1968, p. 235]

“Intellectuals,” wrote Jack Porter, “are far from ineffectual, although they may be snobs. On the contrary, they exert enormous power, more than any of the 17th century Hof-Juden ever dreamed of. At the same time, in the aftermath of the Holocaust and the establishment of the Jewish state – there has been a definite shift in their allegiance to Jewish causes.” [PORTER, p. 35]

“These intellectuals,” says Alexander Bloom, “posited that Jews had a central place because of their Jewishness. They now felt that Jewishness, once a source of scorn among some writers, offered a special insight, useful in the analysis of the modern condition.” [BLOOM, p. 150] “The Jews,” proclaimed Jewish author Isiah Berlin,

“like the strangers seeking to lose themselves in the strange tribe, find themselves compelled to devote all their energies and talents to the task of understanding and adaptation upon which their lives depend at every step. Hence the fantastic over-development of their faculties for detecting trends, and discriminating the shades and hues of changing individual and social situations, often before they have been noticed anywhere else. Hence too, their celebrated critical acumen, their astonishingly sharp eye for the analysis of the past, the present, and sometimes the future also – in short their well-known genius for observation and classification – above all for reportage in its sharpest and finest forms.” [ISAACS, p. 55]

“Through their Jewish writers,” declared Leslie Fiedler, “Americans, after the second World War, were able to establish a new kind of link with Europe in place of the old pale-face connection – a link not with the Europe of decaying castles and Archbishop of Canterbury, nor with that of the French symbolists, and the deeply polite Action Française – for those are all Christian Europe; but with the post-Christian Europe of Marx and Freud, which is to say, of secularized Judaism, as well as the Europe of surrealism and existentialism, Kafka, neo-Chassidism …” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 14]

“By the 1960s,” notes Robert Christopher, “Jewish writers had undeniably supplanted white southern ones as the nation’s leading school of novelists; they had, in fact, come to dominate American fiction to such an extent that, as Norman Podhoretz recalls in Making It, that wayward WASP Gore Vidal was moved to complain that there was no longer room on any list of important contemporary American writers for more than one ‘OK guy’.” [CHRISTOPHER, p. 228] (Symbolic to all this, in 2002 the new Jewish president of Brooklyn, Marty Markowitz, made the news when he called an old portrait of George Washington that hung in his office “an old man” and announced that “he will probably hang a portrait of a black or a woman in his office in place of the country’s first president.”) [SOCKWELL-MASON/SEIFMAN, 1-16-02]
“Jewishness has become fashionable,” wrote Jewish author Peter Schrag in 1971, “In New York, which is where most of the soapboxes are kept, it is the goy and not the Jew (or the Negro) who feels defensive. Half the major book publishers are Jewish and probably more than half of the art dealers, the music managers (booking agents, publishers, Tin Pan Alley flacks) and the senior brass of network television.” [SCHRAG, p. 108]

Gentile writer Chandler Brossard noted (in the American Jewish Committee’s Commentary magazine) the trend of Jewish dominance in American “intellectual” life, and the way Jewish culture subsumed all others, as early as 1950. Brossard recognized the strong influence upon him to submit to Jewish intellectual landlords in order to succeed:

“There is a new alienated man around. He is the Gentile intellectual in New York City. Hopelessly outnumbered by his Jewish colleagues on the New York intellectual scene, of late he has begun to feel that his back his against the wall … Partly consciously, partly unconsciously, [the Gentile] starts assuming some of the wise style of the Jewish intellectual, to overcome what he thinks is his own naivete, in order to become part of the group surrounding him. The implications of this are almost infinite. Strange things happen. His vocabulary becomes spiced with Jewish inflections and expressions (his friends teach him the correct pronunciations: he has an increasingly strong tendency to say [the Yiddish term] ‘nu?’ instead of ‘so?’ His gestures become sensual, curvilinear, and an elaborate and necessary part of his communication. His humor becomes less mirthful – so long, Mark Twain! – and more ironic, twisted, oblique, and gaggy. (If he is a writer this gag quality finally gags him insofar as his originality is concerned). He cannot remember the last time he told a joke that did not involved a Jew or the Jewish point of view … He feels, in effect, a kind of clown. His confusion is not helped by the fact that for the first time in his life he is now a member of a minority. It almost seems that he is a kind of extravagance of his Jewish circle … He wonders whether he is ever really being accepted; he feels that his Jewish friends do certain things for each other that they do not do for him. Is he at the center or the periphery? … He often winds up playing straight man to his friends at a nearly all-Jewish party … He has the choice now of recognizing his background and origins, his difference, and living accordingly, or of denying them and reshaping himself with the help, or proximity, of his Jewish friends. The temptation to submit to reshaping is strong; it is hard to be different in these surroundings.” [BROSSARD, C., in ROGOW, A., 1961, p. 349-353]

“It is not just that Jewishness was chic in mainstream circles,” says Karen Brodkin, “It also became mainstream. Observing that J.D. Salinger, Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, and Philip Roth were the great American – not great Jewish – writers of the period, Peter Rose notes that ‘for perhaps the first time in American literary history, the Jew became everyman and, through a curious transposition, everyman became the Jew … Most American Jews are part of the big wide – and white – Establishment.’ Indeed, as Neil Gabler has argued for Hollywood up to World War II, Jews helped create white Americanness.” [BRODKIN, p. 142]

In the world of academe, Irving Horowitz centers on Jewish preeminence:

“An intellectual immigration took place that changed the landscape of American sociology no less than that of American sociology itself … The coming to American shores of [immigrant Jewish scholars] Theodore Abel, Paul F. Lazarsfeld, Theodor Adorno, Franz Neumann, Marie Jahoda, to name just a few, changed the emphasis in sociology from civilizational issues to psychological issues … [HOROWITZ, I., p. 75] Can one seriously imagine the study of sexuality without references to [Jews like] Sigmund Freud, Alfred Adler, and [non-Jewish adherent to psychoanalytic theory] Carl G. Jung? … Without them, there would be no Helene Deutsch, or Anna Freud, or Marie Bonaparte; that is, particular inquiry into the nature of female sexuality … The same holds true for subdisciplines like political theory. One presumes that a literate person has a working knowledge of the works of Hannah Arendt, Harold Lasswell, and Leo Strauss, among others … It is conceivable, perhaps imperative, if the focus is international law versus national power, that one world substitute Hans Morgenthau, Hans Kohn, and Hans Kahn for the aforementioned trio.” [HOROWITZ, I., p. 125]

Karen Brodkin cites another commentator about the Jewish molding of American values in broader, popular culture:

“In the century of Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, and Dinah Shore, need we ask who but a Jew is best a packaging unwhining blonde fantasy figures? I don’t know about you, darlings, but ever since I found out that Kathie Lee Gifford was née Epstein, I don’t assume anything. Why be surprised then, that Barbie, the ultimate shiksa goddess, was invented by a nice Jewish lady, Ruth Handler (with her husband Eliot, co-founder of Mattel?) Indeed, the famous snub-nosed plastic ideal with the slim hips of a drag queen is in fact named after a real Jewish princess from L.A., Handler’s daughter, Barbara (who must have been hell to know in high school!) Her brother’s name was Ken.” [BRODKIN, p. 143]

A Jewish author, Irving Berlin, penned the famous Christian-based songs “White Christmas” and “Easter Parade.” Even the 1990s president of the board of directors of the WASP world’s hallowed Miss America pageant is David Frisch. Ed McClanahan notes the Jewish dimensions to the Gidget surfing icon:

“No no, not Sandra Dee or Sally Fields, nor Deborah Walley or Cindy Carroll or any of the legions of Gidget impersonators of the big screen or the small screen or even, yes, the stage. We’re talking the Real Deal here, the original Gidget, the ur-Gidget you might say, Kathy Kohner Zuckerman herself, whose father, a Hollywood screenwriter named Frederick Kohner, wrote the hugely popular little novel … in 1957 … and made his daughter Kathy, who inspired it, a legend in the world of surfing … The book was regarded as mildly scandalous in its day (‘Any parents,’ fulmi-nated the Nebraska Farmer, ‘who allow their teen-agers to talk as Gidget does should be soundly spanked.’”) Nowadays, in the era of Sex in the City, it seems as innocent as Rebecca at Sunnybrook Farm. Still, the Gidget character is a bit of a potty-mouth (it was she who brought the adjective ‘bitchen’ into the language.)” [MCLANAHAN, E.]

In the sexual realm, in the formation of popular American values, notes Anthony Heilbut, “The two major therapeutic changes of the sixties and seventies were ushered in by [Jewish] émigrés, Fritz Perls of Esalen and Wilhelm Reich … Their positions have become the roots of such American phenomena as ‘est’ or sex therapy … Of all Freud’s disciples, Reich was the most obsessed with sexuality.” [HEILBUT, p. 439] (Reich died in an American prison in 1957, held on charges of “criminal contempt” in a case involving his shipments of “orgone accumulators.”)

Perls was also “the founder and main figure of Gestalt therapy.” [MASSON, p. 209] At every group Gestalt therapy session, he recited the “Gestalt prayer,” famous doggerel that profoundly influenced, and exemplified, 1960s-era ethics:

“I do my thing and you do your thing.
I am not in this world to live up to your expectations.
And you are not in this world to live up to mine.
You are you and I am I.
And if by chance we find each other, it’s beautiful.
If not, it can’t be helped.” [MASSON, p. 209]

In the 1960s, the American Jewish Committee even estimated that 40 percent of the youth who emigrated to the Haight-Ashbury Hippie Mecca in San Francisco were Jewish – a total of about 71,000 of them. The average stay there was 3–4 months. [YAFFE, J., 1968, p. 269] Jewish psychiatrist Oscar Janiger (a cousin of famous poet and counter-culture icon Allen Ginsberg – “administered almost 3,000 doses of LSD to 1,000 volunteers. Among them were [Cary] Grant, fellow actors Jack Nicholson and Rita Moreno, author Aldous Huxley and musician Andre Previn … Although his work predated that of LSD guru Timothy Leary, he never gained widespread recognition for it.” [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 8-17-01]

James Davison Hunter notes, in an article entitled When Psychotherapy Replaces Religion, one of the occupational fields that has profoundly influenced the moral climate of modern America:

“When it comes to the moral life of children, the vocabulary of the psychologist frames virtually all public discussion. For decades now, contributions from philosophers and theologians have been muted or non-existent … Rather, it is the psychologists, and in particular the developmental and educational psychologists who have owned this field – in theory and in practice. All the major players in the last half century have been psychologists. Eric Erickson, B. F. Skinner, Benjamin Spock, Havighurst, Carl Rodgers, Jean Piaget, Abraham Maslow, Rudolph Dreikurs, William Glasser, Lawrence Kohlberg, Louis Rath, Sidney Simon, Jane Loevinger, Daniel Levinson, Robert Selman, Maurice Elias – their assumptions, concepts, and paradigms have largely determined how all of us think about the moral lives of children, and, indeed, about moral life generally.” [HUNTER, J.D., 2000, p. 5-22]

Not surprisingly, well over half of these influential figures have been Jewish.

In the field of anthropology, Jewish academic Franz Boas was the most preeminent and influential anthropologist in the early years of the twentieth century. This genre of the field absorbed and incorporated many of the premises of Freudianism. “By 1915,” notes Kevin MacDonald, “the Boasians controlled the American Anthropology Association and held a two-thirds majority on its Executive Board … By 1926 every major department of anthropology was headed by Boas’ students, the majority of whom were Jewish.” [MACDONALD, 1998, p. 25] Jewish students and ideological descendants of Boas, who themselves became influential academics, included Alexander Goldenweiser, Melville Herskovits, Robert Lowie, Paul Radin, Edward Sapir, Leslie Spir, Alexander Lesser, Ruth Bunzel, Gene Weltfish, Esther Schiff Goldfrank, Ruth Landes, and Ashley Montagu [born Israel Ehrenburg].

Sociology? A Jewish historian and social anthropologist even suggested, notes British sociologist W. S. F. Pickering, that “there is something about those characteristic virtues and viewpoints [of the influential Jewish sociologist Emil Durkheim] which cannot be understood by gentile readers … that only a Jew can understand him and his sociology.” [PICKERING, p. 10] (Durkheim started out in early life as a rabbinical student). “By the early 1960s,” says David Hollinger, “the large numbers of Jews in sociology led to a faculty-club banter to the effect that sociology had become a Jewish discipline. In the literary world the triumph of Norman Mailer, Saul Bellow, and J. D. Salinger led Leslie Fiedler to hail the great takeovers by Jewish-American writers of a task ‘inherited from certain Gentile predecessors.’” [HOLLINGER, p. 28]

Even some academics who aren’t publicly reckoned to be Jewish are Jewish. As Hershel Shanks notes,

“I think of a teacher of mine long ago, one of the most eminent sociologists in the country – Robert King Merton. Even when I was studying with him at Columbia University in the 1950s, there were rumors that he was Jewish. Recently – he is nearly 90 – he came out. He was born Meyer Schkolnick.” [SHANKS, H., 2000, p. 16]

“Jews found sociology attractive,” noted Family member Nathan Glazer in 1994, ‘It was particularly attractive to those who were socialists … In time the Jewish newcomers became the dominant figures in sociology. Concurrently, they abandoned their early radicalism.” [GLAZER, DECOMPOSITION, p. 4] After World War II, notes Irving Horowitz, “young scholars came from other walks of life into sociology … The field soon became populated by Jews to such a degree that jokes abounded: one did not need the synagogue, the [the minimum number of Jewish men necessary to hold religious services] was to be found in sociology departments; or one did not need a sociology of Jewish life, since the two had become synonymous.” [HOROWITZ, I., p. 77]
Stanley Rothman and S. Robert Lichter note Jewish radical political dominance in a range of academic subworlds:

“Within academia, Jewish faculty sparked revolts against the ‘establishment’ in their professions, struggling to turn them in directions of direct political action. In the American Political Science Association, for example, the membership of the Caucus for a New Politics, a radical activist group, was initially overwhelmingly Jewish. (Jews were also heavily represented on the ‘liberal’ opposition Ad Hoc Committee, but here they constituted no more than about half of a highly fluctuating and informal membership). The same pattern emerged in the Modern Language Association, where the radical caucus was led by Louis Kampf and Paul Lauter, both of Jewish background. The Union of Radical Political Economists also initially contained a disproportionate number of individuals of Jewish background. While William Appleman Williams, the dean of the group, was not Jewish, a majority of the leading cold war revisionists among historians were (Alperowitz, Kolko, Horowitz, etc.). The largest number of those radical educators and writers on education who argued that American education was linked to capitalism’s need to keep lower classes (including blacks) in their place were also of Jewish background (e.g., Herbert Gintis, Donald and Beatrice Gross, Jonathan Kozol, Edgar Z. Friedenberg, Herbert Kohl, Charles Weingartner, Gerald Weisntein). The same thing was true in sociology …” [ROTHMAN/LICHTER, 1982, p. 104-105]

In this growing context of Jewish pre-eminence throughout academia, Richard Hofstadter already felt secure enough in 1963 to write that “Catholic scholars and writers tend to be recognized belatedly by their co-religionists, when they are recognized at all. All this concerns, of course, not so much the anti-intellectualism of American Catholicism as its cultural impoverishment, its non-intellectualism.” [HOFSTADTER, p. 140]

Hofstadter, who obviously basked in his many Jewish cultural treasures, also turned for solace to his own identity chauvinism to attack the then-current beatnik movement for its own “anti-intellectualism.” Looking past the Beat's moralist, populist, non-materialist, and oft-times Zen worldviews, Hofstadter said that “the beatniks have repudiated the path of intellectualism … to [live] lives of inverted sainthood, marked by an acceptance of poverty, and their willingness to do without the usual satisfaction of a career and a regular income … The movement seems unable to rise above its adolescent inspiration.” [HOFSTADTER, p. 421] In 1998, Jewish American professor Jules Chametsky was commissioned to edit a new Norton Anthology of Jewish American Literature. “One could argue,” says Chametsky, “that without African-Americans and Jews, popular culture would be very thin indeed in America.” [CARNEY, p. 22] (With a different set of cultural dominators, one wonders, would it not have been “thin,” but something else?) Noting a 1922 novel by Jewish German author Hugo Bettauer (The City Without Jews), Jewish author Michael Brenner exudes the same arrogance and elitism about Jewish cultural dominance of pre-Nazi German culture:

“As a city without Jews, Bettauer’s Vienna soon becomes a dull and boring place where rough woolens are declared the latest style of fashion, the state economy is overburdened with debts, the currency loses its value, and intellectual discussion and cultural activities are defined by the low standard of the surrounding peasant population.” [GRUNFELD, F., 1996, p. xvii] (By whose criteria are such standards “low?”)

The shoving aside of non-Jewish writers and thinkers, and non-Jewish traditions and history, by empowered Jewish particularists has been for decades vigorously undertaken. “One thing did matter to somebody like me, classified as a WASP writer,” wrote Edward Hoagland in Commentary, “This was being told in print and occasionally in person that I and my heritage lacks vitality, that except perhaps for a residual arrogance the vitality had long since been squeezed dry, if it had ever in fact existed in this thin blood of mine. I was a museum piece, like some state-of-Mainer, because I could field no ancestor who had hawked tin pots in a Polish shtetl [Jewish village].” [HOAGLAND, p. 62]

One of the Jewish characters in prominent Jewish poet Delmore Schwartz’s prose pieces even proclaimed:

“My ancestors, in whom I take pride, but not personal pride, were scholars, poets and students of God when most of Europe worshipped sticks and stones; not that I hold that against any of you, for it is not your fault if your forebears were barbarians groveling and groping about for peat or something.” [ATLAS, J., 1977, p. 166]

One of the many results of all this kind of Jewish-enforced revisionism was a 1970 volume, The New Novel in America, subtitled The Kafkan Mode in Contemporary Fiction, which featured all Jewish writers except mention of some Gentiles in a final chapter addressed to “Minor American Novelists.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 27] An intriguing insight on Kafka comes from Clement Greenberg:

“Kafka’s own awareness of what he intuited about the Jewish condition through his fiction also explains why he became a Zionist … Kafka … presented the Gentile world and Gentile history as a trap for the likes of him and his … [Kafka’s] heroes … could, with very few exceptions, win out only at the last moments and only by destroying completely the fabric of the kind of reality in which they are embedded. For that reality, and that reality alone, is their enemy.” [GREENBERG, p. 270]

(This perspective, of course, is not only Zionist but the absolute paradigm for Orthodox Judaism, that is, at the end of time – in Greenberg’s last “moments” – Gentile society will be destroyed and Jews, who cannot ever be free in galut, will prevail over their historical nemeses).

Even earlier, in the 1950s, says Richard Kostelanetz, “[Jewish authors] Mordechai Richler was the most lauded Canadian writer, Don Jacobson and A. Alvarez as the most touted Englishmen, and Harold Rosenberg as the chief expert on ‘the New.’” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 28] With the publication of Philip Roth’s Portnoy’s Complaint, in 1971 Peter Schrag delighted in noting that “a few months after it was published an editor in New York rejected a manuscript with a note that ‘no one is interested in reading novels about WASPS.’” [SCHRAG, p. 110]

In due time, there were Jews – heralding the chauvinist core of their mythic past – who were declaring that even the English language wasn’t good enough for them. “I am intrigued,” wrote poet Joel Rosenberg in 1971, “with the possibility of Judaizing the English language.” [ROSENBERG, J., p. 170] “I feel cramped,” decided Cynthia Ozick, “I have come to it with notions it is too parochial to recognize. A language, like a people, has a history of ideas, but not all ideas: only those known to its experience. Not surprisingly, English is a Christian language. When I write in English, I live in Christendom.” [EISEN, p. 167] “One need only call to mind Cynthia Ozick,” says Jewish critic Mark Schechner, “currently the most prominent writer associated with the revolt against secular rationalism, to understand that her eminence in our literature, in our culture, portends something of a fairly large movement. In her own mind, and in ours, she symbolizes a distinct movement toward revival of forms of Jewish consciousness which, if not identical to halakhah [Jewish religious law] are certainly unthinkable without it.” [in SHAPIRO, M., p. 89]

“Having no longer to defend themselves from real or imagined charges of parochialism,” wrote Jewish critic Ruth Wisse in 1976, “the new Jewish writers of the 70s are free to explore the ‘trivial’ and particularist aspects of Judaism, and even, turning the tables, to speculate on the restrictive limits of English as a literary language.” [WALDEN, p. xiii]

By the 1960s and 1970s, notes Harold Wechsler and Paul Ritterband, Jewish scholars and intellectuals were “moved by emotions … particularly deriving from the Holocaust and the establishment of the state of Israel, to … explore the Jewish component in their studies of Persian literature or Gregorian chants or Renaissance art.” [WECHSLER, p. 282] By 1986 there was enough interest in Jewish religious roots for a Jewish scholar to author an entire volume about “Apocalyptic Messianism and Contemporary Jewish-American Poets.” Some of the poets who qualify for this genre, according to Davka, a Jewish ethnic magazine, include:

LITERATURE - “INTELLECTUALS” - “THE FAMILY”

“In a single characteristic year,” wrote Roger Kahn in 1968, “one careful researcher compiled a list of ‘books of Jewish interest in America.’ Marginalia were discarded; the list totaled 258. Where books lead, critics follow. Jewish critics proliferated so freely that one writer has made a most curious charge. He argues that Jewish novelists prosper because of the praise of Jewish critics.” [KAHN, R., p. 6]

James Shapiro is a Jewish professor in the esoteric field of the English Renaissance, “a culture deeply infused with Christianity.” “For years,” he noted in 1996, “I’d look around and see that many of the leading scholars of the early modern period were Jews.” [WINKLER, K., 1996, 2-2-96, p. A15] Shapiro’s narcissistic Jewish ethnocentrism, and exploration of his Jewish roots, eventually led him to decide that “at a time when many writers were trying to reinvent what it means to be English, the English increasingly defined themselves by what they were not. I would argue that the English were obsessed with the Jews.” Shapiro, noted journalist Karen Winkler, “admits freely a deeply personal stake in this argument. It is a way for him to confront his own relationship to Jewish history.” “I realized,” said Shapiro, “that I’m both a professor of English and a Jew, and I wanted to know how my people had shaped the culture I was studying.” [WINKLER, K., 1996, p. A8]

Likewise, Natalie Zeman Davis, a Princeton professor and “one of the leading scholars of early modern Europe,” remarked that

“I’m Jewish, and I see putting the Jews back into the main story of Europe as a way to tikkun, a word that means to repair. I’ve come to feel it as a way to repair the Nazi effort to efface the Jews of Europe.” [WINKLER, K., 2-2-96, p. A15]

Increased Jewish fascination with “Jewishness” and Jewish Orthodoxy, coupled with Jewish dominance in the publishing industry, recently created in the 1990s for novelist Nathan Englander (age 28) a unique opportunity. Englander, raised as an Orthodox Jew, was “discovered” by Lois Rosenthal, the editor of the journal Story. The Knopf publishing firm offered Englander $350,000 for a book of stories about life among Orthodox Jews, “an astonishing sum,” notes the Boston Globe, “for an unknown writer’s first work – for the collection [of stories] and a novel not yet written. Suddenly this spring’s deal catapulted the Jerusalem bachelor into literary stardom.” [ROCHMAN, p. C6]

Along the same theme, in 1994 Publishers Weekly announced the winner of the HarperCollins “get-published” contest, noting that:
“Advertised on the back of Olivia Goldsmith’s novel The Bestseller, the contest attracted an amazing 7,000 entries.” The lucky winner selected was Dalia Rabinovich whose book was a Latin magic-realist tale inspired by her Jewish grandparents immigration to Colombia.” [QUINN, p. 113]

Two years later the same journal noted major publishing interest in – of all things – Holocaust cookbooks:

“For a small press title, In Memory’s Kitchen: A Legacy from the Women of Terezin, edited by Cara De Silva, translated by Bianca Steiner Brown and published in September by Judaica publisher Jason Aronson, has received some incredible publicity: articles in Newsweek and USA Today, a November 17 full-page review in the New York Times Book Review and a People review expected to hit today. And now this unusual piece of Holocaust literature, a collection of recipes written (some on scraps of Nazi material) as legacy and life- affirming defiance by women in the Czech death camp Terezin, has received major trade house recognition: it will become a Delta trade paperback next September.” [QUINN, J., p. 243]

Then there are the likes of recovering heroin addict and famous author Elizabeth Wurtzel. Her first book, Prozac Nation: Young and Depressed in America “immediately became a national best seller when it was published in the United States in 1995 … Overnight she became a poster child for Generation X … She was paid a half-million dollars advance for her second book, Bitch. In Praise of Difficult Women … Her mother frets over her tendency to date shaygetzes (non-Jews), nevertheless insisting her mother has nothing to worry about because ‘I feel so Jewish … I am very proud of being Jewish.” [WENIG, G., 1999, p. 58-61]

By the 1990s, note David Desser and Lester Friedman,

“Critics usually interpret a Jewish author’s direct denial of ethnic influence as a conscious evasion, a personal blind spot, or a psychological problem; more frequently, they ignore denials in favor of analyzing the work, not listening to the author. Scholars even scrutinize these novels, poems, and short stories lacking Jewish characters and having little apparent relationship to Jewish culture for Jewish points of view, attitudes toward characters, and thematic selection … the underlying critical assumption is that the work of a Jewish writer must either overtly or covertly reflect a Jewish sensibility.” [DESSER, p. 4-5]

In 2001, the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles noted the increasing predominance of Jewish authors and Jewish themes in mainstream publishing:

“It’s time to make room for a newer generation of American Jewish writers, many of whom are young women who have not even hit 30. Their debut novels on Jewish themes are earning large advances, garnering stellar reviews and reaching best seller lists … Daisy Maryles, executive publisher of Publishers Weekly, the news magazine of publishing and bookselling, agrees: ‘Writers are a lot less self-conscious of their Judaism,’ she says. ‘They are using their own experiences to illustrate their relationship to the world at large and to their tradition … The interest in Jewish themes may be part of the wave of multiculturalism –from African American to Asian American – that has captured public imagination … Three themes predominate in contemporary Jewish fiction, says [Gail] Hochman [an agent with Brandt and Brandt Literary Agents]: the legacy of the Holocaust, survival in Israel or living in the secular world as a practicing Jew … Laura Matthews, senior editor at Putnam, calls it ‘curious but coincidental’ that she has just published two books with Jewish subthemes … The 200-plus Jewish book fairs held during November and December capitalize on the demand for Jewish writers … But, notes [Carolyn Starman] Hessel, [director of the Jewish Book Council], the audience for these books reaches beyond the Jewish market. What Jewish women have to say is of interest to the American public. [Jewish novelist Susan] Isaacs agrees. ‘If we’re willing to read novels about medieval monks a la ‘The Name of the Rose’ or Agatha Christie’s Miss Marple series, about a little Anglican lady in a small town in England, then why shouldn’t we read about American Jews?” [MUSLEAH, R., JUNE 2001] [Specifically noted in the article as illustrations of this increase are Jewish novelists Nomi Eve, Myla Goldberg, Anita Diamant, Cheryl Sucher, Katie Singer, Simone Zelitch, Fran Dorf, Ruth Knafo Setton, and Susan Isaacs].

Many, many Jews are afforded prominence in modern literature and are thereby subject to such scrutiny by fellow Jews. In the best-selling – often sensationalist and sleazy – realm are the names of Danielle Steel, Jacqueline Susann, and Judith Krantz. Danielle Steel married Claude-Eric Lazard, grandson of a famous international French Jewish banking firm. Judith Krantz, who has sold eighty million books in fifty languages, “is the third largest-selling female novelist in history … She writes about fascinating women, beauty, fame, money, and sex … She does try to make some serious points and has woven such images as anti-Semitism and the German occupation in her novels.” [HYMAN] Ms. Krantz was introduced to her future husband – Steven Krantz (eventual director of programming for Columbia Pictures Television) – by Jewish broadcaster Barbara Walters. “Wherever you go,” says Krantz,

“you carry your Jewishness with you, if you want to. I wanted to … [I] would have enjoyed it more if [my sons] married Jewish women. Just to continue. Jews have been around for so many thousands of years, I hate to think of a world without Jews. Jews contribute so much talent to the world, so much spice. What will happen to the talent? Who will play the violin?” [BRAWARSKY, S., 6-26-2000, p. 39]

Krantz’s brother Jeremeny Tarcher “became the first and best publisher of New Age books in the United States.” [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 147] Krantz’s autobiography (Sex and Shopping. The Confessions of a Nice Jewish Girl) has a firm foundation of Jewish interconnection to fame, fortune, and power:

“My parents were deeply involved in Jewish philanthropies, often spending four nights a week at various meetings [p. 11] … Well-known [Jewish] fashion photographer [Milton Greene] and I became good friends … It was a world of interrelationships. Milton’s ex-wife, Evelyn, was engaged to [famous Jewish portrait photographer] Dick Avedon … Later, when I became a fashion editor, I was always galvanized when we worked together … [My sister] Mimi became engaged to a man named David Karney, an Israeli whose father was the real-estate ‘Rockefeller’ of Israel … [Later] Mimi and David were living in Los Angeles, where he was beginning a magnificent career as a builder [p. 128-129] … [Jewish friend Andre Sussman changed his name to Surmain and ‘became the owner of Lutece, which instantly became the very best, most famous French restaurant in New York [p. 147] … A friend named Selig Alkon … called and asked if I wanted to go away with a group of other people for the weekend of the Fourth … We were planning to go with Selig’s first cousin, Barbara Walters [Krantz’s husband, Steve, was at one point their boss at ‘NBC’s flagship station, WNBT.’ [p. 160] …. [In New York] we were part of an interesting group of young couples, many of them involved in the art world, such as Aaron Shikler and his wife Pete. Aaron … painted Jackie and Jack Kennedy for their White House portraits … There was David Levine, the now-legendary caricaturist … None of them were as rich as Joanne and Alfred Stern, whose money came from Sears Roebuck via Al’s mother … Many of the others lived in the most magnificent East Side apartments, like Barbara … and Jerry Goldsmith … Among other acquaintances were a lawyer, Mort Jankow, and his wife, Linda, who was a granddaughter of Harry Warner, of Warner Brothers. Mort later became my agent. [p. 208-209] … In New York, through Jack La Vien [a common form of Levine], a friend of [husband] Steve’s, we became members of an exclusive club that dominated the chic New York disco scene [p. 221]” [KRANTZ, J., 2000] heim, a sculptor who'd lived in Paris most of her life, became our guide into the art world.” [p. 324] “I spent most of my time working on Manhattan on the Salzmann's kitchen table.” [p. 334] [KRANTZ, J., 2000]

“Soon after the success of Daisy [one of her early novels],” Krantz says, in providing a lesson in what she calls “Jewish Geography”:

“Nat Wartels sold Crown to Random House, which was owned by Si Newhouse, one of the richest men in America. On my next trip to New York, this unknown billionaire gave a dinner party to welcome me, inviting only executives from Crown and Random House. He and Bob Bernstein, who was his second-in-command at the time, quizzed me, a total stranger, trying to get a grip exactly who this strange Californian was besides being a successful novelist.

'So where did you go to high school?' Bob began.

'Birch Warthen.'

'My God, did you know my cousin, Alice Bernstein?'

'Well, of course I did, we graduated in the same class,' I answered

'What did you do after college?' Si wanted to know.

'I worked for Herb Mayes at Good House [Keeping].”

'Herb? I've known him all my life. A great man’ was Si’s response.

'My father was one of his best friends,' I said modestly, ‘and Alex is one of my oldest and dearest friends,' I added, knowing full well that Si had dated their daughter, Alex, at one point her life, and that Mitzi Newhouse, his mother, and Grace Mayes were friends

Both men's faces beamed with relief. An absolutely perfect game of Jewish Geography had just been beautifully played and I had been squarely identified as a highly credentialed, super-nice New York Jewish girl, no potentially oddball California exotic.” [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 303]

Bruce J. Friedman’s novels, says one Jewish critic, usually “center on Jews alienated from Christian America and ignorant of their own roots.” [WALDEN, p. 70] Alvin Toffler (Future Shock) is Jewish as is Studs Terkel. A mere sampling of other Jewish novelists and prose writers includes Ayn Rand (Alisa Rosenbaum), Nathaniel West (Nathaniel Weinstein), Harold Robbins (Harold Rubin), and science fiction authors Isaac Asimov (“As far as I know, I was the first science fiction writer of note [of Jewish descent] who used his own name.”) [ASIMOV, I., 1974, p. 2], William Tenn, Carol Carr, Robert Silverberg, Horace Gold, Pamela Sargent, Robert Sheckley, and Harlan Ellison.

“Two of the best science fiction writers of the 1930s,” says Isaac Asimov, in reflections of his career, “were Stanley G. Weinbaum and Nat Schachmer, both Jewish. (Weinbaum published for only a year and a half, during which he immediately established himself as the most popular science fiction writer in America, before dying tragically of cancer while still in his thirties.” [ASIMOV, I., 1994, p. 16] Martin Greenberg owned Gnome Press (an early publisher of Asimov’s works) Many authors complained of being exploited by this publisher. (ASIMOV, I., 1994, p. 415-416) There was later a second Martin Greenberg (Martin Harry Greenberg). This “Marty,” says Asimov, “has become so famous in science fiction that the name Martin Greenberg now applies only to him.” [ASIMOV, I., 1994, p. 416] By early 1990s, Martin Harry Greenberg had “published nearly four hundred anthologies, and there is no question that he is far and away the most prolific and, in addition, the best anthologist the world has ever seen.” [ASIMOV, I., 1994, p. 419] Joel Davis also “had two fiction magazines, both mystery – Ellery Queen’s Mystery Magazine and Alfred Hitchcock’s Mystery Magazine.” He also started Isaac Asimov’s Science Fiction Magazine (IASFM). (The main competitors were [Jewish?] Ben Bova’s Analog and Edward Ferman’s F&SF (Fantasy and Science Fiction). [ASIMOV, I., 1994, p. 422-423]

The Cleveland Jewish News had this to say about the science fiction investigations of Jewish American English professor Batya Weinbaum:

“Existing in two worlds is a also a theme of science fiction written by immigrant Jews in the early part of the 20th century, says Weinbaum. Jews, she explained, dominated the science-fiction field in those days ... Another [Jewish author] Weinbaum is fascinated with is Leslie F. Stone, nee Leslie Rubenstein. Like many Jewish sci-fi writers at the time, Stone used an Anglo-Saxon pseudonym to conceal her Jewish ethnicity ... Many other Jewish writers of the ‘30s, including Nat Schachner, Moses Schere and Bernard Sachs, wrote similar futuristic stories about dictators, political parties and assimilation. Stanley Weinbaum’s ... “The Adaptive Ultimate’ ... is yet another tale drawing from the Jewish immigrant experience of cultural assimilation ... Prof. Weinbaum also credits Stanley Weinbaum and Stone with the creation of the ‘sympathetic alien, a kind, intelligent creature who helped people. This was a far cry from the ‘bug-eyed beasts’ of H.G. Wells, whose only goal was to eradicate humanity. Many of these tales were published in anthologies by another Jew, Hugo Gernsback, whom Weinbaum calls ‘the father of sci-fi.”’ [GUTH, D., 2000, p. 108-]

Edna Ferber, “author of Giant, Show Boat, and the Pulitzer prize-winning novel So Big, attributed her success to having been born a Jew. ‘Being a Jew makes it tougher to get on,’ she commented, ‘and I like that.’” [ANTLER, J., 1997, p. 140(e)] “Modernist” author Gertrude Stein “admired Jews’ ‘clan feeling’ and their high ‘ethical and spiritual nature.’ It is widely believed that she survived World War II with her lover, Alice B. Toklas (another California German Jew), because of her relationship with the [French] Vichy regime.” [ANTLER, J., 1997, p. 140(e)]

When Jewish novelist Anne Michaels’ friend ran across yet another volume about a familiar subject, he complained about “another book on the Holocaust,” not knowing that her own new work focused on the same theme. [Brawarsky, S., 1998, p. 29] Carl Djerassi, a Jewish Stanford University scientist who is considered the “father” of the birth control pill, also writes novels. His most recent, Menachem’s Seed, “ponders how a non-Jewish woman who impregnates herself with an Israeli sperm can ensure her child will be born Jewish.” [PEARL, L., 1997, p. 34]

“Do we need another ex-junkie from New York publishing autobiographical novels about sex, violence, and death?” wondered the [London] Guardian in 1999. The reference was to Joel Rose’s new novel, Kill Kill Faster Faster, described even by the author as a “genre novel – pulp shit.” Rose, of Hungarian Jewish heritage, is a former TV writer for Kojak, Miami Vice, and McMillan and Wife. [GIBB, 1999, p. T18]

Judy Blume is a best-selling author of children’s books. Ever busy socializing children against Christian tradition, Blume notes that “I had letters from angry parents accusing me of ruining Christmas forever because of a chapter in Superfudge called ‘Santa Who?’” [BLUME, p. 65] In 1986 a children’s book called An American Tail was published. “A Steven Spielberg Production,” it was originally an animated movie. Lavishly illustrated, the newly invented fairy tale focuses upon the Jewish Mousekewitz family, a group of mice in late 19th century Russia. Both book and film socialize young children to the persecution myths of Jewish identity (depicted here as harmless, innocent mice), while broadly stereotyping the entire non-Jewish community in Eastern Europe as a realm of bloodthirsty monsters. Beneath an image of three cats with Russian style handlebar moustaches, saliva dripping from their teeth, all creeping along next to what appears to be a Nazi (the viewer only sees his black boots and brown pants) the fairy tale reads:

“Suddenly, the houses began to jump and shake. The sound of horses’ hooves clattering through the town and shouts of terrified people made all the mice tremble with fear.

'The Cossacks! The Cossacks!'

In those days, from time to time, Cossacks would gallop through the Jewish villages of Russia, burning homes and temples, destroying everything in their path. In the same kind of way, cat-Cossacks, known as Catsacks, would race through the tiny Russian mouse villages, burning and demolishing the little mouse homes and capturing whole mouse families as they ran from their flaming houses out into the snow.” [KINGSLEY, p. 10]

Other Jewish authors in the children’s market include Paula Danziger, Allen Pace Nilson, Robert Lipsyte, and E. L. Konigsburg, among others.

In 1999, recognizing the market and the times, a coffee-table photography book entitled “The Jewish writer” came out by photographer Jill Krementz. [George Gilbert’s history of Jewish photographers claims her as Jewish; GILBERT, p. 60] Well connected in the literary world, her editorial dilemma, noted the Jewish Bulletin, was that there was not enough space in her proposed book for all 78 images of Jewish authors she had collected. [FAINGOLD, 1999, p. 41A]

However restricted, oppressed, marginalized, and unrewarded Jewish women are supposed to be, “in sheer numbers, some 200 titles produced in the twentieth century since the first text was published in 1912 are identifiable as Jewish-American women's biographies – that is, those in which ethnicity and gender are significant touchstones for the writer’s identification and (self) creation.” [SHOLLAR, B.] Prominent Jews who have held prominence in the feminist field include Bella Abzug, Phyllis Chesler, Gloria Steinem, Vivian Gornick, Robin Morgan, Susan Brownwiller, Shulamith Firestone, Andrea Dworkin, Meredith Tax, Letty Cottin Pogrebin, and Naomi Weisstein, to headline a long list. Elizabeth Fox-Genovese is half-Jewish. Jews have also been extremely prominent in lesbian activism. “[Jews] have been told that they control everything,” noted Jewish lesbian Irene Klepfisz in 1982, “and so when they are in the spotlight, they have been afraid to draw attention to their Jewishness. For these women, the number of Jews active in the movement is not a source of pride, but rather a source of embarrassment, something to be played down, something to be minimized.” [KLEPFISZ, I., 1982, p. 47]

Jewish women, noted Ann Roiphe in 1981, “form a ridiculously high percentage of the women’s movement.” [ROIPHE, 1981, p. 148] “Carolyn Stoloff concluded in a study of the backgrounds of those active in the woman’s liberation movement among graduate students at the Univeristy of Michigan. She discovered that, of those whose religious background could be ascertained, almost 58 percent were Jewish.” [ROTHMAN/LICHTER, 1982, p. 109] About half of a 1999 issue of Biography magazine’s 25 Most Powerful Women in the business and social world “were either Jewish or had Jewish parents.” [SILBIGER, S., 2000, p. 24] “Like [Betty Friedan], many of the leaders and theorists of the 1960s feminists had been Jews, albeit largely secular, unidentified ones.” [ANTLER, p. 260] “Friedan,” notes Joyce Antler, “used the language of the Holocaust [in her texts about women’s liberation] not merely as a metaphor, or as a tactic to shock readers, but because she had already made the connection between the oppression of women and that of Jews.” [ANTLER, p. 261]

David Horowitz adds something else about Friedan (Friedman):

“Her infamous description of America’s suburban family household as a ‘comfortable concentration camp,’ in The Feminine Mystique, probably had more to do with her Marxist hatred for America than for her own experience as a housewife and mother. Her husband, Carl, also a leftist, once complained to a reporter in 1970 that, far from being a homebody, his wife ‘was in the world during the whole marriage, either full time or free lance,’ lived in an eleven-room mansion on the Hudson with a full-time maid, and ‘seldom was a wife and a mother.’” [HOROWITZ, D., 1999, p. 226]

In 1995, even a non-Jewish Polish-born scholar, Magdalena Zaborowska, teaching at the University of North Carolina, knew which way the intellectual and publishing winds blew. Like many, she too falls prey to the strong force of Judeo-centrism in the American academic community. In her volume about women immigrants to America, subtitled “Gender Through East European Immigrant Narratives,” she focuses on the lives of five women – Mary Antin, Elizabeth Stern, Anzia Yezierska, Maria Kuncewicz, and Eva Hoffman – to illustrate her theses. The title of the book, nor its theses of investigation, have nothing to do with Jews. Yet, in attempting to exemplify the collective voice of the female immigrant experience, the only one who isn’t Jewish in her five subjects is Kunczewicz. Can this, one wonders, be an accurate overview of the lives, dilemmas, identities, and world views of the millions of Eastern European women who weren’t Jewish?

Part of a much referred-to poem by Muriel Rukeyser in Jewish circles goes:

“To be a Jew in the twentieth century/Is to be offered a gift. If you refuse/Wishing to be invisible, you choose/Death of the spirit, the stone insanity.” [ANTLER, J. p. 174] “Jewish themes,” says Daniel Walden, “pervade much of the poetry of Harvey Shapiro who is probably better known as the editor of the New York Times Book Review.” [WALDEN, p. 397] Poet Grace Paley has long been poetry editor of the Nation. Poet Joseph Auslander was editor of the North American Review.

From 1977 to 1998, fifteen people were awarded Yale University’s prestigious Bollingen Prize (today worth $25,000) for poetry. At least seven of them were Jewish males – David Ignatow, Howard Nemerov, Anthony Hecht, John Hollander, Stanley Kunitz, Mark Strand, and Kenneth Koch. [BRUNNER, 1998, p. 733] Reflecting changes in the power elite of the literature world, of the 26 earlier award winners going back to 1949, only two were Jewish (still an over-representation of Jewry, per their percentage of the American population, by about 250%).

From Philadelphia, the American Poetry Review has been described as the “premier poetry journal in the country.” [LEITER, 1999] Editors are Stephen Berg, Arthur Vogelsang, and David Bonanno – at least one, likely two, but very possibly all, are Jewish. In 1998, “local Jewish activist and patron” Lynne Honickman and her family’s Honickman Foundation instituted a yearly American Poetry Review “first book” contest for poets. The 1998 judge, Gerald Stern (winner of the 1998 National Book Award for poetry), was Jewish, (his choice as APR winner was Joshua Beckman) as was the next year’s judge, Louise Gluck, who selected another fellow Jew as the best poet, Dana Levin.

Sanford Pinsker, a Jewish reviewer, notes with satisfaction the “Jewish dimension” to National Book Award winner Gerald Stern’s poetry. Citing Stern’s poem called “Behaving Like a Jew,” Pinsker’s insights into the poem read like a Mad magazine parody:

“In this poem, probably the most anthologized and best known of all Stern’s work, the speaker ruminates about the death of an opossum, refusing to treat the event as yet another instance of the ‘joy in death’ and the ‘philosophical understanding of the carnage’ he associates with the anti-Semitic Charles Lindbergh. Instead, he insists on behaving like a Jew, which means touching the animal’s face, staring into its eyes and pulling it off the road.

And as Stern describes this (Jewish) moment, the opossum in question metamorphoses itself into what looks for all the world like a Hasidic Jew:

‘I am not going to stand in a wet ditch … / and lose myself in the immortal life stream / when my hands are still a little shaky / from his stiffness and his bulk / and my eyes are still weak and misty / from his round belly and his curved fingers / and his black whiskers and his little dancing feet.’

[original author’s parenthesis: PINSKER, 1998, p. 62]

Pinsker isn’t joking about this. Not only does the reviewer declare the poem to be Jewish, so is the opossum! So much so that the idea of its “whiskers,” “round belly,” and “little feet” loom as a kind of dead rabbi to him.

“Writers are all secret Jews,” declared Maxime Kumin, two years after winning a Pulitzer Prize for poetry. [HYMAN, p. 766] “All poets are Jews,” echoed Russian Jewish poet Marina Tsvetayeva. [FINKELSTEIN, N., 1998] “To be Jewish means to be a poet,” declared Holocaust hero Elie Wiesel, affirming an apparent in-house Jewish truism. [STORCH, 1998, p. 8] “A woman poet is a hunted Jew,” declares Erica Jong, “eternally the outsider.” [JONG, E., 1994, p. 100] (Delmore Schwartz has his own take on the Jew-poet-sufferer closure, noting his period as a student at Harvard University: “I never thought about anti-Semitism, because everyone was against me as a poet.”) [ATLAS, J., 1977, 166] Helene Flanzbaum suggests the psycho-social forces at play from which such a notion – any poet as a kind of honorary Jew – may come from: “The poet’s sense of alienation had come to signal his superiority to a debased American culture … That poets are seldom appreciated in their own time or nation corresponds to the plight of the Jews, long held to be chosen but nationless.” [FLANZBAUM, p. 267] Hence, being a poet is understood by many in today’s poetry world to be a psychological state of antithesis to the established order, consciously conceived as an echo of the traditional Jewish sense of superiority to the surrounding non-Jewish norms, despite the fact that the elitist cliques that control the avenues towards crowning as a celebrated “poet” in the poetry/publishing industry has become, like all the rest of popular culture, merely an arm of the established – and increasingly Judaized – order itself. Being Jewish, after all (really or illusorily), is a strong boost towards the gateway of public sympathy, personal accomplishment, and, in all spheres, success.

Flanzbaum notes the case of famous non-Jewish poet John Berryman, and the phenomena of Gentile poets looking for their symbolic selves in the Jewish victimhood paradigm:

“In 1945, John Berryman, a Catholic poet from rural Oklahoma, won the Kenyon Review’s annual contest for best short-fiction. His eight-page story, ‘The Imaginary Jew,’ featured a southern boy in New York City College who is brutally attacked after being taken for ‘a Jew.’ In that same year, Karl Shapiro, a third-generation American Jew won the Pulitzer Prize for a collection of poetry called V-Letter … Berryman is not the only imaginary Jew haunting the pages of modern American poetry. In fact, many appear at this time.” [Flanzbaum, p. 259, 260]

For Shapiro’s part, among his poems is at least one in homage to the new Jewish state of Israel, described in the work as the “liberation of Palestine.” In it he further rhapsodizes that “When I see the name of Israel high in print … I sink deep in a Western chair and rest my soul.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 241] (Shapiro was for a few years the editor of the prestigious journal Poetry.). [SYRKIN, M., 1964, p. 229]

Much-heralded Spanish poet Federico Garcia Lorca, killed in 1936 during the Spanish Civil War, had a “fanciful belief that he possessed the blood of gypsies and Jews.” [NADEL, I., 1996, p. 23]. In Europe, in 1999, a press report noted a requisite homage: “[Britain’s] Poet Laureate Andrew Motion will read his poem about Ann [Frank], entitled Ann Frank Huis,” marking the 70th anniversary of her birth. [PRESS ASSOCIATION NEWSFILE, 6-7-99] Nearly forty years earlier, Soviet Union poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko, “married to a Jewess, leaped to world fame in 1961 as the author of ‘Babi Yar,’ a poem he wrote in protest against the world’s apathy towards the slaughter of millions of Jews.” [LITVINOFF, B., p. 97] Another Russian poet and novelist for years elevated to extraordinary attention in the West is Boris Pasternak. He too is Jewish. So is one of Europe’s most celebrated post-war poets, Paul Celan. “Though Celan never spelled out his Jewishness,” says Jewish scholar John Felstiner, “he aligned himself more stringently with the Jews than with the non-Jews in his pantheon.” [GROSS, N., 7-7-95, p. 8]

Prominent French author Nathalie Sarraute (Natacha Tcherniak) was also Jewish. An international Jewish writers conference in San Francisco in 1997 featured prominent authors from Guatemala (Víctor Perera), Brazil (Moacyr Scilar), Mexico (Elan Stavans), Romania (Norman Manae), Great Britain (Dan Jacobson), Poland (Henryk Broder) and Hungary (George Konrad, “who has been discussed as a potential Nobel Prize candidate.”) [SCHIFRIN, D., 1997, p. 1]

As Ilan Stavans notes about the recent upsurge in “Jewish issues” writing in South America:
“Jewish authors, for example, seem to have more presence [than before] in the Southern Hemisphere. From Argentina, there is Ricardo Feierstein, Marcos Aguinis, Jorge Goldenberg, and Fingueret herself; from Mexico, Rosa Nissan; from Uruguay, Mauricio Rosencof. Many of those authors began their careers decades ago, but now the collective impact of their work is beginning to be felt. Some are even achieving popular success. And while few take the genocide in Europe as their central focus, many do offer it as backdrop. Editorial Mila and the Acervo Cultural in Argentina publish Holocaust survivors’ accounts, like that of Charles Papiernik, originally a French citizen, who endured four years in Auschwitz. And a recent fiction contest, organized by Feierstein, brought a handful of Holocaust-related narratives, including El ultimo dia, by Mina Weil, about a Jewish girl growing up in Mussolini’s Italy. I’ve also seen some nonfiction articles, like one about relationships among Holocaust victims by Diana Wang, a psychologist in Buenos Aires, who found out she was Jewish as she was about to take first Communion. Films, too, are part of the trend. I’m acquainted with fewer than half a dozen movies made in Latin America that address the Holocaust directly, but several others deal with the topic at least tangentially.” [STAVANS, I., 5-25-01]

Muriel Spark, an avowed Catholic, born of a Jewish father, has been described as “arguably the most formidable Scottish writer.” [WHITAKER, R., 1-21-96] Jorge Isaacs, of partial Jewish heritage, has long been regarded as Colombia’s “national poet.” [SACHAR, H., p. 267] Australia’s “most widely read and celebrated poet” is Dorothy Porter, whose father, proudly notes a Jewish ethnic magazine, is Jewish. [MANDIE, D., 1999, p. 68-69] The great German writer, Johann Goethe, wasn’t Jewish, but “[Albert] Bielschowsky, like so many Goethe biographers [was] a Jew … German Jews played a leading role in Goethe societies … In the mid-1920s, Jews were almost a majority in the Berlin Goethe society.” [MOSSE, G., 1983, p. 45] Isaac Deutcher noted in 1968 that “quite a few Polish writers have been of Jewish origin, for instance Julian Tuwim and Antoni Slonimski, the most eminent poets of the inter-war period.” [DEUTCHER, I., 1968, p. 54]

And who was America’s official “poet laureate” for the late 1990’s, whose job – for $35,000 a year – is to serve as a poetry “consultant” to the Library of Congress? Jewish poet and Boston University professor Robert Pinsky. “One of his grand works,” notes the Los Angeles Times, “An Explanation of America,” (Princeton University Press, 1979) is an epic poem written for his oldest daughter, now a manager at Borders Books in Los Angeles.” [MEHREN, p. E1] Pinsky is the former poetry editor for the avidly pro-Israel New Republic. In 1999, Pinsky became the “first poet laureate to be named for a third year by Congress.” [KUSHNER, L., 5-28-99, p. 1]

In 2000, Stanley Kunitz was named to replace Pinsky as America’s poet laureate. Kunitz is also Jewish. Including Kunitz, at least five of the last eight American poet laureates (i.e., since 1988) have been Jewish: Kunitz, Pinsky, Howard Nemerov, Mark Strand, and Joseph Brodsky.
Jewish American playwrights in (the Jewish-dominated) theatre include Arthur Miller, Neil Simon, Lilian Hellman, Elmer Rice, Paddy (Sidney) Cheyefsky, Abe Burrows (Abraham Solomon Borowitz), George S. Kaufman, Wendy Wasserstein, Moss Hart, Elmer Rice, S.N. Behrman, and Clifford Odets. [PLESUR, M. 1982, p. 173] In France, surrealist Eugene Ionesco’s mother was Jewish. In Britain, where Jews are less than one percent of the population, in 1969 “Lord” Goodman, the (Jewish) chairman of the British Arts Council, observed that “in the theatre at this moment the younger school of dramatists is perhaps seventy-five percent Jewish.” Such authors included Harold Pinter, Arnold Wesker, Bernard Kops, Frank Marcus, Peter Shaffer, Lionel Bart, and Wolf Mankowitz, among others. [LITVINOFF, B., p. 168] “Their contention is that they are English writers,” said Barnet Litvinoff, “… [yet] a hidden sentiment was activated among them in 1967, however, and they made a swift if somewhat condescending rediscovery of their Jewishness.” [LITVINOFF, B., p. 168]

“What could be prompting the increased visibility of so many Jewish figures on the modern British literary scene?” wondered Merritt Mosely (author of The Dictionary of Literary Biography: British Novelists Since 1960) in 2001. Mosley notes Howard Jacobson (whose “Jewishness consciousness … continues to animate his novels”) as the best of them. “Two other celebrated novels of the year 2000 were about Jewishness,” he adds, including Will Self’s How the Dead Men Live (“Mr. Self has said that [the character] Lily is partly based on his mother, who was also a Jewish anti-Semite”) and Linda Grant’s When I Lived in Modern Times, winner of the Orange Prize for Fiction (it is “a historical novel about a young Jewish woman growing up in London’s Soho during World War II.”) “Two widely noticed 1999 titles were about Jews, assimilation and anti-Semitism in England,” adds Mosely (these are Gillian Freeman’s His Mistress’s Voice and Bernice Ruben’s I, Dreyfus. [MOSELEY, M., 5-25-01]

Germany? “Nathan the Wise,” notes Michael Brenner, “became one of the most popular figures in post-war German theatre. He was soon to be joined on the stage by many other Jewish figures, ranging from the Fiddler on the Roof to Ann Frank. In recent years in Germany there has also been a remarkable revival of German-Jewish authors, such as Else Lasker-Schuler, Kurt Tucholsky, Erich Muhsam, and Alfred Dublin. Such towering names as Franz Kafka and Walter Benjamin are much better known today than during their own lifetimes.” [GRUNFELD, F., 1996, p. xxi]

Aside from the many Jewish “Family” critics already mentioned, other prominent Jewish literature/culture critics include Walter Benjamin (Detlev Holz), George Steiner, Louis Untermeyer (whose son, Joseph, was active in Zionist efforts to get weapons to Israel) [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 157] and Clifton Fadiman, among many others.

By 1996, Sylvia Barack-Fishman, a professor at Brandeis University, noted that “A search for the essence of Jewish identity has become a focal point of contemporary American Jewish literary and intellectual exploration spanning all brow levels, in works from the most complex fiction to the soap-operatic life-cycle angst of popular films and television programs.”

[BARACK-FISHMAN, p. 58]

She also even notes that these days “Israel figures prominently in fiction by such authors as Saul Bellow, Chaim Potok, Elie Wiesel, Jay Neugeboren, Hugh Nissenson, E.M. Broner, Tova Reich, Mark Helprin, and many others.”
[BARACK-FISHMAN, p. 279] “Even Norman Mailer,” says Desser and Friedman, “who includes few Jewish characters in his books, and actually fights against his Jewish identity, is usually included in anthologies and critical works about Jewish authors.”
[DESSER, p. 4-5]

“Complementing the focus on [the Holocaust] survivor syndrome,” says Lillian Kremer, “is the attention of writers to [a] survivor mission. This is manifest in [Marge] Piercy’s and [National Book award winner] Adrienne Rich’s advocacy of Zionism.”
[DAVIDSON, p. 396] Elsewhere, mystery writer Richard “Kinky” Friedman “is a hawk on the Arab-Israeli conflict.” As a Jewish country western singer, he was once awarded the Jewish Defense League’s “prize for cultural contribution”; among his compositions (often performed) is “a particularly tasteless song about using a picture of Jesus for toilet paper.”
[CHAFETS, MEMOIRS, p. 175, 176] “A number of new books from university presses, Jewish publishers, and mainstream publishers,” noted the Jewish Week in 1999, “are searching out women’s voices in Jewish history and Jewish texts, reclaiming Jewish tradition.”

In the feminist movement, of which Jewish women have been so much a part, publishing and literary heroines began making their inevitable march home to reconnect with Jewish exclusionist/elitist tenets. Abandoning an abstract solidarity with the generalized human community for the narrower, more tangible, glories of Jewish particularism and Holocaust victim/unity, they somehow managed to tiptoe around the massive anti-woman keystones of traditional Jewish teachings. In an article about alleged anti-Semitism in the women’s movement and being a “born-again” Jew, Letty Pogrebin, a founding editor of Ms magazine, announced to her readers that “During the past few years something has changed, something that makes me no less a woman but more a Jew … [POGREBIN, p. 76, 1987] … Looking back, I suppose my first visit to Israel had something to do with this epiphany … As instructive as the first visit was, it was the MS tour of Israel that grew out of my account of it in this magazine that something clicked for me … [POGREBIN, p. 77, 1987] … Before I had believed in a universalistic ideal, in feminine synthesis, and de-emphasizing differences, but now, secularly as well as spiritually, I was ‘born again’ to my people. The change is subtle but seismic.”

“I have never considered myself religious,” wrote Betty Friedan, former President of the National Organization of Women (NOW) and author of one of the most influential feminist tracts, The Feminine Mystique, “For me as for other Jewish feminists, religion perpetuates the patriarchal tradition that denies women access to Judaism’s most sacred ritual and enshrined them within the confines of their biological roles. But when women like me broke through to our authentic personhood as women, we found the strength to dip deep down into ourselves on other levels … Now with a sense of confidence born of the women’s movement, I and many other feminists found we could embrace our authentic Jewishness in a new way … In some strange and wonderful way my feminism and my Judaism were merging.” [SILBERMAN, p. 264]

“After fifty,” says best-selling author (best known for the novel Fear of Flying) and feminist Erica Jong:

“I began to question my ambivalent relationship to my Jewish identity and the unexamined assimilation I have written about earlier. It seems astonishing to me that a woman born at the height of the Holocaust should not have been trained to a stronger sense of Judaism. And I also began to regret not having raised my [my daughter] more Jewishly, and not having more Jewish children to replace those lost among the six million [Holocaust victims]. Lately I have begun to yearn for solidarity with other Jewish feminists … to celebrate Jewishness without shame.” [TEMPLIN, p. 126]

(How, by the way, did Jong first get published? Her mother sent her to a Jewish family friend, Bessie Golding – Jong’s grandfather’s mistress. Jong presented poems to Golding at her office who read them for twenty minutes, then looked up and decided that “You’re going to be the most famous woman poet of your generation.” Golding passed the poems along to an executive at the Holt publishing company “who passed it on to Aaron Asher [also Jewish],” the Holt publisher. Thus was born Jong’s: Fruits and Vegetables.) [JONG, E., 1994, p. 134-137]

One wonders how prominent author Cynthia Ozick, active in Jewish religious circles, reconciles the virulent anti-female Jewish tradition:

“In the world at large I call myself and am called a Jew. But when on Sabbath I sit among women in my traditional shul and the rabbi speaks the word ‘Jew,’ I can be sure that he is not referring to me. For him ‘Jew’ means male Jew. When my rabbi says ‘A Jew is called to the Torah,’ he never means me or any other living Jewish woman. My own synagogue is the only place in the world where I, a middle-aged adult, am defined exclusively by my being the female child of my parents. My own synagogue is the only place in the world where I am not a Jew.” [ROIPHE, 1981, p. 202]

As Rabbi Frisch’s Marriage Manual, a traditional view of Judaism, says:

“Even though the woman is a man’s partner, she should not think of her husband as a comrade but rather as a master. And the woman should love her husband and he shall rule over her as it is said: ‘And thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.’” [HEILMAN, S., 1992, p. 332]

Rosellen Brown, a fiction editor at the Jewish magazine Tikkun, notes that stories submitted to her tend to be about old Jewish characters, the Holocaust, and old New York City Jewish neighborhoods. “What you can probably see emerging here,” she wrote in 1993, “… [is] nostalgia … [BROWN, p. 79] …
The majority of work we see is thematically hard breathing and anxious. And where its spirit is I have no idea, except that it seems bent on discharging some long-forgotten obligation.” [BROWN, p. 82]

Andrew Furman, a judge for the National Jewish Book award, noted in 2000 the flavor of modern Jewish literature:

“Jews, the world over, continue to write fiction at a fierce clip … The ‘ethnic,’ mid-century wave of Jewish American writing, fueled by the immigrant consciousness, has clearly given way to a new wave of Jewish writing. Concomitantly, the burden of alienation and marginality amid a host culture are no longer the twin occupations of Jewish writers. Rather, the literary grandchildren of Bellow, Roth, and Malamud – at home now amid their environs – look increasingly inward these days as they engage more explicitly Judaic concerns: the toxic legacy of the Holocaust, the retrieval of extinct Jewish worlds (e.g., the European shtetl, New York’s lower East Side), Jewish feminism, the viability of Orthodoxy, and the biblical resonances in the modern world.” [FURMAN, A., MAY/JUNE 2000, p. 29]

In poetry, for instance, Jewish poet Linda Pasten was afforded space in the 1990s in Tikkun for her poem about an almost obligatory theme, concluding:

“and when my mother saw the swastika on an envelope in the kitchen table, she picked up fast, and we returned to the steamy city.” [FIRESTONE, p. 4]

Erica Jong’s first collection of poetry (Near the Black Forest) was “weighed with poems about my discovering my Jewishness in Germany.” [JONG, E., 1994, p. 133]

In a book about Jewish women, Paula Hyman and Deborah Moore note that:

“A significant group of contemporary Jewish writers produced an inward-turning genre of fiction that explores the individual Jew’s connection to other Jewish people, to the Jewish religion, culture, and tradition, and to the chain or Jewish history. Contrary to the expectations of assimilationists and the example of Jewish literature during the first half of the twentieth century, particularist woman’s Jewish fiction became commonplace … Among the themes that emerged is the late twentieth century American Jewish fiction focusing on women, some of the most important include: the role of the Holocaust in the identity of survivors, their children, and the broader Jewish community; Israel as a focal point of American Jewish identity, and a setting for the exploration of Jewish identity.” [HYMAN, p. 422]

“It must be emphasized,” notes Gershon Shaked, “that American Jewish literature today is prouder of its dual identity than any other ‘foreign’ Jewish literature has ever been.” [SHAKED, p. 176]

Also among the major current genres of Jewish fiction is the Jewish “tough guy” story, what Paul Breines calls the “Rambowitz syndrome.” Breines notes that he is familiar with about fifty novels that celebrate an “idealized representation of Jewish warriors, tough guys, gangsters, Mossad agents, and Jews of all ages and sexes who fight back against their tormentors.” [BARACK-FISHMAN, p. 280]

“A noticeable change has occurred in recent decades,” says Stephen Whitfield, “The fresh appreciation of ethnic differences that began in the mid-1960s has included the celebration of Jewish identity in many best-selling novels, in serious analyses of Yiddishkeit [Jewishness] … in musicals … and in other cultural artifacts too numerous to mention.” [WHITFIELD, Americans, p. 11] “Ours is close to a golden age,” wrote Leonard Fein in 2000, “… Her’s one piece of current evidence: On the ‘new non-fiction’ table in a local (non-chain) general bookstore the other evening, 11 out of 30 titles were on Jewish subjects.” [FEIN, L., 9-8-2000, p. 9]

Thanks to such an avalanche, and Jewish power to empower and enforce it, Jewish chauvinism has become an institutionalized norm and is an increasingly integral – and even dominant – part of the mainstream American landscape. “According to a theory which seems to be tacitly assumed by many critics,” wrote Robert Alter, “the main currents at least of modern culture all derive from subterranean Jewish sources.” [KOESTER, p. 21] “The massive entry of Jewish intellectuals into the academy in the late 1940s through the 1960s,” says David Hollinger, “was a crucial victory for the cosmopolitans. The attendant de-Christianization of American public culture was sometimes openly proclaimed – by Leslie Fiedler, for example – who in 1967 celebrated what he called ‘the great take-over by Jewish-American writers’ of the task of speaking for Americans.” [HOLLINGER, p. 167]

“The acceptance of [Saul] Bellow as the leading novelist of his generation,” wrote Fiedler in evaluating the impact of the Jewish literary Mafia upon America, “must be paired off with the appearance of [Herman Wouk’s] Marjorie Morningstar on the front cover of Time. On all levels, the Jew is in the process of being mythicized into the representative American.” [KOSTELANETZ, p. 1] “Bellow's Humboldt's Gift,” noted Chaim Bermant in 1977, “which is in some ways an odyssey of literary America, or at least literary New York (which nowadays has come to mean the same thing), shows how far the process of assimilation has gone, and it is no longer quite certain what has happened to whom: whether the Jew has become Americanized or the Americans Judaized. It is a world in which a writer like Gore Vidal, who can trace his roots back to an older America, must feel like an outsider, or a Court goy.” [BERMANT, C., 1977, p. 158]

Efforts by highly placed Jews to appropriate all that is great as innately “Jewish” extended to one of the greatest – perhaps the greatest – popular artists in history: Hollywood’s Charlie Chaplin. “Chaplin’s own background and experience,” wrote Hannah Arendt, “taught him the traditional Jewish fear of the ‘cop’ – that seeming incarnation of a hostile world; but on the other hand, it taught him the time-honored Jewish truth that, other things being equal, the human ingenuity of a David can sometimes outreach the animal strength of a Goliath.” [DESSER, p. 10]
“Chaplin was an English Jew,” wrote Albert Goldman, “who was at pains to deny or minimize his Jewish origins … his infatuation with blond-haired, fair-skinned, voluptuously innocent maidens, whom he courted with eyes brimming with Jewish soul and sentiment, were the classic notes and signs of the Jewish comic hero.” [DESSER, p. 10]

The slight problem here, of course, is that Charlie Chaplin was not Jewish. None of his parents were Jewish, nor his grandparents. He was not raised in a Jewish home and he did not know Hebrew or Yiddish; he was not known to have even been in any kind of association with Jews at all, at least until he ended up in Hollywood [DESSER, p. 10] (where one of his wives was a Jewish actress, Paulette Goddard – i.e., Paulette Levy). Jewish insistence to claim him as one of their own, of course, reflects the widespread inability of Jews to understand the universal dimensions of Chaplin’s lovable tragi-comic character, the Tramp, and the universal depth of his follies, misfortunes, and foibles against a world that is hostile to anybody.

If anything, note Desser and Friedman, “Chaplin is an essentially Christian filmmaker. The overarching themes of his finest films involve a redemptive Christian vision revolving around self-sacrifice and charity as the highest form of love.” [DESSER, p. 10] These, as we have amply seen, and as these Jewish film critics aptly note, are not particularly classic elements of the Jewish tradition.

* The issues in this chapter of course have an international flavor. In Russia, during and after the communist revolution, Zvi Gitelman notes Jewish “intellectual” influence in securing the new regime: “The Jewish intelligentsia had neutralized the boycott of the Bolshevik regime by the Russian intelligentsia. In Lenin’s words, they had ‘sabotaged the saboteurs.’ At the same time Lenin suggested this should not be emphasized in the press because ‘in a peasant land one must sometimes also reckon with such hateful phenomena as anti-Semitism.’” [GITELMAN, 1972, p. 115]

Venita Datta has written an entire book entitled the Origins of the Intellectual in France, noting that the 1914 Dreyfus Affair (when a Jewish army officer was unjustly accused of being a traitor) “is often cited as the moment at which the intellectual was born … French intellectuals have served as role models for intellectuals all over the world … [The intellectual] supplanted the traditional priest as a source of moral authority in modern French society.” [DATTA, p. 1]

In recent years, there have been many Jews of influence in the French (and international) intellectual world, including Claude Levi-Strauss, Michel Foucault, Louis Althusser, Roland Barthes, and Jacques Lacan.

In the years around 1900 the 80,000 or so Jews of France represented less than one percent of the French population of 39 million. Yet, “as many anti-Semites noted,” says Datta,

“with the advent of the [French] Third Republic, more Jews than ever were visible in the fields of art, literature, journalism, and academe. Furthermore, noted Jewish intellectuals, in particular Emile Durkheim of the Sorbonne and Henri Bergson of the College de France, were seen as pillars of the republican establishment, as official ‘intellectuals who had risen to positions of power and fame via the republican university system ... [DATTA, p. 85] ... This new [Third Republic] regime sought to ‘de-Christianize’ public spaces ... In no other country where anti-Semitism was present did it possess such a strong literary character. Anti-Semites in France were more interested in responding to political, social, and cultural developments than in developing racial theories ... [p. 87] ... Many Jews rose to prominent positions in the army, politics, and high civil service, as well as the arts and academe ... [p. 95] ... Jews were particularly prominent as cultural middlemen, that is, as reviewers, critics, and art collectors ... Significant numbers of Jews were at the forefront of avant-garde movements, not only in the literary and artistic avant-garde ... but also in the academic disciplines ... [p. 96] ... [One influential journal] the Revue Blanche, was more than a journal, it as also a milieu and a group of friends linked by school ties and family relations ... Jewish collaborators represented roughly half of the review’s staff and a much higher proportion of its editorial board.” [p. 105]

Aside from Jewish publishing and mass media pre-eminence in pre-Nazi Germany [see other chapters], Frederick Grunfeld notes the situation for Jewish authors in that era:

“Literally dozens of writers afterwards banned as ‘Jewish – though many of them hardly thought of themselves as such – were producing important contributions to German literature. Among the leading dramatists were Carl Sternheim (The Snob), Arthur Schnitzler (La Ronde), Ernst Toller (The Machine-Wreckers), Walter Hasenclever (The Sun), Ferdinand Bruckner (Criminals) and the Hungarian expatriate Ferenc Molnar (Liliom); among the novelists, besides Broch and Kafka, Alfred Doeblin (Berlin Alexanderplatz), Jakob Wasserman (The World’s Illusion), Lion Feuchtwanger (Jew Suss), Franz Werfel (The Forty Days of Musa Dagh), Alfred Neumann (The Deuce), Bruno Frank (Days of the King), Arnold Zweig (The Case of Sergeant Grischa), Ernst Weiss (Nahar), Joseph Roth (Radetzky March), and Vicki Baum (Grand Hotel); among the poets, Ernst Blass, Alfred Mombert, Rudolf Borchardt, Albert Ehrenstein, Martin Gumpert, Walter Mehring, Nelly Sachs, Berthold Viertel, Karl Wolfskehle and Alfrd Wolfenstein; among the essayists and critics, Karl Kraus, Alfred Polgar, Maximilian Harden, Theodor Wolff, Egon Friedell, Theodore Lessing, Kurt Tucholsky, Freidrich Torberg, Walter Benjamin, Ernst Bloch and Felix Salten (who also happend to be the author of Bambi).” [GRUNFELD, F., 1996, p. 27]

The non-Jewish German Nobel Laureate Thomas Mann once wrote about the key factor that elevated him to fame and attention:

“Jews ‘discovered’ me, Jews published me and propagated my reputation; they performed my impossible play; it was a Jew, the late S. Lublin-ski, who wrote of my Buddenbrooks (after it had been greeted elsewhere with sour expressions), ‘This book will grow with time, and will still be read generations from now.’ And when I go out into the world, and visit cities, it is almost always Jews, not only in Vienna and Berlin, who welcome, shelter, dine, and pamper me … It is a fact that simply cannot be denied that, in Germany, whatever is enjoyed only by ‘genuine Teutons’ and aboriginal Ur-Germans, but scorned or rejected by the Jews, will never amount to anything culturally.” [GRUNFELD, F., 1996, p. 28]
“American Jews have made tremendous contributions in all aspects of general culture. In the professions, in music, in literature, in painting and sculpture, in the academic world, and in the area of science, Jews are often distinguished and in many instances pre-eminent.”

Milton Plesur, 1982, p. 168-169

Jews are dominant in virtually all controlling facets of the modern art world. In the world of “high-culture” dance, music, and theatre, for decades S. Hurok Productions was the major force in performance promotion. When Sol Hurok (born Solomon Izrailevich Gurkov) died in 1974, notes Harlan Robinson, “he was the last large-scale independent commercial producer of high culture in the United States ... [ROBINSON, p. xv] ... [He] was an important force behind the establishment of the National Endowment for the Arts.” [ROBINSON, p. xiv] An early Hurok partner was Jacob Berman. [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 120] An early competitor in the “concert management business” was Daniel Mayer’s and Marks Levine’s National Broadcasting and Concert Bureau, with links to the fledgling NBC broadcast network. [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 133] In 1972 Hurok’s head of publicity, Martin Feinstein, became the Executive Director of Performing Arts for the newly created John F. Kennedy Center in Washington DC. (Hurok’s son-in-law, Barry Hyams, originally hired Feinstein to the Hurok firm. [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 298] In 1975, the president of Hurok Concerts, Sheldon Gold, was replaced by Maynard Goldman. Gold became president later of the major talent agency ICM Artists Ltd., a newly formed classical music and dance division of Marvin Josephson Associates.

In assessment of Hurok’s closest associates, Harlan Robinson notes that “beyond his domestic employees [cook, servant], Hurok had not real close friends, with the possible exception of [Jewish violinist Isaac] Stern. The violinist was also a favorite with Peter Hyams and Peter’s sister Nessa. They also remember their grandfather had a group of ‘cronies,’ including some Russian Jews, whom he had known for years and to whom he remained steadfastly loyal. These included his accountant and his longtime lawyer, Elias Lieberman, an old-time socialist who had helped to found the International Ladies Garment Workers Union” [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 405] At Huro’s death, he “left money to his grandchildren and to a variety of Jewish charitable organizations ... Surprisingly, only one performing arts organization was included in Hurok’s will: the Musicians Emergency Fund, Inc.” [ROBINSON, H. 1994, p. 462]

Hurok was even succesful in getting a Hollywood movie made about his life (screenplay writers: Harry Kurnitz and George Oppenheimer; producer: Geor-
Highest on the list of Hurok’s demands [for the movie] was the removal of any Jewish ethnicity in the character of the impresario hero or his associates ... [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 321] ... Similarly, Hurok strongly objected to the presence of ‘the stock figures of cigar-smoking impresarios’ present in the script’s original opening sequence. Such images would, he feared, detract from the image of refinement and good taste he wanted his fictionalized self to convey ... [He did not want to appear as] some sort of back-room shyster.” [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 322] In the mainstream, the resultant film was not widely acclaimed. The Jewish Ledger declared, however, that “Jews in America will be proud of the film .. Himself a very modest person, Mr. Hurok is very much interested in everything that is Jewish and lends a helping hand in Jeish affairs.” [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 332]

In the world of theatre, notes Lester Friedman, “by the early 1890s a good deal of the theatrical booking business in New York City was in Jewish hands, thanks to the Klaw & Erlanger syndicate, the Shubert brothers, Marcus Loew and Adolph Zukor, the Schenck brothers, and a host of other agents and stage managers.” [FRIEDMAN, L., 1982, p. 9]

Likewise, for decades the most prominent mogul on Broadway was a Jewish producer, David Merrick (born David Margulies). Merrick’s abusive personality saddled him with a widely known nickname: “the abominable showman.” Another Jewish theatre mogul, Joseph Papp (Papirofsky), founded the New York Shakespeare Festival, created the influential Public Theatre for playwrights, and produced such Broadway hits as Hair and A Chorus Line. Papp’s “ego was huge,” says Jewish author Helen Epstein,

“but instead of slickness, he exuded reserve and a sobriety that made me think of Old Testament patriarchs … Papp had influenced a huge number of his contemporaries and younger people in the arts. Hundreds of writers, actors, directors, composers, designers, producers, arts administrators, stage managers, journalists and critics traced the beginnings of their careers to the [Shakespeare] Festival. Thousands more dated their first exposure to Shakespeare to a production in Central Park. Millions of others had seen his productions on television and on Broadway. The name Joseph Papp embodied the history and very best possibilities of New York.” [EPSTEIN, H., 1994, p. 10-11]

Oscar Hammerstein I, also Jewish, by the early years of the 20th century built thirteen theatres/music hall (often for the opera) in New York, Philadelphia, and London. “The name and personality of Oscar Hammerstein,” notes Vincent Sheean, “became as familiar to the nation as if he had been elected its President ... Oscar Hammerstein ... commanded more space in the press than the Vanderbilts, Astors, Morgans, than William Jennings Bryan or indeed any other personage of his day except President Theodore Roosevelt.” [SHEEAN, V., 1956, p. 3-4] Hammerstein (and son Willie) even owned the Victoria Theatre (“the great nut vaudeville house of New York”) which was famed for freak shows, featuring “persons notorious for whatever reason” – “bridge jumpers and stunt flyers, divorcees, channel swimmers, and record-breakers of any kind; whether they had stage talent was irrelevant.” [SHEEAN, 1956, p. 112] Hammerstein’s greatest rival in the opera world (who eventually bought him out) was also Jewish, Otto Kahn, “banker and connoisseur of the arts [and] principal financial power of the Metropolitan [Opera Company].” [SHEEAN, V., 1956, p. 296]

But the most powerful entrepreneurial network in theatre production and control has long been the Shubert company. Jerry Stagg notes that Samuel, Jacob, and Lee (Levi) Shubert “invaded New York City in 1900, armed with tireless energy, boundless confidence, a lust for money, power, and fame, and $15,000, most of it borrowed. A quarter of a center later, their worth was estimated at half a billion dollars. [The Shuberts] took control of theatre in America.” [STAGG, p. 3] (Shubert CEO in the year 2000? Gerald Schoenfeld). More at ground level, Lee Strasberg and Stella Adler of New York’s Group Theatre were legendary and profoundly influential acting teachers. Lawrence Langner was one of the founders of the Washington Square Players.

As Ellen Schiff notes:

“A few years ago, Tyrone Guthrie speculated that if Jews withdrew from the American theatre, the institution ‘would collapse about next Thursday.’ Guthrie was no doubt assessing Jewish contributions at every level of show business from artistic, to administrators, to ‘angels.’ [i.e, philanthropists].” [SCHIFF, E., 1986, p. 79]

By 1999, Jewish entrepreneur Robert F.X. Sillerman’s SFX company was causing shock waves in the live theatre and music promotion worlds. In one and a half years it had spent $1.5 billion in gobbling up other companies. The Financial Post noted that he was still attempting to “strengthen his domination of live theatre promotion in the United States. SFX also is the single largest player in [music] concert promotion. So large, in fact, that regulators expressed concern last year … SFX is now believed to be close to purchasing its only major rival, Universal Concerts, a division of Montreal firm Seagram Company [controlled by the Jewish Bronfman family].” [LANG, A., 5-28-99, p. C1, C17]

SFX also owns or operates over 80 venues in the United States, mostly concert halls, as well as the rights to many theatrical productions (Phantom of the Opera, et al). It also produces over 13,000 events a year. Its recently purchased Falk Associated Management Enterprises division manages 650 professional athletes and broadcasters – basketball star Michael Jordan among them. “Talent agencies, ticketing companies, and independent promoters,” notes the (New York) Daily News, “have complained that the new live entertainment giant exerts too much control over the industry.” [FURMAN, 6-7-99, p. 57] In August 1999 SFX moved into Great Britain too, purchasing the Apollo Leisure Group (one of the largest theatre and arena operators in that country) for $254 million. The purchase also included Tickets Direct and the Barry Claymore Corporation. [FARMER, N., 8-21-99, p. 13]

In the dance world, Martha Graham was one of the icons of this art form 20th century. She wasn’t Jewish. But in her early seventies her “right hand man” became Ron Protas, Jewish and in his twenties, who eventually positioned himself to inherit her entire estate at her death. As Ismene Brown notes

“When dance great Martha Graham died at the age of 96, she left him [Protas] everything. It was the greatest legacy to dance this century. Five years later Ron Protas stood as the only inheritor of the Graham works, the Graham company, and the Graham industry. After reading the section on Protas in the huge biography of Graham by her long-term colleague and fellow choreographer Agnes de Mille (Rodeo, Oklahoma!); it’s hard not to expect to meet Svengali, Mephistopholes, and a leech rolled into one. No one could have been more damned in print. He caused a ‘blood-letting,’ ‘policed’ Graham, de Mille says; turned her against old friends, made her into an elderly fool performing into her seventies, and tainted a monumental career with sleazy celebrity games. The object of this scorn (shared by many) is a shock to meet – an amably shambling, hunched-up man of 49, black curly hair, chubby Jewish features, constantly wreathed in smiles, very disarming.” [BROWN, I., 10-16-96, p. 17]

Famed dancer Isadora Duncan’s accompaniest was Max Rabinovitch. [ROBINSON, H., 1994, p. 91] Duncan’s husband, Russian poet Seregei Yesenin, was once publicized as an “anti-Semite.” “Not surprisingly,” notes Harlow Robinson, “and probably with [Jewish impresario Sol] Hurok’s help, the story of Yesenin’s anti-Semitism immediately hit the newspapers, elaborately embroidered.” [ROBINSON, M., 1994, p. 92] As Julia Foulkes declares about the Jewish angle to the modern dance world:

“Although the leaders of modern dance in the 1930s – Martha Graham, Doris Humphrey, Charles Weidman, and Haya Holm – were not Jewish, Jewish women filled modern dance classes, companies, organizations, picket lines, and concert audiences. Teachers, such as Blanche Talmud and Edith Segal, taught performers, such as Lily Mehlman and Lillian Shapero; performances by choreographers such as Anna Sokolow and Sophie Maslow, were reviewed by critics, such as Edna Ocko; while organizers, such as Helen Tamiris and Fanya Geltman, hassled labor unions and the federal government for increased attention to dance. These efforts in substantiating a new art form have been overlooked because our view of the arts tends to focus on a few stars, emphasizing individual genius rather than collective momentum and organizational drive. Jewish women shaped the foundation of modern dance, and in the mid-1930s their impact was well enough known that the eminent social commentator [and Jewish comedian] Fanny Brice could unleash her satire on the subject, playing Martha Graham in a sketch entitled ‘Modernistic Moe,’ in which she cried ‘Rewolt!’ in a Yiddish accent.” [FOULKES, J., JUNE 2000, p. 233-252]

Even the best known mime in history, Marcel Marceau (originally Mangel), is Jewish. To his credit, he once told a Jewish ethnic newspaper: “I find it hard to identify with Jewish issues – humanity is my overriding battle cry.”
Performer Meredith Monk is also Jewish. [TWICE BLESSED, online gay/Jewish website]

Jewish influence in the visual arts is a huge story. “Modern art” (hereafter defined as painting, sculpture, and other visual arts) in capitalist society is a paradox. Its practitioners generally believe that their personal expressions of the human experience through physical objects are secularly sacred. Yet, to survive and prosper as artists, to garner the support to do further work that transcends mere consumerism, this belief itself must be fundamentally prostituted. “Fine art,” notes anthropologist Stuart Plattner, “is similar to religion … as an institution that counteracts the crassly commercial search for advancement in a capitalist art world. At the same time, these objects of supposedly sublime vision are bought and sold as commodities.” [PLATTNER, p. 4]

The elitist “art world” strata – so-called “High Art” – is the milieu of painting provenances, artist pedigrees, and the changing “avant-garde” superstar brand-names. There are, strangely, no objective standards in this strata to discern quality or value in either the artist or his creations. Not only are there no clear standards of evaluation, “in the age of conceptual, minimal, and performance art, it is often unclear what museum quality art is supposed to look like.” [PLATTNER, p. 5] The confirmation of artistic importance (and, hence, quality and value) is merely the decision of the “informed opinion” of High Art insiders, whose dictates are often self-rewarding. Such insiders include an incestuous cabal of professional art curators, critics, and dealers who swim back and forth among these occupational categories of art trade. (There are other entrees to the art community, of course. One of the most prominent art critics of the 1960s and 1970s was Harold Rosenberg who was trained as a lawyer and who became an influential “art critic” after a career in advertising.) [JACOBY, p. 110]

While there is no clearly unifying and objective standard of art evaluation, there is a referential High Art history, the entwined tales of artists and wealthy business patrons who brought them to public attention and acclaim. There is also an art jargon, and meta-language “art talk” for those in the know.

While there is no clearly unifying and objective standard of art evaluation, there is a referential High Art history, the entwined tales of artists and wealthy business patrons who brought them to public attention and acclaim. There is also an art jargon, and meta-language “art talk” for those in the know.

As Duncan Cameron, once-director of the Brooklyn Museum, said in a speech to the United Nations:

“In summary, then, the traditional museum has been administered by a curatorial elite whose members are trained as scholars in disciplines relevant to the museum collections … structured according to specific models of knowledge. These models are generally incomprehensible to other than those trained in a specific discipline and may be said to be encoded in the private languages of scholarship … This situation has persisted through the reluctance of the public to protest it and the willingness of governing bodies to support it. Both have been in awe of the mystique of curatorship, both have been unprepared to admit that the content of the museum is meaningless and lacks a personal relevance ...
For a few, the upper-middle class with higher education and therefore some key to the secret codes, it becomes a domain with class and status connections.” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 236-237]

“Art has become a commodity,” notes Sophy Burnham, “Collectors bought art as profitable speculation. Museums bought what their trustees (these same collectors) demanded they immortalize. Critics pushed art in which they had financial interest ... The artist had no part in these exchanges. Once his work passed out of his hands ... he received no further royalties. He watched the prices rise and the dealers in art get fat ... Art was whatever would sell.” [BURNHAM, p. 9]

“On the assumption that “he who pays the piper calls the tunes,” says Judith Huggins-Balfe, “critics have accused both individuals and institutional private patrons of altering some presumably ‘natural’ development of art, in their own class and commercial interests.” [BALFE, p. 314] Si Newhouse, for instance, (whom we have met before as chairman of the huge Advance media chain),“ said dealer Leo Castelli, “is one who has put together a perfect choice of artists, starting out with Pollack and de Kooning.” [WATSON, p. 104]

While trained “art professionals” are influential, the foundation of the modern art world is those who buy and sell it (sometimes these very art professionals). Such people decide what has value, and even what art is and is not. Most do not truly care about cutting edge perceptual insights or transcendent visions but, rather, money. Most buying and selling of art today, especially in the realm of High Art, is an economic investment. In 1984 major art journals, including Art-News and Art and Antiques, even began publishing lists of major art collectors. 60% of the list were Americans. The next most populous were Japanese, then Germans. [WATSON, p. 388] (In more recent years, with Japanese economic woes, Japanese influence has correspondingly diminished and a significant percentage of today’s “German” art activity we can safely presume to be Jewish).

The heart of the American (and international) High Art market is New York City. “Although Los Angeles, Chicago, San Francisco, Santa Fe, and other centers have large demands [for art],” says Stuart Plattner, “New York is hegemonic on the national scale, and even the international level, meaning that only elite gallery exposure in New York creates art-historical significance.” [PLATTNER, p. 8] New York City is also home for the most important art magazines and other periodicals whose sphere of reportage is usually its immediate vicinity. By 1973, some estimated that 75-80% of the 2500 core “art market” personnel – art dealers, art curators, art critics, and art collectors – were Jewish. [BURNHAM, p. 25] These people – and their progeny – in New York largely control American artistic tastes and values at the most important tier. (In 2001, according to ARTnews, at least eight of the “Top Ten” art collectors were Jewish: Debbie and Leon Black, Edythe and Eli Broad, Doris and Donald Fisher, Ronnie and Samuel Heyman, Marie-Josée and Henry R. Kravitz, Evelyn and Leonard Lauder, Jo Carole and Ronald S. Lauder, and Stephen Wynn). [ESTEROW, M., SUMMER 2001]
When Alice Bellony-Rewald (an artist, critic, and art model) first moved into the New York art world from France, she noted that:

“I was plunged into a world of highly sophisticated Jewish art collectors, and it took me a long time to reconcile my mental picture of speakeasies and the Wild West with people who spoke five languages fluently and lived surrounded by period furniture, Meissen china, and Old Masters.” [PEPPIATT, p. 16]

Jewish author Howard Jacobson wrote in 1993 about his experiences with prominent New York City art critic Peter Schjeldhal:

“’I came to New York to be Jewish,’ [Schjeldhal] once told me.
’Did you make it?’
’No.’
’What were you before?’
’Porcelain-sink Lutheran.’
’And now? Since you haven’t made it across as one of us?’
He paused. He wasn’t sure he wanted to be that un-Jewish.
’A certain transformation has occurred; but a certain gulf remains.’
It takes me a little while to put it together – the fact that just about every gallery/space/loft we go into is run by a Jew. This isn’t Jewish how I like it. This is slow-drrawl, camp Jewish, retreating, high-toned, not very sense-of-humorish Jewish. The pallid women gallery-owners whose walls and wine we absorb are also Jewish.” [JACOBSON, H., 1995, p. 84-85]

Famous Jewish novelist Judith Krantz notes in her biography her avenue into the upper tiers of the art world: “Polly Guggenheim, a sculptor who’d lived in Paris most of her life, became our guide into the art world.” [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 324]

In 1996, Jewish art historian Eunice Lipton admitted that the main reason she went into a career as an art historian was to be in a field dominated by Jews:

“I wanted to be where Jews were – that is, I wanted a profession that would allow me tacitly to acknowledge my Jewishness through the company I kept.” [RUBIN-DURSKY, p. 289]

Elsewhere, she notes that:

“On the face of it, art history seemed a gentile profession. For one thing, the study of Christian art was its center. In addition, there was an ancient Jewish injunction against making graven images. But the fact is, the field was filled with Jews. One might even say it was shaped by them. Art history is characterized in this century by studies in connoisseurship, formalist analysis, the study of iconography and iconology, and social analyses. Jews have been prominent in all categories.” [LIPTON, p. 285]

“Today,” wrote Gerald Kretetz in 1982, “… Jews enjoy every phase of the art world: as artists, dealers, collectors, critics, curators, consultants, and patrons. In fact, the contemporary art scene has a strong Jewish flavor. In some circles, the wheelers and dealers are referred to as the Jewish mafia since they command power, prestige, and most of all, money.” A few important members of the Jewish mafia in recent decades included dealers Leo Castelli, Ben Heller, and Larry Rubins (as well as Rubins’ brother, William, a curator at the Museum of Modern Art), free lance art critic Clement Greenberg and Hilton Kramer (long time art critic for the New York Times, Henry Geldzahler (curator of the Metropolitan Museum of Art), among many others. “This group is a formidable power,” noted Krafetz, “in forming tastes and promoting some schools of art to the exclusion of others.” [KRAFETZ, p. 161]

The study of iconography and iconology [keys in modern art evaluation] says Eunice Lipton, was “developed by Erwin Panofsky and practiced by [other] Jewish scholars like Leo Steinberg, Irving Lavin, and Linda Seidel.” [LIPTON, p. 286] Still other Jewish art scholars of prominence include Meyer Schapiro, Walter Friedlander, Robert Rosenblum, and Rosland Krauss, to begin a list just among those termed “formalist.” Joseph Hodin was a prominent Jewish art scholar in Britain, as was the Viennese-born E. H. Gombrich, author of the internationally influential textbook in every art student’s locker, The Story of Art. “The notion of Jewish culture,” he curiously claims, “was an invention of Hitler.” [SEARLE, p. T9]

Traditional Judaism has prohibited “graven images” and idolatry, and throughout most of history Jews were usually reluctant to engage in many types of activities western culture describes today as “art.” “It is … forbidden to draw the picture of a man,” declares the Orthodox Code of Jewish Law, “even only the face of a man.” [GANZFRIED, p. 53] “This is when [Jewish] religious law became all powerful,” noted the prominent Jewish religious philosopher Martin Buber, “The human body is despicable. Seeing is a sin. Art is a sin … Everything creative is smothered at its first appearance.” [OLIN, p. 45] “To a non-Jewish reader,” says Margaret Olin, “such judgments appear damning. Buber’s readership, however, was Jewish, since his book appeared under Zionist auspices.” [OLIN, p. 45]

In 1887, two French archaeologists, Georges Perrot and Charles Chipiez, reconstructed models of ancient Jewish temples and decided that Jews were the “least artistic of the greatest people of antiquity.” [OLIN, p. 42] A year later a prominent German art historian, Wilhelm Lubke, declared that “Jews, having no artistic sensibility of their own, borrowed architectural forms on an eclectic principle from the nations dwelling around them.” [OLIN, p. 42]

“[This] remark sounds innocent from a postmodern standpoint,” says Margaret Olin, “but for Lubke to characterize Jews as a people who borrowed from others the art they could not create on their own lent a historical basis to the anti-Semitic stereotypes of Jews as chameleon-like parasites.” [LIN, p. 42]

Even the well-known Jewish turn-of-the-century art historian Bernard Berenson reiterated what Olin calls a recurrent anti-Semitic theme. “The Jews,” said Berenson, “like their Ishmaelite cousins the Arabs, and indeed perhaps like all pure Semites (if such there be), have displayed little talent for the visual, and almost none for the figure arts.” [OLIN, p. 49]

But, although there was “absent a Jewish visual tradition prior to this century,” [FREUDENHEIM, p. 9] there was nothing to prevent them from engaging in the market place of it. Even “in the avant-garde circles of the twenties, thirties, and forties,” notes Nathan Glazer and Patrick Moynihan, “Jews were very often the critics (and entrepreneurs), non-Jews the creators. This was so in literature, painting, music, and the theatre.” [GLAZER/MOYNIHAN, p. 173]

“In the broad spectrum of Judeo-Christianity, one group, often figured as Jewish,” says Marc Shell, “is relatively comfortable with money and uncomfortable with representational art, while one group, frequently reckoned as Christianity, is relatively comfortable with art and uncomfortable with money. It is, according to this stereopticon, the essence of Judaism to reject representational art and the essence of Christians to expel changing coins from the temple.” [SHELL, p. 7]

There is, as we have repeatedly seen, little sacrosanct in Jewish religious tradition that prohibits money-making; certainly the exploitation of objects of human expression would fall within the marketable sphere. The merger of money and art as a single consumer commodity, the whole art world as a field for exploitation, and the profanation of modern art that is regarded as illusorily – yet secularly – “sacred,” has in our own day been profoundly effected by Jewish influence. Norman Cantor, for example, notes that:

“A member of the Warburg banking family single-handedly started up the field of art history … [CANTOR, p. 271] … All the art history departments in the world are direct descendants of Aby Warburg’s Institute (moved from to London in 1932 to escape the Nazis) and his great Jewish disciple, Erwin Panofsky. Is it anomalous that a Jew would have been so creative in the study of art that was so little cultivated in Jewish tradition? All the more that a liberated white Jew should pursue art history. But one can see a Judaizing tendency in Warburg’s method of art historical criticism. The picture is studied for its ‘iconology,’ its pattern of ideas illustrating textual passages. Art is thereby approached in hermeneutic fashion, again recalling Talmudic exegesis, rather than for its aesthetic content. Yet the most significant aspect of Warburg’s development in art history is the demonstration that market capitalism could embrace and fund a purely cultural and academic operation. The distinct equality of capital was not its materialism, but its liquidity, the fungible capacity of capital to transform into any commodity, including art and humanities literature that represents a dynamic power in society. Aby Warburg’s historical and critical mastery of art was structurally the same as his brother’s mastery in their international bank of money and its investment potential. The transformative interaction between art and capital is central to the nature of the market economy.” [CANTOR, p. 271]

(As Jewish scholar George Mosse notes about the Warburg art circle: “Erwin Panofsky, one of the Warburg library’s most famous collaborators [was] like almost all of its early collaborators a Jew … [Ernst Cassirer was] the Warburg library’s most prolific author.”) [MOSSE, G., 1985, p. 53]

“Jews may or may not have become more culture conscious,” suggests Gerald Krefetz, “but they certainly were among the first to realize that modern art is not a bad investment … [Some Jews saw] in modern art one of the most lucrative ways to duplicate money since the invention of compound interest.” [KREFETZ, p. 146] “The linkage of art and commercial gain,” notes Lindemann, “became more important in the United States than in any other country in history.” [LINDEMANN, p. 207] (Coincidence that Jewish administrator Lee Caplin “created and directed the Federal Program ‘The Business of Art and the Artist’ while serving as Special Assistant to the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts?”) [CAPLIN, L., 1989, p. ix] “Some dealers are commodity brokers, not selling pork bellies or soybean futures, but work by recognized artists, mostly dead,” says Krafetz, “They buy and sell their works as they would any other product … They are basically brother traders.” [KRAFETZ, p. 147]

A good example of such attitudes of quite literally “brother traders” can be found in a 1994 article in ARTnews that profiles three Jewish art investors – brothers Joseph, David, and Ezra Nahmad, heirs to a Syrian banking fortune. “Secretive and elusive,” reporter Andrew Decker also observes that the brothers “are among the richest art traders in the world. They are also among the least known … They have one of the largest stockpiles of art in the world … The inventory … consists of about 1,000 paintings that usually sit untouched in a warehouse … [DECKER, p. 116] … According to several sources, Joseph’s greatest interests are money, art, and women, roughly in that order.” [DECKER, p. 119] Joseph has been convicted in France for currency violations; in Italy he was jailed for having 25,000 stolen British pounds in his possession. He was also investigated in Italy for income tax evasion, owing over $13 million. In 1973 the Nahmad brothers were found to be in the possession of Giacometti bronzes that had been stolen eight years earlier.

In Israel, the hundreds of thousands of Jews flooding into Israel in recent years have brought with them art treasures from Russia, particularly old Russian Orthodox Christian icons. They are sold in Israel to dealers, collectors, or tourists for anywhere from $500 to $30,000. Their values can range from $500 to $2.5 million; the best quality pieces are sent from Israel to Europe or America for higher price resale. “Taking them out of the Soviet Union – or its successor independent republics,” notes the Atlanta Journal Constitution, “is illegal. But the immigrants take the risk, often bribing custom officials to look the other way.” [SALOME, p. A6]

In 1995 Dmitri Yakubovsky, once kicked out of Russian military school for what he decried as anti-Semitism, and later owner of a $5.3 mansion in suburban Toronto, had a new home. It was “a decrepit Russian prison cell in St. Petersburg’s Kresty Detention Center. He was arrested in Moscow last December and is charged with complicity in the theft of a historic $130-million collection of rare far Eastern and antique European manuscripts from the Russian National Library.” [GOLD, J., p. 37] The police laid a trap for Yakubovsky, “his arrest followed immediately, and the net expanded to Israel, where a group of Israelis were arrested.” [WARD, p. B6]
A venerable Israeli “Holocaust museum” has even been involved in international art smuggling from the former Soviet Union. In 2001, the Associated Press noted that

“In a secret operation, Jerusalem’s Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial has smuggled out of Ukraine fragments of murals by Polish-Jewish artist Bruno Schulz, sparking an international controversy. Yad Vashem maintains it was merely exercising its right to preserve the works of a prominent Jewish writer, artist and Holocaust victim, but Ukrainian and Polish officials say their removal was a crime.” [SHARGORODKY, S., 6-20-01]

In such an international art sphere, in 1995 ARTnews published a piece about the man who “is spending more freely than any other collector in history,” an Iranian-born Jew, now an American citizen living in Great Britain, Nass-er Khalili. His personal collection of Islamic art alone is insured for $1.5 billion. Khalili spent $7.5 million just to publish a thirty volume catalogue of the Islamic works he owns. Among other genres of his 27,000 art objects is a Japanese art collection worth as much as $100 million, Russian enamels and Fabergé, ancient Mesopotamian pottery figures, 19th-century Spanish metalwork, Swedish bridal tapestries (1750-1850), Indian woven silks (1200-1500), and 16 of 50 pre-16th century silks “all in Tibetan monasteries until the 1980s.” [NORMAN, p. 120] An early Jewish-Iranian adviser to Khalili was Mehdi Mahboubian “who was the most important of the group of Jewish Iranian art dealers in Tehran in the 1970s and acted as a personal adviser to the shah and shahbanu [the shah’s wife].” [NORMAN, p. 120]

[There was] a guru named Rudrananda, or, as he was known, Rudi. Rudi’s real name was Albert Rudolph. He was a Jewish guy who grew up in Brooklyn … [LEW, A., 1999, p. 51] [He had] a large store … where all of Rudi’s students lived. The store was lined with tonkas, Tibetan tapestries, and priceless Buddhas. Some of them were very large, over six feet tall, and all of them were exquisite. Rudi had stood at the Indian border when the Tibetans were fleeing the Chinese, buying all their priceless Buddhas and art treasures. Now he was an art dealer, selling his treasures to museums and extremely wealthy people. I had to wait a long time while he obsequiously waited on museum representative and millionaires, periodically going to the back of the store where one or two of his students were meditating on him. He would put his hand on their heads and somehow transmit energy to them, and they would go into convulsions. Other students were coming to see him for consultations. It was as if Rudi was giving off electricity. The more advanced the students were, the more electrified they would become until they were trembling, all in the midst of high-powered transactions over statuary. The millionaires who came to buy art objects seemed totally oblivious to everything that was going on and never got jolted. It was in the midst of all this that Rudi told me I should drop everything and come study with him, that he would make me rich, and that I would get laid all the time. ‘You should have seen the knockers on the woman I was just with in Boston,’ he said.” [LEW, A., 1999, p. 54-55]

In Switzerland, Werner and Gabrielle Merzbacher own “one of the world’s greatest accumulations of modern art.” [GREEN, D., p. 37] 139 works by 77 artists were exhibited at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem in 1998. In Los Angeles, “in the early 1990s,” notes Tom King,

“with his purchased of David Hockney’s Double Portrait, [Jewish Hollywood mogul David] Geffen began a buying spree that soon made the art world take note. He built a collection of modern masterpieces that, for the artists and periods he favored, was unparalleled, including many of the most valuable works by Jackson Pollock and Jasper Johns. [KING, T., 2000, p. 477]

In England, Jewish advertising mogul Charles Saatchi and his wife “have built a collection of modern art that is regarded today as perhaps the most important of its kind in the world in private hands,” largely concentrating on “American minimalists.” [FALLON, p. 325] By the 1980s Saatchi was spending $1 million a year on new art acquisitions. Among his interests was a “heavy investment in the art of [Jewish painter] Julian Schnabel.” [GLUECK, p. 2, p. 27] Norman Rosenthal of the British Royal Academy suggested that “the Saatchis are probably the most important collectors of modern art in anywhere in the world.” [FALLON, p. 335] Political artist Hans Haacke once held an exhibition (called “Taking Stock”) “which was an attack on the Saatchis, their advertising empire, and on Mrs. Thatcher [the British Prime Minister who was built to power with the help of Saatchi advertising].” [FALLON, p. 334]

Kevin Goldman even suggests that:

“Advertising is an industry in which the amount of money to be made rivals the fortunes made by investment bankers and robber barons. Indeed, one [advertising] man, Charles Saatchi, made so much money in advertising that he was able to control the world’s contemporary art market.” [GOLDMAN, p. 21]

“The Saatchi Collection,” says Alison Fendley, “has been a focus of debate in the world of contemporary art since it opened to the public in 1985. Little is known about the inner workings of the Saatchi Gallery; even today, its finances are mysterious.” [FENDLEY, p. 6]

Looking for an ikat, “a rare textile from Uzbekistan?” Try Guido Goldman, who in the last twenty years has amassed the largest private ikat collection from Central Asia in the world. (Goldman’s father, Nachum, was the “President of the World Jewish Congress and key player in a host of other Jewish organizations.”) [CEMBALEST, HOW, p. 11]

Suits of armor? Medieval artifacts? Judaica? Barry Trupin “owned one of the largest private collections of Judaica in America, as well as a world-renowned collection of medieval artifacts and suits of armor. His pride and joy was a suit of armor from Hever Castle in England that had belonged to Henry II. Trupin wanted to own the armor so passionately that he paid $3.2 million for it at auction, outbidding both the Tower of London and the Louvre.” [GAINES, S., 1998, p. 231]

How about the works of French poet, artist, and filmmaker Jean Cocteau? In 1995 Jewish business mogul Severin Wunderman shut down his “Severin Wunderman Museum” in southern California and donated “the world’s largest collection of works” by Cocteau to the University of Texas. Wunderman planned to move to France to live in his restored 15th century castle. [HOWLETT, p. E1] The works of artist Andrew Wyeth? In the 1980s, Hollywood producer Joseph E. Levine sold the world’s largest collection of Wyeth paintings. [ARONSON, S., 1983, p. 187]

Jewish TV personality Allen Funt (of Candid Camera fame) began buying relatively cheap paintings by artist Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema (1836-1912) to “decorate his apartment.” Ruskin had once described Alma-Tadema as “the worse painter of the nineteenth century.” “Funt,” says Karl Meyer, “proceeded to acquire more and more of the artist’s work; soon enough, publicity being what it is, there were newspaper features describing his hobby, and Funt had become the unlikely agent of Alma-Tadema’s rehabilitation.” After the Metropolitan Museum put on a show of Funt’s collection, Funt sold it all (“In all fairness,” says Karl Meyer, “he needed the money since he had recently been defrauded of $1,200,000 in Candid Camera profits by his longtime accountant, who later committed suicide.”) [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 184-185]

Native American art? In 1998 Stanley Marcus, chairman emeritus of the Neiman Marcus luxury store, put his American Indian art collection up for auction at Sotheby’s. In charge of the sale was Ellen Taubman, the head of Sotheby’s Indian art department for 25 years, and the daughter of Sotheby’s board chairman, Jewish real estate mogul Alfred Taubman. Picasso? In 1998, Victor and Sally Ganz put up for auction their art stash, including “the most important privately-held collection of works by Picasso in America.” Expected sales figures ranged from $125 million to half a billion dollars. [HANDWERKER, 11-10-97] In 1999, an auction of art (returned after confiscation by the Nazis decades ago) netted the Rothschild family $90 million.

Art from Germany? Going to auction in 2000, Marvin and Janet Fishman’s properties were worth an estimated $16 million. It was “a collection of some 160 works, one of the most comprehensive groups of early 20th century German art ever to be formed in private hands.” [RONNER, M., 7-30-2000, p. 16]

Anything else? Jewish dealer Ronnie Darvick has, over the years, even sold the gun that killed Lee Harvey Oswald (for $220,000), Marilyn Monroe’s certificate of conversion to Judaism when she married Jewish playwright Arthur Miller in 1956, the writings of mass murderer Charles Manson, and Adolf Hitler’s autograph. “My mother had her whole family wiped out in Poland,” says Darvick, “Her attitude was, he’d be turning over in his grave if he knew a Jew was making money off his autograph.” [THOMAS, p.G8]

In 1981 Charles Hamilton, an art and documents dealer, wrote about his auction world experiences:
“In November, 1975, I put up at auction several unusual Nazi items, one of which instantly captivated the press. It was an ornate, gold-plated license plate used on Hitler’s parade limousine. He’d presented it to his mistress, Eva Braun, because she was intrigued by flashy beauty. The plate was made of heavy brass plated in gleaming gold. There was an embossed swastika in the upper left and a Nazi eagle in the upper right. The plate bore the legend: ‘Reichskanzler – Deutschland.’ Not more than two doors away from the Conrad Suite at the Waldorf-Astoria where I was holding the sale of Hitler’s license plate, there was by chance a meeting of the B’nai B’rith, an assemblage of pensive graybeards wearing yarmulkes. A television reporter perceived the anomaly. ‘May I borrow that license plate for a few minutes?’ he asked. ‘Of course,’ I said. I followed him and his television crew into the B’nai B’rith conference. The reporter selected an old man who looked as though he might have suffered the brutalities of a concentration camp. ‘Sir,’ he said, ‘Mr. Hamilton, the autograph dealer, is auctioning off, just down the hall, this license plate from Hitler’s limousine. May I have your opinion of the sale?’ ‘Disgusting! I cannot believe that anyone would sell or buy such a revolting object.’ The reporter asked the same question of three or four other elderly members of the assemblage. The answers were all vehement denunciations of me and my auction. After the license plate was sold for $3,500 to a Jewish dealer, the reporter asked me what I thought of the sale.” [HAMILTON, C., 1981, p. p. 180-181]

Elsewhere, Hamilton notes another such story:

“In the fall of 1979 a young man, who introduced himself as Aaron Goldberg, brought me for auction a small sheaf of unused stationery imprinted with Hitler’s name and address. ‘I take it your father brought these back from Germany after the war,’ I said, recognizing the paper as that often used by Hitler in writing to lower army echelons. ‘No,’ he explained. ‘My father was too old for the army. He owned a printing shop in Brooklyn. Two or three years before we got into the war, he was asked by the Nazi embassy in New York to print some official stationery for Hitler. It was tough at that time to get any sort of work and although Jewish, my father took the job. I found these sheets in the back of the shop.’” [HAMILTON, C., 1981, p.182]

In England, in 1989 a Jewish entrepreneur, Andrew Benjamin, was evicted by his Jewish landlord when it was discovered that Benjamin’s rented space was a store called “Cutdown,” which was “selling Nazi clothing and medals, as well as racist records, literature, and videos.” [HOROWITZ, D.] (Conversely, in a Jewish censorial action against an Internet provider, France’s International League Against Racism and Anti-Semitism and the Jewish Student Union went to court in Europe to seek to ban an on-line Yahoo Internet auction of Nazi memorabilia. “Is Yahoo expected,” complained the company, “to check who is on-line and comply with the laws of every other country?”) [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 5-16-2000]
Jewish activism to stop the sale of Nazi memorabilia is odd considering the vast experience of art and documents dealer Charles Hamilton in the selling of Nazi items:

“In the past twenty years I’ve sold at auction thousands of Nazi relics and documents. And nearly always such sales have evoked criticism, harrowing experiences, or even threats on my life ... Today the big threat to me is not from bombs [Hamilton once had a bomb threat for having a Hitler photo for sale in his gallery window] but from collectors who are stampeding me and other autograph dealers in their frenzy to stock up on letters and documents of Hitler and his henchmen before the price goes through the roof. A letter of Hitler’s is now worth five of Churchill’s and ten of Franklin D. Roosevelt’s. Who’s in the Third Reich rat race? The Germans are buying. The British are buying. But most of all it’s Jewish collectors in America. They bid with aliases or anagrams, from behind pillars or half-closed doors, or signal the auctioneer furtively. Their names are top secret.”

Is it just the fascination of evil and violence? Maybe. But as one Jewish collector explained to me: ‘It’s like having the head of the hunter on the wall instead of the hunted.” [HAMILTON, C., 1981, p. 172, 174]

Hamilton continues:

“One of the outstanding Nazi collections in America was formed by the late Philip D. Sang, whose collection of Judaica I recently appraised for presentation to Brandeis University. I helped Sang to build his superb assemblage of Jewish letters and documents and I helped him to gather his huge and important Nazi collection. Among the historic items that came from my sales were the Nazi top-secret plan for the invasion of Holland and Belgium and Mussolini’s own copy of Nietzsche’s Man and Superman, annotated with Il Duce’s own ideas for implementing the philosopher's vision.

Another Nazi collector, famed for his physical education courses, once told me

“that his entire family was wiped out in an Austrian concentration camp during the Holocaust. Yet I never met any man so enthralled with the Nazis, especially the more brutal of them. He liked to ensconce his villains in spectacular frames. I once put together for him an ‘ensemble’ of Hitler and Goering, with examples of some of the medals worn by the Fuehrer and his pompous air marshall. As my customer stood admiring the finished product, glittering with medals, he commented on my ‘superb job’ and I couldn’t refrain from asking: ‘What are you going to do with it?’

‘Why,’ he said, ‘I’m going to hang it in my living room.’

And in Miami, among other business projects, Jack Sugarman, “prominent auctioneer” and owner of Jack Sugarman Auctioneers, once organized an auction of paperweights owned by Oscar Schindler (of “Schindler’s List” fame). In 2000, Sugarman went to prison for embezzlement of funds from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 4-18-2000]

Then there is “Chicago collector” Million [Is this the Jewish source magazine’s typographical error?] Kohn, who has amassed 700 Holocaust-related artifacts, including “a list of people scheduled for extermination on July 5, 1943,” “a stuffed pillow with human hair, a bar of soap made from human body fat, and a patch of skin bearing a tattoo.” He has exhibited his collection in 14 countries. [LUM, R., 11-19-99, p. 3A]

The man, Jack Ruby, who killed Lee Harvey Oswald was Jewish. So was Abraham Zapruder, the man who filmed President J.F. Kennedy being shot in Dallas. Zapruder sold the original 8mm film to Time magazine for $150,000. “Concerned that a Jewish man’s profiting from the assassination could touch off a wave of anti-Semitism,” notes Washington Post reporter George Lardner Jr., “his lawyer suggested that he donate the first $25,000 to a fund for a Dallas police officer killed that day, J. D. Tippett. Zapruder readily agreed.” [LARDNER, G., 1998, p. A11] Zapruder died in 1970.

Inexplicably, the film was returned to Zapruder’s heirs in 1975 by Time Inc. Over the years, the Zapruder family (one of Abraham’s sons is a Washington DC lawyer) has been known to charge outlandish fees for the use of the assassination footage. Two independent filmmakers who were told that permission to reproduce the footage in their own movie would cost $30,000, successfully sued the Zapruders to use the historical material. [MARGOLICK, D., 1988, p. B20] In 1997, the U.S. government appropriated the original movie film (it was already in storage, at the Zapruders’ request, at the National Archives.) The Justice Department went to arbitration with the Zapruder family to decide “just compensation” for the 26 seconds of footage. The government offered $3 million; the family asked for $30 million. Three Justice Department judges eventually decided (2-1) to give the family $16 million. (Kenneth Feinberg and Arlin Adams voted yes, and Walter Dellinger no – he suggested $3-5 million as a fair market value). Incredibly, the Zapruders’ also retained copyright – any reproduction of the film would be subject to a fee to the family. [REICHMAN, D., 8-3-99]

As the Quincy Patriot Ledger (Quincy, Massachusetts) editorialized:

“You and I [taxpayers] get the bill and the government gets to keep the original footage. Besides the $16 million, the Zapruder heirs retain the copyright, so they can sell the footage another 16 million times … The family compared its treasure to a Van Gogh painting.” [QUINCY, p. 12]

(Even the man who painted John F. Kennedy and his wife “for their White House portraits” was Aaron Shikler, also Jewish. She also notes in her biography “David Levine, the now-legendary caricaturist.”) [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 208]

Elsewhere, Stanley Slotkin, the Jewish founder of the Abbey Rents company, once bought a pile of rocks dug from a tunnel next to Christianity’s traditional Jesus nativity site (in Bethlehem) in the 1960s; in more recent years his descendants set the souvenir stones in jewelry frames and are marketing them in TV commercials (featuring actor Ricardo Montalban) as “nativity stones,” selling for as high as $395 apiece. [DART, J., p. B1]

Of course Jews are active in the specifically Jewish art market too. Wilbur Wendell Pierce (originally: Wilbur Persofsky), for instance, even has “an international reputation for his collection of concentration camp currency, which he amassed during the past five years [1991-96].” [BIBERMAN, p. 69]

In the field of archeological swindles, Moses Shapira was the pioneer in the field. “Shapira,” notes Israeli art curator Irit Salmon, “was the first to recognize that archeology could be a profitable business.” Shapira, a Russian Jewish transplant to Jerusalem, sold a variety of fake archaeological artifacts in the late 1800s, including recently manufactured items he misrepresented to major European museums. “His exposure as a fraud in 1884,” notes Shoshana Sappir, “led to his suicide a few months earlier.” [SAPPIR, S., 7-31-2000] In Great Britain, famed Jewish swindler Adam Worth was behind the theft in 1876 of Thomas Gainsborough’s painting of the Duchess of Devonshire, which only a few weeks earlier “had been sold at auction for 10,000 guineas, at that time the highest price ever paid for a work of art, causing a sensation.” [MacIntyre, B., 1997, p. 3]

“While foraging at one garage sale, I paid a few bucks for a book called FAKE! [full title: FAKE! The Story of Elmyr de Hory, the Greatest Art Forger of Our Times, by Clifford Irving], a biography of Elmyr de Hory, perhaps the greatest art forger of all time. De Hory was a Jewish Hungarian aristocrat and would-be artist who lived in Paris in the 1920s … During World War II, De Hory’s parent’s were killed and the family riches confiscate. He was stranded in Paris with no allowance – but an undiminished taste for high living … [He] launched a 20-year forgery career. Never successful with his own work. De Hory cranked out a prodigious body of fakery. He could mimic almost all of his old acquaintances. To sell his fakes, he’d drop hints that his father had amassed a private collection in the 1930s that was later smuggled out of Hungary. He sold to art dealers and museums. His work started showing up in art books as originals. He forged so many Dufys that an expert once rejected two real Dufy’s as fraudulent because he mistakenly assumed that De Hory’s hand and style were the correct ones. He was finally caught in 1967 and spent a few months in a Spanish jail.” [NOHLGREN, S., 7-16-00]

Auction gallery owner Charles Hamilton notes another Jewish con-man:

“The ability to bilk one’s clients at auction is a fine art, make no mistake about it. To succeed for a lifetime without detection or exposure, the auction- buying crook must have the cunning of a polecat, the ethics of a Gabon viper, and the acquisitive drive of a dung-beetle. All these feral qualities were uniquely fused in the late Lew David Feldman, a rare book and manuscript dealer who operated under a firm name devised

More recently, in 1987, the Jewish Week ran an article with a headline declaring “Israeli Art World Stunned By Forgery Allegations.” Ten Israelis were eventually arrested in the scam, including gallery owners and art dealers. “80 high quality fakes” of prominent Israeli artists were discovered in the ring, as well as stolen art from important artist Eliahu Gat. [JW, 4-7-87, 4-10-87]

In the United States, in 1982 the state of New York created a law, sponsored by the Jewish Community Relations Council, which sought to undermine the busy market in stolen Torah scrolls (“150 …. in recent years in New York alone”). Much of the Torah market theft was attributed to a “Brooklyn-based Russian Jewish crime ring.” [KALMANOFSKY, p. 58] In the new system, documentation of the previous scroll owner would henceforth be necessary for any sales transaction. [GALLOB] Although a Sefer-Torah “is the holiest object in the Jewish religion,” a Manhattan Judaica dealer, Herbie Stavsky, noted that “as long as people like money, there will always be someone who will steal it. Goes to show you that nothing’s sacred. Anything for the almighty dollar.” [KALMANOFSKY, p. 55]

As evidenced with stolen Torah pages, a growing realm of corruption is the business of buying and selling Jewish antiquities. In 1990 the Jewish Week noted recent criminal cases including the $60,000 forgery of a 15th century haggadah by an Italian Jew, an antique Hungarian book of Psalms that “was stolen only to appear at an Israeli auction,” and a Hassidic art dealer, Chaim Schneilbalg, who was murdered in a Jerusalem hotel while meeting an art client. A suspect was an Israeli living in West Germany who was “reportedly involved in counterfeiting, the running of brothels, and a previous insurance claim of dubious validity.” Schneilbalg, reported the Jewish Week, “was said to have been jockeying for control of the market in Jewish manuscripts suddenly available in newly capitalist Eastern Europe.” [MARK, J, p. 31]

In an overview of the growing art market for Jewish artifacts, Jonathan Mark in Jewish Week noted that “Ignorance and fraud were creating such havoc that in the last twenty years Judaica buyers and sellers increasingly turned to non-Jewish auction houses to protect themselves from each other … With many American Jews experiencing a rise in their discretionary incomes in the 1970s and 80s, more began buying and selling Judaica as an investment or hobby. It was often used for Jewish fund raising … But even in auction houses … certain dealers were known to work in collusion … The recent fascination with the Holocaust has inflated the market even further. Purchasing an item that was desecrated by the Nazis was considered to be very chic ‘mitzvah.’” [MARK, J, p. 31]

By 2000, not much had changed. “Synagogues across Europe are being robbed of treasures worth hundreds of thousands of dollars,” noted the Jerusalem Report. Highly suspect were “two Israeli con artists” who continued to reappear at synagogues, particularly in the Netherlands. [LEVY, R., 2-14-2000] In 2001, Israeli police arrested Yerahmiel Hershler, Aharon Stefansky and Amnon Edri in the Jewish state with stolen religious artifacts from synagogues from "Britain, Gibraltar and a number of European countries" worth "at least $2 million … A fourth suspect was arrested in northern Israel. A police spokesperson said additional arrests were expected." HAAS, D., 3-2-01, p. 2]

Entrepreneurial Jews have been especially active in the European “art scene” since Emancipation in the 1800s. “By the opening of the late 19th century,” says Howard Sachar, “Jewish [art] salons in Berlin were well established as the center of German social life … Writers, artists, intellectuals and viveurs all found good food and even better conversation at the gatherings.” [SACHAR, p. 150] (Much earlier, the wealthy Amsterdam Jewish community often paid for their depiction by the great painter Rembrandt. [37 of his 200 male portraits are of Jews. “When Rembrandt fell on hard times in his later years and became bankrupt,” says M. H. Goldberg, “he was given both spiritual and material help by a rabbi.”) [GOLDBERG, M. H., 1976, p. 122]

There were also the likes of Jacques-Louis David:

“Realizing the propaganda potential of art and eager to assert France’s primacy in all fields of culture, Napoleon reshaped the academy into a superb machine for the production of art. Jacques-Louis David, a former member of the Royal Academy and an ardent Bonapartist, was one of the governing elite who spurred artists to glorify France in painting classical themes or the battles and heroes of the day.” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 170]

Jews have been particularly preeminent in the economic exploitation of art and the formation of its commercial value since the rise of “modern art” in the 1880s. In that era the center of the art world was Paris. “[There were] two groups of important art dealers in Paris in the first half of the twentieth century,” notes Peter Watson, “… one was made up of [Daniel-Henri] Kahnweiler, Paul Guillaume, Felix Feneon, and the Rosenbergs [Leonce and Paul], dealers in contemporary works …. The other was an equally tight-knit but smaller group of dealers who formed the elite secondary markets dealing with Old Masters … and increasingly in the Impressionists. At the center of this group were [Nathan] Wildenstein, [Rene] Gimpel, and [Jacques] Seligmann. Loosely attached to them were three other dealers in London and New York, [Samson] Wertheimer and [Roland] Knoedler [later run by Charles Henschel until after World War II].” [WATSON, p. 219-220] “[Paul Rosenberg’s strait-forward approach and steep prices shocked Parisian art circles and made him the subject of savage criticism.” He even once said, “As for me, a painting is beautiful when it sells.” [FELICIANO, p. 54] Among those in Rosenberg’s art stable was Picasso, formerly signed to David-Henry Kahnweiler and Rosenberg’s brother Leon. All these people were Jewish.
Further, “one of the oldest art dynasties in France” was founded by Alexandre Bernheim [FELICIANO, p. 75] and David David-Weiss, a prominent art collector, became the President of the Board of Directors of the French National Museum in 1933. Across the border, Max Friedlander, “one of the leading experts on Rembrandt,” directed the Berlin Museum in the same era. [EPSTEIN, 1996, p 290]

Disgruntled with such Jewish control of the art market, in 1915 a lecturer, Tony Tollett, delivered an address to the French Academy of Sciences, Literature, and Arts in Lyon entitled: “On the Influence of the Jewish-German Corporation of Paris Art Dealers on French Art.” [WATSON, p. 190] By 1930, notes Pierre Assouline, “according to dealer Pierre Loeb, during this period four art dealers out of five were Jewish, as were four out of five art collectors … Wilhelm Uhde who had made the same observations, added art critics to the list.” [ASSOULINE, p. 230] After the Nazi’s takeover of France, notes Hector Feliciano, “deploring the lack of experts available to advise German clients, a number of the Nazi information services in Paris explained that this was because most of the premiere art experts had been Jews. Since the 1920s, they had contributed to the development and maintenance of a worldwide network of wealthy art buyers. This network collapsed as soon as they were denied a role in Europe’s largest art market.” [FELICIANO, p. 124]

Nachum Gidal notes that in Germany, James Simon “made a gift of his world famous collection of Italian renaissance paintings, sculptures, medallions, and bronze” to the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin, “on whose governing board he sat.” [GIDAL, p. 348] Other prominent German Jewish collections included those of Marcus Koppel, Franz and Rober von Medelssohn, Alfred Beit, Oscar Huldschinsky, Eduard Arnhold, Leopold Sonnemann, H. H. Meyer, and Philip Rothschild, among others. “The greatest collection of German 19th century painters,” continued Gidal, “belonged to Max Bohm and Rudolf Mosse; the greatest collection of Old Master drawings was assembled by Paul Davidson.” [GIDAL, p. 348] Among the major Jewish German art dealers were Alfred Flechtheim, Herwath Walden, and Paul Cassirer in Berlin, and Bernheim & Heinemann in Munich.

Many Jewish art dealers grew to be extraordinarily successful. In 1909 Jacques Seligman “astounded Paris by acquiring the Palais de Sagan, an even more luxurious house … Seligman was the main [art] supplier for the French Rothschilds as well as [J. D.] Morgan; he was also known for his contacts in Russia …” [WATSON, p. 224] “Possibly the most successful, and certainly, the most secretive [art dealer] was [Nathan] Wildenstein,” says Peter Watson, “ … Another reason for Wildenstein’s success was his close association with Duveen and Gimpel, which made each others businesses truly international.” [WATSON, p. 220-221]

“Georges Wildenstein,” notes Hector Feliciano, “was very well known and actively involved in art circles in a number of countries, including those within the Nazi sphere of influence. Even after the French armistice and the German occupation, Wildenstein seems to have taken advantage of this network to organize a number of deals with the Germans.” [FELICIANO, H., p. 61] Feliciano was actually sued for such statements about Wildenstein and the Nazis by the art dealer’s heirs in the 1990s. Feliciano counter sued, and with relevant historical evidence, won the case.

“Notoriously dishonest,” [WATSON, p. 166] Joseph Duveen was another prominent Jewish art dealer in the early decades of the 1900s, “the most successful art broker of the twentieth century, this trade – thanks to his undoubted charisma and his gift for salesmanship, laced with lavish doses of corruption.” [SIMPSON, ARTFUL, p. 1] Upon his move from Europe to New York City, Duveen was charged (in a legal “case that attracted enormous publicity”) with evading customs duties of – at today’s values – $102 million. Connections with several United States Senators and other men of influence helped Duveen evade the law. [WATSON, p. 166]

Duveen had a long – and secret – association with the very prominent and influential Jewish art connoisseur, critic, and esthete, Bernard Berenson. Berenson (whose original name was Bernhard Valvrojenski), an expert on Christian art, converted to Protestantism and then Catholicism, but noted in his diary,” At times I seem to myself to be a typical ‘Talmud Jew.’” He also wrote that he longed to drop “the mask of being goyim and return to Yiddish reminiscences …” [RUBIN, p. 75] In 1944, Berenson wrote a piece called, “Open Letter to American Jewry.” In it, notes Barry Rubin, “Berenson warned that envious Christians would persecute them, ‘even if you were innocent as the angels … and you are far from that.’” [RUBIN, p. 76]

For his less than innocent part, Berenson regularly colluded with Duveen over a twenty-five year period in perpetuating continuous fraud and deceit upon unsuspecting art collectors. “Berenson was a genius,” writes Colin Simpson, “who early in life channeled his gifts into the study of that finest flower of Christian art: Italian Renaissance painting. By the age of 35 he had become the world’s leading authority … The curators of many of world’s greatest museum’s were either his former pupils or his disciples … They came to hear his opinions, take his advice, and pay homage to his scholarship and his intellectual integrity. A small minority saw him as a disgustingly rich, opinionated, spiteful tyrant … But only a handful were aware that it was Berenson, not Duveen, who was probably the most successful and unscrupulous art dealer the world has ever seen.” [SIMPSON, ARTFUL, p. 1]

“The raw truth about both men,” notes Peter Watson, “… is… complex and considerably … sordid.” [WATSON, p. 167] For his part, from 1911 to 1937 Berenson’s hidden association with Duveen netted him alone the equivalent – in our day – of $150 million. [SIMPSON, ARTFUL, p. 2] “Berenson,’ notes Eunice Lipton, “shaped the very terrain of Renaissance studies, not to mention the market for what became its masterpieces.” [LIPTON, p. 285]

Another of Berenson’s Jewish contemporaries who had a strong hand in shaping American art history was Paul Sachs. “Though not as widely known as Berenson,” notes George Goodman, “Paul Joseph Sachs, too, had a patriarchal influence in the world of art museums – in America and abroad. Unlike Berenson, however, Sachs was born to privilege.” [GOODMAN, #2, p.2, p. 54] Sachs’ father and uncle founded the prominent Goldman, Sachs New York investment firm. Paul Sachs, an Associate Director of Harvard’s Fogg Museum and chairman of that college’s Fine Arts Department, aided a number of Jewish art scholar protégés, including James Rorimer (eventual Director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art). “Two other Jewish protégés,” notes Goodman, “happened to be Sach’s relatives” – Charles Kuhn and James Sachs Plaut (eventual head of the Boston Institute of Contemporary Art). [GOODMAN, #2, p. 57] Yet another Sachs relative, Samuel Sachs II, became head of the Minneapolis Institute of Arts in 1973, then later Director of the Detroit Institute for the Arts and New York’s Frick Collection. Paul Sachs’ grandson, Franklin W. Robinson, also became – in 1979 – the Director of the Museum of Art at the Rhode Island School of Design, and later Director of the Johnson Museum at Cornell University. The patriarch Sachs, says Goodman, “largely invented the notion of curatorial training.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 145]

Jewish pre-World War II influence in the European art world – and Jewish influence in it now – may be appreciated by this observation by John Conklin. While some wealthy German-Jews – like financiers William Weinberg, Georges Lurcy, Siegfried Kramarsky, and Jacob Goldschmidt – were able to get their art out of Europe as capital, “In 1973 the Austrian government declared that the art in its possession that it had been unable to return to the rightful owners and heirs would become state property, saying that there were no longer many claims being made. Art magazines and Jewish groups challenged that position … From then until 1985, the Austrian government and Jewish organizations worked together to find the owners of the unclaimed pieces. In 1985, the Austrian Parliament passed a law to return to their rightful owners and heirs more than 8,000 works of art that the Nazis had confiscated. Some from museums but most from European Jews … The law established a period until September 1986 for claims to be processed; unclaimed works were then to be auctioned off and the proceeds divided among Austrian [World War II] resistance groups, the Jewish community in Vienna, and Jewish groups in the United States. [CONKLIN, p. 222]

With the rise of German fascism, Jewish art historians began emigrating out of Europe. At New York University alone, Jewish refugee art professors included Richard Ettinghavern, Walter Friedlander, Karl Lehman, Alfred Salmony, Guido Schoenberger, and Martin Weinberger. [GOODMAN, #2, p. 61]

Yet another prominent early twentieth century ring of Jewish art dealers was the Stein family: Gertrude, Leo, Michael, and Sarah. “They claimed,” says Peter Watson, “often and vociferously, to have discovered modern Art.” [WATSON, p. 161] Their famous Parisian salon “was an expression of the Steins’ desire to show off and have others take them as seriously as they took themselves … The Saturday salon made the Steins famous … Leo took [his] Renoirs and half of the Cézannes to the United States. He was keen to get to New York to try Freudian treatment for three complexes from which he was convinced he suffered: an inferiority complex, a castration complex, and a pariah complex.” [WATSON, p. 162]
One of the Stein sisters, Gertrude, became famous as a writer, starting out in America with impressions of Picasso and Matisse which were published in another influential German-Jewish art dealer’s magazine in New York City, Camera Work. This man, Alfred Stieglitz, “editor/dealer/entrepreneur/ impresario/photographer,” would “spawn the spectacular exhibition that introduced modern art to the United States. It was a show that would change American taste for all time, that would eventually cause modern art to rival Impressionism in all the sales-rooms, and that in the long run would leapfrog New York over Paris as the art capital of the world.” [WATSON, p. 163] For Gertrude Stein’s part, “Stein’s apparent pride in her Jewish heritage and frequent assertion of Jewish particularity suggests a strong, continuing identity.” [ANTLER, J., p. 175]

With the shift in the Art world center from Europe to New York City, the development of the “art market,” “art scene,” and “art world” – in all its most important permutations – continued to be Jewish-dominated. Julien Levy, for example, was a major dealer of surrealist art in the 1930s. Salvador Dali was “central to Levy’s stable … Julian Levy and his gallery are central to the history of American art between the wars.” [ALTSHULER, B., MARCH 1999] Maurice Wertheim (father of Zionist historian Barbara Tuchman, who we have met earlier) was a major art collector. Also, “as president of the American Jewish Committee in the early 1940s, he tried unsuccessfully to foster support for Israeli statehood.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 61] Wealthy Jewish patron Peggy Guggenheim sponsored and helped build the career of famous Abstract Expressionist Jackson Pollock whose wife, Lee Krasner (formerly Lena Kreisner) was also Jewish. Ms. Guggenheim had a reputation for “bizarre sexual appetites” and claimed to have slept “with practically every man she ever met,” including Pollock. [NAIFEH/SMITH, 1989, p. 478] Guggenheim sued Pollock’s widow in the 1960s, “charging a failure to hand over at least fifteen works executed by her late husband between 1946 and 1948 when Miss Guggenheim was subsidizing him on the condition that he give her everything he produced.” [BURNHAM, p. 89] For her part, Krasner outlived Pollock by 31 years and amassed a fortune of $26 million, largely from Pollock’s estate. “Lee Krasner spent the rest of her life nurturing the Jackson Pollock legend. Through her crafty manipulations, the price of Pollock’s paintings skyrocketed into the millions.” [GAINES, S., 1998, p. 144]

“After World War II,” remarks Gerald Krefetz, “a new element was added to collecting: investment value. Jews were perhaps the first to appreciate the new art and the new ingredient.” [KREFETZ, p. 147] Sam Kootz opened a gallery in 1945 (he even experimented, in later years, with selling limited edition art at department stores such as Macy’s and Gimbel’s.) He, like some others, came to art with “a training in law” and a background as an advertising executive. Among art dealers, says Marcia Bystryn, “Kootz marks a shift from a concern with establishing a personal bond with the artist to a concern for a marketable product … [BYSTRYN, p. 184] … [He] was to apply the techniques he learned in the advertising business to that of marketing his artists.” [BYSTRYN, p. 185]

Castelli, owner of one of the most influential American art galleries in modern history, is widely credited to have spectacularly maneuvered the art world to his best economic advantage, the consequences which have been profound in art history. In 1964 Robert Rauschenberg, one of the artists in Castelli’s “stable,” won the prestigious Venice Biennale Prize. Sophie Burnham notes that:

“It was said that Castelli first handpicked the American Biennale commissioner, Alan Solomon, Director of the Jewish Museum; then he chose eight American representatives (four of whom were attached to his gallery) and the American judges, then trotted off to Europe to persuade the other [European] judges … of the inevitable thunderous Rauschenberg landslide … The first person invited to be the American judge had turned the job down on the grounds that he felt he would have been unable to exercise his own opinion in the face of American pressure. [BURNHAM, p. 45]

“I was somewhat responsible for the Rauschenberg victory,” Castelli later admitted to the New York Times Sunday Magazine. “After Rauschenberg won the Venice Biennale in 1964,” notes Stuart Plattner, “the value of this [genre of] art was ‘proven,’ and prices for the gallery’s artists rose.” [PLATTNER, p. 35] “Anyone can discover an artist,” Castelli once said, “but to make him what he is, give him importance, that’s really discovery.” [ECONOMIST, p. 98] In this context, Castelli was influential in the “discovery” of Jasper Johns, Robert Rauschenberg, Ray Lichtenstein, Frank Stella, Andy Warhol, James Rosenquist, Richard Serra, Donald Judd, Ellis Kelly, Cy Twombly, and others. [ECONOMIST, p. 99]

One of the most influential art exhibitions in the early years of the 20th century, featuring 1,300 art works, was the International Exhibition of Modern Art, also known as the Armory Show. As Karl Meyer notes:

“In 1912 painters Arthur B. Davies and Walt Kuhn toured Europe to gather the best examples of the most radical modernist works ... By the end of their hegira Davies and Kuhn had assembled the first large assortment of works by masters of European modernism to be shown in America ... The Armory Show has been accurately described by Lloyd Goodman, former director of the Whitney Museum of American Art, as the ‘opening gun in the long, bitter struggle for modern art in this country.’” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 100-101]

(Jewish art mogul Henry Geldzahler, chairman of the Metropolitan Museum museum’s twentieth-century art and later commissioner of New York City’s Cultural Affairs, also mounted a very influential exhibition in 1969: “New York Painting and Sculpture: 1940 to 1970.” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 101-102] In the late 1960s, the Metropolitan Museum “assigned five seats on the Metropolitan board to ensure borough-wide representation.” Of these five, one was an African-American and three were Jewish: educator Muriel Rosoff Silberstein; Sol Shaviro, a founder of the Bronx Museum of Arts; and Henry Saltzman, former president of the Pratt Institute in Brooklyn.) [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 114]

Another of the most important New York art sales organizations, still strong today, is the Marlborough Gallery, begun in London in 1948 by two German-Jewish refugees, Frank Lloyd and Harry Fischer. By the 1980s it had branches in New York City, Zurich, Toronto, Rome, Tokyo, Montreal, and Liechtenstein, an “art world multinational corporation.” [KREFETZ, p. 160] The Marlborough Gallery’s reputation hit rock bottom in the 1960s – but survived to prosper – after an ugly series of lawsuits over the estate of painter Mark Rothko (a suicide). The gallery seriously undervalued his remaining work and tried – by fraud and conspiracy – to manipulate and skim them for outrageous profits, ultimately losing the case to Rothko’s heirs in court. Rothko’s daughter Kate also successfully sued the executors of her father’s estate – Morton Levine, Theodore Stamos, and Bernard Reiss (“the most celebrated accountant in the art world as far back as the 1940s.” [MYERS, J, p. 236] “The only thing that blocks them [the Jewish mafia] from complete control of the art world,” Marlborough’s Jewish president, Frank Lloyd, proclaimed, “is Marlborough. We’re independent. We are the biggest handicap to that clique.” [KRAFETZ, p. 161] On another occasion he admitted that “I collect money, not art … There is only one measure of success in running a gallery: making money.” [SMITH, R., 4-8-98]

Lawsuits and counter suits are common between artists and their galleries. “The artist sees the dealer as a leech,” observes Sophy Burnham. [BURNHAM, p. 94] Artist William de Kooning sued dealer Sidney Janis, the Marlborough Gallery initiated legal action against Naum Gabo.

Other recent prominent Jewish art dealers include Laurence Rubin, Irving Bloom, Ronald Feldman, Holly Solomon, Ileana Sonnabend (former wife of Leo Castelli), and many others. In 1998 a London newspaper called Jewish dealer Bernard Jacobson “possibly the leading dealer of modern British art.” [COOPER, p. 50] British dealer and art patron Jonathan Silver “established an art gallery for his friend [ultimately art superstar] David Hockney.” [DAILY TELEGRAPH, p. 31] Otto Kallir “dealt in expressionist painters … [He also] became the representative of Grandma Moses and even edited her autobiography.” [HEILBUT, p. 218] Andy Warhol’s world of Jewish art moguls included Ivan Karp, Irving Blum, and Robert Scull. Henry Geldzahler, a homosexual and curator of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, was “Andy’s painting mentor …. Although they were never lovers, the relationship became intimate. Andy spoke to Henry on the phone every night before he went to sleep and every morning as soon as he woke up.” [BOCKRIS, V., 1989, p. 158, 101]

In 1980, Warhol produced a limited series of pictures entitled “Jewish Geniuses,” featuring portraits of Gertrude Stein, Franz Kafka, Sarah Bernhardt, the Marx Brothers, theologian Martin Buber, Louis Brandeis (the “father” of American Zionism), George Gershwin, Sigmund Freud, Albert Einstein, and former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir. An accompanying exhibition was featured at New York’s Jewish Museum and the Judah Magnes Museum in Berkeley, California. Bluma Goldstein notes the “eagerness of major Jewish museums to mount and advertise the exhibit and to sell expensive portfolios of the exhibit’s serigraphs” and Warhol’s shrewdness in targeting Jewish wealth, prominence in the art world, self-infatuation, and vanity:

“Warhol’s preoccupation with money and status is common knowledge and is reflected in his many prints of dollar signs and paper money … New York Times art critic Hilton Kramer, in a review of the exhibit at the New York Jewish Museum, and David Bourdon, in his book on Warhol, both commented on the artist’s crass opportunism in targeting a specific sector of the public. [Carrie] Rickey calls it ‘the synagogue circuit’ – that is middle-class Jews who could be counted on to be attracted to things Jewish and contemporary culture and who also possessed the means to purchase an expensive portfolio in a 200-count limited edition … Not unlike this sector the public, the Jewish museums were drawn to an array of famous Jewish faces artistically displayed by a major artist popular for the previous two decades … Ronald Feldman, owner of a New York art gallery involved in many successful commercial ventures of Warhol’s career, assisted Warhol in selecting Jewish figures, organized the exhibition at the New York Jewish museum, and issued the print portfolio for sale.” [GOLDSTEIN, B., 2000, p. 128]

In 1993 the New York Times Magazine called Arnold Glimcher “the most successful art dealer in New York. With art collector and Hollywood hot-shot Michael Ovitz as one his best friends, Glimcher could personally merge the New York art scene and the Hollywood movie industry.” With Ovitz’s Hollywood connections, art dealer Glimcher even became a film director. In an overview of his career, the Times noted that he lent “himself a WASP-ish touch in his early days as an art dealer by assigning himself the Nordic-looking name Arne, and now, in Hollywood, [he] adopt[s] the more Jewish Arnie.” [SCHWARTZMAN, p. 32]

As art dealer, Glimcher represent “19 of the world’s most demanding artists, from Donald Judd and George Baselitz to Joel Shapiro [Ovitz’s cousin] and Julian Schnabel.” [SCHWARTZMAN, p. 33] Glimcher also represents Jewish artist Jim Dine, with whom he spent two months in Israel. [BOXER, T., 5-26-01] Glimcher’s gallery employs dozens of people, including eight full time archivists. Gallery director, Renato Danese, is a former head of the Visual Arts Program of the National Endowment for the Arts. “One of the amazing things about my father,” said a Glimcher son who headed his dad’s art catalogue division, “is that in this high-powered world, with all the various things that he’s been successful at, he has this innocence.” [SCHWARTZMAN, p. 44]

“So savage was the [art] business (fake forgeries and ruthless competition in an unregulated economy),” wrote Sophy Burnham in the 1970s, “that the Art Dealers’ Association was formed in the early 1960s to help raise the ethics and reputations of dealers.” [BURNHAM, p. 90] But some things never change. In September 1997 ARTnews reported an ongoing Justice Department “probe into the business practices of art dealers and auction houses.” Subpoenaed galleries

In 1991, the Bernard and S. Dean Levy Gallery in Manhattan was found guilty of collusion and fined $100,000. In 1996, in New Orleans, Federal marshals shut down the Morton M. Goldberg Auction Galleries firm under court order after Morton and David Goldberg were charged with fraud and skimming hundreds of thousands of dollars from a British supplier of art and antiques. [GREG, p. 21] Also in 1996, major Jewish art dealer and best-selling novelist (The Thief of Light, no less) David Ramus was sentenced to 33 months in prison for fraud, bilking art collecting clients out of millions of dollars. “There are no rules [in the art world],” he waxed as he prepared for jail, “only bloated songs of money and ego. It’s a treasure hunt for grown-ups. And it’s like dope; nothing – no profit, no fortune – is ever enough.” [LAURENCE, p. 21]

In 1999, a Los Angeles Police Department media press release noted

“A museum art thief was convicted of thefts of fine art from two Los Angeles museums. Nureet Granott, 50, used a fake driver’s license, a fraudulent credit card, and fictitious rental agreement information to garner control of over $22,000 of art through the art rental galleries of the UCLA/Armand Hammer Museum of Art and the L.A. County Museum of Art in 1995 … [Others were fleeced] for an estimated $100,000 in goods and services – from a luxury car to pet bills. During the museum thefts, Granott assumed the identity of her sister, Hanit Peretz, who is living in Israel. During many of the transactions, Granott was accompanied by her husband, David Yehuda Cohen. Both are also suspected of being involved in questionable real estate transactions.” [LOS ANGELES POLICE, 8-16-99]

In 2001, the New York state attorney general filed an injunction against the Antique and Design Center (owned by Jill and Dave Schuster) for selling fraudulent art work over the Internet on e-Bay. It was “the first case of fraud brought by the State against an online art retailer.” [ART NEWSPAPER, 5-30-01] The same year, in Boston, art dealers Shirley Sack and Arnold Katzen were “charged with conspiring to launder $4.1 million in drug money.” They were arrested “as they attempted to sell paintings, which they claimed were originals by Modigliani and Degas, to a federal agent posing as a drug dealer … Ms. Sack had been attempting to sell a painting by Raphael and was prepared to accept payment in drug money or from organized crime figures.” [MUSEUM SECURITY, 6-3-01]

Also in 2001, Michel Cohen, originally from France, hit the news with his own spectacular art fraud:

“Many are calling it the biggest art fraud ever. When all the figures are in, art dealer Michel Cohen will have taken the art world for at least $50 million … [Art dealing] is a jealous and wary system, where each player guards sources and clients, but it is built on an essential trust. This is the system that has made the art market the largest unregulated money market in the world – a market that Michel Cohen was in a position to loot.” [HADEN-GUEST, A., 2-6-01] … Whether for purpose of convenience, privacy or to avoid paying taxes or the authorities, great sums of money are loaned all the time to purchase art. An inhabitant of the art world’s periphery, Cohen knew this … The art world’s secrecy worked to Cohen’s advantage. Dealers seldom want their peers to know what they are doing.” [HADEN-GUEST, A., 2-12-01]

Always within the art world matrix of incestuous connection and often corruption, the artist has usually championed a rarefied “humanities”-based world perspective that is usually antithetical to the daily economic morass in which he or she is mired. Burnham notes that

“[The artist] appears … at a museum opening or gallery party, for it is politic to circulate in the art crowd. He mingles with the black-tie patrons of the arts and acts his own iconoclast part … all the while hating what he is doing: the terrible dancing with a prospective patron, the posing, while at the back of his mind lurks this terrible doubt about the place of art in society.” [BURNHAM, p. 8]

“The artist who would be known,” wrote the great folklorist Joseph Campbell, “has to go to cocktail parties to win commissions, and those who win them are the ones who are not in their studios but at parties, meeting the right people and appearing in the right places.” [CAMPBELL, p. 49] “Much time,” wrote Jewish artist Julian Schnabel, “is spent nurturing liaisons with creatures of the art world mechanism. At first, there is no time for friendship. Later, there is no capacity for it.” [CAPLIN, L., 1989, p. 168]

For some artists, total cooption and immersion into the most trivial and superficial of values has occurred. “Striking instances of this culture-industry phenomenon,” wrote Anne Bowler and Blaine McBurney in 1993, “may be seen in the cases of painter Kenny Sharf [Jewish and gay] and writer Tama Janowitz [not Jewish]. In both instances, national and sometimes international publicity was directed at these artists in a manner that illustrates the distanced values of the culture industry. In the case of Sharf … a feature-length cover story in the September 1985 issue of ArtNews [Jewish owned and edited] is representative of the culture industry ‘plugging’ and labeling process that produce the art world ‘star system.’ … The ArtNews piece actually spends a great deal of time discussing everything but Sharf’s artwork. Instead, we are treated to a journalistic tableau of downtown parties, clubs, and ‘personalities.’” [BOWLER, p. 172-173]

In Paris, from about 1920 to 1940, Jewish painters “were almost a school unto themselves,” including Chaim Soutine, Jules Pascin, and Marc Chagall. [KREFETZ, p. 143] Other Jewish painters included Pissaro, Amedo Modigliani, and Szyk. Jewish socio-political artists in America in the 1920s and 1930s included Ben Shahn, Moses Soyer, Chaim Gross, Jack Levine, Morris Kanter, Raphael Soyer, Saul Steinberg, Max Weber, and Abraham Walkowitz. A partial list of other prominent Jewish American artists includes Mark Rothko (Marcus Rothkowitz), Julian Schnabel, Barnett Newman, Joel Shapiro, Roy Lichtenstein, Louise Nevelson, Sam Francis, Judy Chicago (Cohen), Helen Frankenthaler, Jules Olitski, George Segal, Ad Reinhardt, Morris Louis, Adolph Gottlieb, Larry Rivers (Yitzroch Loiza Grossberg), Jim Dine (the Friends of the Tel Aviv Museum’s “Artist of the Year” in 2001), [BOXER, T., 5-26-01] Eleanor Antin, Allen Katz, Jacques Lipschitz, Sol Le Witt, Dennis Oppenheim, Max Ernst, Milton Avery, Leonard Baskin, Eugene Berman, Leonid Berman, Hyman Bloom, Louis Eilshemius, Philip Guston, Hans Hofmann, Philip Pearlstein, Rachel Rosenthal, Carole Schneeman, Susan Weil, Hannah Wilke, Ross Bleckner, among many others. Peter Max has been among the most popularly commercial. “Some critics,” says Gerald Krefetz, “have suggested that the whole field of modern abstract art is especially Jewish.” [KREFETZ, p. 145]

Even Morris Katz

“is listed in The Guinness Book of Records as ‘the most prolific painter in history,’ with over eighteen paintings painted and sold to date … ‘Paint fast, sell cheap’ is his motto.” [JACOBSON, H., 1995, p. 62, 63]

Celebrated Jewish architects in recent history include Louis Kahn, Richard Meier, Peter Eisenman, Moshe Safdie, Frank Gehry, Richard Gluckman, Malcolm Holzman, James Polshek, Robert Siegel, and Robert Stern. Louis Kahn was the architect for both Yale University’s art museums; Moshe Safdie designed Ottawa’s National Gallery and Montreal’s Museum of Fine Arts. Emery Roth “became one of the most prolific architects of high-rise apartment buildings in Manhattan.” [SCHACHTMAN, p. 101] Eisenman “founded the Institute for Architecture and Urban Studies in New York, the intellectual center of architectural activity in the United States and the place where architects from all over the world come to sniff the breeze.” [ARONSON, S., 1983, p. 303] In 2000, “Daniel Libeskind, whose Jewish Museum Berlin has attracted crowds before its exhibits are even in place, was named architect of the Denver Art Museum’s new [$62.5 million] wing.” [CHANDLER, M., 7-14-2000] “In Germany,” notes Cecil Roth, “in the middle of the [nineteenth] century, the most prominent name in [architecture] is that of George Hitzig, president of the Academy of Art, who designed the Bourse (1859-64) and the Reichsbank (1869-77). Many of the local branches of this institution, in the full fortress-like floridity of the close of the last century, were erected by E. Jacobsthal, while in Austria, a new tradition in theatrical architecture was started by Oscar Strnad.” [ROTH, C., 1940, p. 159]

Even Sigmund Freud’s grandson, Lucien Freud, has had phenomenal success as a British painter, selling “small to medium size” pictures for between $200,000-$1 million apiece; occasional individual sales have topped $2 million. Freud’s first wife was Kitty Epstein, daughter of sculptor Jacob Epstein. [FEAVER, p. 138-139] In 1998 a painting of his daughter Bella sold for $5.83 million, the highest price for a living British artist. A “longtime friend” of Freud is Nathaniel Charles Jacob Rothschild, head of the famous banking firm. Rothschild also heads the National Heritage Monument Trust in Great Britain, an arts agency roughly equivalent to America’s National Endowment for the Arts. (Taking a trip to Australia? Perhaps you might show your art work to Henry Krongeld, the chairman of the National Art Center in Melbourne, and listed in at least one Israeli publication as a committed Zionist).

Even Sigmund Freud himself was afforded art museum attention in 1999 when documents, antiques, and other artifacts from his personal life, including a reproduction of his consultation room, toured the United States, beginning at the Smithsonian museum, and later the Jewish Museum in New York City. [BARUCH, E., 1999, p. 11]

In the late 1990s, millionaire British Jewish advertising king Tony Kaye decided he wanted “to have a bigger impact in the world of communications.” [HILTY, p. 16] So he moved to Hollywood to become a movie director and a gallery artist. Among Kaye’s “art works,” noted the (London) Financial Times, was a project to place a real homeless man “on display at the [British] Tate Gallery with a price tag of 4m. pounds …. [The man] will soon be replaced by … a homeless woman [that] Kaye encountered on Venice Beach [California] and has displayed at the Getty Museum.” [HILTY, p. 16]

“Today,” says Stephen Brook, “… many of the most distinguished [artist] names in Britain are those of Jews … [R.B.] Kitaj … has discovered in middle age an increasing fascination with Judaism … Like many Jews, his rediscovery of Judaism sprang from this study of the Holocaust; he became a mad expert in the whole ‘lugubrious business’ … His obsession with the Holocaust … is adumbrated by the inclusion of a chimney-stack motif with some of his recent work.” [BROOK, p. 329]

Kitaj, who was born in Ohio, coined the term “School of London” to describe the work of himself, Lucien Freud, Frank Auerbach, Leon Kossoff, Michael Andrews, and Francis Bacon. He had a major retrospective exhibition in 1994 that was roundly trashed by critics. Three months later, noted the New York Times, Kitaj’s wife, the painter Sandra Fisher (“who is credited with the largest picture ever made – 300 ft. by 100 ft., for a Heineken advertisement” [BARKER, p. 10], “died unexpectedly of an anevrysm at age 47. And Mr. Kitaj concluded that his critics motivated by anti-Semitism killed her.” [RIDING, p. 13] “I have long since resolved to be a Jew,” once declared Kitaj, “… I regard that as more important than my art.” [STEYN, J., 1999, p. 153] Juliet Steyn notes traditional Jewish self-conception in one of Kitaj’s paintings: “The chimney [in a Kitaj painting] functions as an indictment of Christianity. Hence Jewish identity in Kitajy’s painting is achieved in opposition to Christianity … Innocense and guilt: Jew and Gentile.” [STEYN, J., 1999, p. 168]

The theme of suddenly returning to a lost Jewish identity (and sometimes Judaism) via the decades-old Holocaust is a common one, reflected also in the work of Judy (Cohen) Chicago, a daughter of Marxists and co-founder with Miriam Shapiro of the Feminist Art Program at the California Institute for the Arts. (In New York, Jewish artists Barbara Zucker and Pollie Attie founded the feminist collective gallery “AIR” – Artists in Residence. Zucker “recalls being ambivalent and embarrassed at being Jewish, yet felt guilty for harboring such emotions. In the late 1980s, she began to explore her Jewish identity.” [HYMAN, p. 73] In a like manner, following her son’s bar mitzvah, a rereading of the book of Genesis, and a trip to Israel [feminist artist] Ann Sperry produced her own version of the biblical story of creation.” [HYMAN, p. 73] Particularly important in Judy Chicago’s Jewish retrieval was her viewing of Claude Lanzmann’s Holocaust movie, Shoah. “The next two years,” says the Cleveland Jewish News,

“were spent reading everything she could find about the Holocaust, visiting museums and exhibitions, viewing films and listening to survivor’s tapes … In 1987, Chicago [and her Jewish husband, Donald Woodman] traveled the ‘landscape of the Holocaust,’ a 6,000-mile journey following Hitler’s pathway of destruction through Germany, France, Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the former Soviet Union … While Woodman took pictures, Chicago wrote, writing her impressions and feelings in her ‘Jewish journal.’” [HELLER, F, p. 14]

Eventually this long escapade became a popular art installation: Holocaust Project: From Darkness into Light, Chicago’s “journey of identity as a Jew.” [HELLER, p. 14]

Art world interest in the Holocaust might be measured by ARTnews’ features in recent years on various aspects of the subject, including an article entitled “Picasso at Auschwitz.” “Picasso embraced me,” recalls Pierre Daix, “and said in a low voice: ‘To think that painters once thought they could paint The Massacre of the Innocents.’” [DAIX, p. 197]

Art Spigelman’s Holocaust comic book, Maus, merited an article, as did Gay Block’s photographic portraits of “Rescuers of the Holocaust.” [DRUCKER, p. 114-118] This series of portraits of people who saved Jews from Nazis was also an exhibition at the prestigious Museum of Modern Art. MOMA also “mounted a show on the making of Maus … which … documented Spigelman’s working methods.” [BERMAN, A, p. 63-64] Yet another ARTnews article in 1995 featured the paintings of Peter Malkin, “a former Mossad agent who helped capture [former Nazi] Adolf Eichmann in Argentina.” [CLEMENTS, F., p. xvii]

Another artist, Anselm Kiefer, “one of the most important artists to emerge in post-war Europe,” started out as an art student in 1969 by having “himself photographed in a paramilitary costume, giving Nazi-style salutes in front of monuments, landscapes, and seascapes around Germany.” Thirty years later he was afforded an exhibition at the Museum of Modern Art. “We see railroad tracks anywhere,” he was quoted as saying, “and think about Auschwitz.” [MENDELSOHN, J. 1999, p. 37] 54 of the author’s works “were acquired” in 1995. As two Jewish art critics note about the importance of catering to Jewish concerns in recent art trends, “there are tons of non-Jews – Christian Boltonski, Anselm Kiefer, Christopher Williams, to name a few – who’ve done astonishing work dealing with Jewish culture, persecution [and] the Holocaust.” [AUERBACH/WEISSMAN, 3-21-99, p. 51]
Art world and auction house cynicism for profit knows few limits. “On the very day [in 1979] the Pope preached at Auschwitz,” notes Theodore Ziolkowski, “fifty lots of Nazi memorabilia brought record prices at an auction in New York, including $5,000 for a small diary kept by Heinrich Himmler, Hitler’s mastermind of the ‘Final Solution.’” [ZIOLKOWSKI, p. 685] Adolf Hitler himself was a water color painter and his work today has sold for thousands of dollars. Long before Hitler achieved world wide notoriety as a war monger and mass murderer, notes M. H. Goldberg, “most of the paintings Hitler did sell were bought by Jewish dealers.” [GOLDBERG, M., 1976, p. 37]

As art dealer and memorabilia seller Charles Hamilton notes:

“Contrary to popular belief, Hitler was never a house painter but was, in fact, an artist who actually made a meager living from his watercolors of flowers and buildings and street scenes. Several years ago I had a visit from my good friend, Shea Tennenbaum, a distinguished Hebrew poet, and our conversation fell upon art and artists.

‘A great artist paints from his soul, not from his mind,’ said Shea. ‘It is this flood of deep, inner emotion that makes a great artist.’

‘Don’t you think an artist can counterfeit emotion?’ I asked. And without waiting for a reply, I walked to a file in my gallery and took out a small watercolor of flowers in a vase. ‘What do you think of this?’

Shea studied it. ‘Obviously,’ he said, ‘the artist was a man of great delicacy and profound feelings, a lover of beauty. He has captured the supreme moment in the existence of these flowers and recorded it with taste and skill.’

Shea looked and gasped in horror. The signature was that of Adolf Hitler.

For a moment I feared that Shea might slump to the floor, but he quickly recovered himself and I apologized for the prank.”

After Hitler had twice failed the matriculation test for the Vienna Academy of Arts and Sciences – he had hoped to become an architect – he turned to dabbling in watercolors. His favorite subjects were deserted streets, public buildings, and churches. A friend of Hitler’s, Reihold Hanisch, pretended to be blind so he wouldn’t need a peddler’s license and hawked Hitler’s paintings for him in the bars of Vienna. They sold for a few kronen reach and the two youths split the take, much of which they spent on pastries and whipped cream. At this time Hitler was bearded and wore a derby and a long black coat that gave him a very Semitic appearance. Oddly, most of his regular customers were Jewish, and since Hitler was fond of quoting Jewish proverbs he was often taken for a Jew.” [HAMILTON, C., 1981, p. 182]

Holocaust survivor material also has a price tag. In December 1997, for example, Edith Hahn’s “personal letters documenting her [Holocaust] survival, her love affairs and her escape as a Jew during World War II” went for $169,250 at a Sotheby’s auction. [BROWN, p. 1] Also on the Holocaust theme, in 1995 Rabbi Israel Miller gave the Jewish editor of ARTnews, Milton Esterow, an honorary shofar, “a ram’s horn blown in synagogues before and during Rosh Hoshanah for the magazine’s role in transferring the ownership of thousands of artworks stolen from victims of the Holocaust by the Nazis to the Jewish community of Vienna.” [ARTnews, 10-96, p. 53] In the late 1980s, a commission to do a Holocaust memorial art work for the New York Appellate Courthouse “triggered [in Harriet] Feigenbaum [an] interest in her Jewish roots.” [HYMAN, p. 73]

All this of course reflects latent Jewish “particularist” exploitation of America’s new “cultural pluralism” paradigm. As Paula Hyman and Deborah Dash note:

“During the last decades, the concept of America as a melting pot was gradually replaced by visions of a multicultural society based on ethnic diversity, and the concept of ‘universal’ art reflecting a master-narrative was challenged by the belief in the necessity of pluralistic art forms.” [HYMAN, p. 69]

Perhaps the most obsessive “art work” about the Holocaust, blending aesthetics, mass murder, and a neurotic Jewish identity, is that of a 23-year Jewish California lesbian, Marina Vainshtein, who sports 25 body piercings and a red Mohawk haircut. As one Jewish art critic appreciatively notes, Vainshtein also has “tattoos of graphic Holocaust images over most of her body. On her upper back, the central image represents a train transport carrying Jewish prisoners in striped uniforms towards waiting ovens … It was … in high school [in Los Angeles] that Vainshtein became obsessed with Holocaust literature … Vainshtein’s tatoos include a violin player … surrounded by hanging corpses, anguished faces and Zyklon B, the killing agent in the gas chambers. The screaming faces of prisoners being gassed are tattooed on one breast.” [APEL, p. 12, 14]

Then there are the likes of Rachel Schreiber, a video artist, and teacher at the Heron School division of Indiana University in Indianapolis, whose recent works include a video expression entitled: “Please Kill Me: I’m a Faggot Nigger Jew.” [SCHRIEBER, R., 2000]

For “superstar” Jewish novelist Judith Krantz, it’s not permissible to even mention some historic art movements. Jewish victimology usurps them. She recounts her outrage when, visiting a German art museum, her companion dared to mention the “Dachau school of landscape painting” [Dachau was also the later site of a Nazi concentration camp where Jews were murdered]:

“Suddenly [Krantz’s German companion] exclaimed, ‘Oh, look here at the masterworks of the Dachau School of landscape painting.’ ‘WHAT DID YOU SAY?’ ‘The Dachau School of landscape painting,’ she replied in all innocence, showing me some charming paintings of rural countryside. ‘It was a well-known artistic movement.’ Only then did I realize that Anna laced the faintest idea of history. My mind whirling, I couldn’t decided where to start her education.” [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 304]

Invariably, within the “back to Jewish” roots model, surfaces the ages-old Jewish world view, sanctified in the myths of the Jewish Holocaust, that celebrates “galut/exile.” And the model is this: constant self-hatred in a world other than Jewish, obsession with physical and/or intellectual markers of Distinction, the incessant Persecution Complex, and the notion that Jews – God’s (or no God’s) eternal outsiders – cannot, and should not, successfully assimilate into the rest of modern American society. In 1997, Jewish art critic Donald Kuspit addressed this theme of modern Jewish identity in an article called “Unconsciously, Always an Alien and Self-Alienated: The Problem of Jewish American Artists.” The Jew, says Kuspit

“may symbolize the ultimate alien in Christian society, the common enemy against which all Christians can unite … In the minds of both [secular and religious] Jews the memory – the threat – of genocide remains ever present. For all their differences, the two [kinds of Jews] are inwardly united; they know Christian society regards them as one and the same.” [KUSPIT, p. 30]

In 1999 Juliet Steyn noted a film entitled Jewish Artists in the East End (of New York City) about David Bomberg, Mark Gertler, and Alfred Wollmark where “Richard Cork argues that a common identity existed between them as Jews: alienation in the condition they share.” [STEYN, J., 1999, p. 17]

In 2001, an Arizona newspaper noted one dimension of the Frida Kahlo craze at an exhibition of Mexican art at the Phoenix Art Museum. The show featured the collection of wealthy Mexican Jewish collectors Jacques and Natasha Gelman, “major players in the glamorous Mexico City film scene of the 1940s”:

“Contemporary acquisitions … [of Jacques and Natasha Gelman] have been expertly guided by longtime [Jewish] Gelman friend Robert Littman, ex-director of Mexico City’s now-defunct Centro Cultural/Arte Cultural). As president of the Vergel Foundation, which is responsible for carrying on the Gelman legacy, Littman seems to possess an infallible eye.” [Vanesian, K., 6-701]

The Gelmans became rich in the motion picture business in Mexico. Artist Kahlo, like others, “often paid the rent by doing portraits of wealthy socialites.” One of Kahlo’s portraits of Natasha Gelman “captures the woman, crowned with sausage curls al modo and draped in a fur stole.”“To anyone familiar with Mexican art history,” writes critic Kathleen Vanesian,

“the Gelman exhibition is not a well-balanced overview of Mexican art mid-century … Rather, it’s a classically status-driven, gotta-be-better-than-the-Gomezes compilation reflecting one type of art collector’s psychic preoccupation with memorializing himself and notable public figures with which he has socialized. Frankly, it’s one more befitting a newly moneyed, 18th-century Dutch burgher than a discerning, visionary collector seeking emerging and mid-career artists’ best and most enduring works.” [VANESIAN, K., 6-7-01]

Other intriguing Jewish art angles these days include the New York Jewish Museum (which gave Robert Rauschenberg and Jasper Johns their first important exhibitions) where “a high tech highlight of the galleries devoted to the Israelite period [is] the interpretive Talmud – a video that displays Talmudic passages with inset translations and talking heads.” [ROSENBAUM, p. 102] Elsewhere, “last summer,” noted ARTnews in 1994, “Jane Alexander [a Gentile] was starring on Broadway, playing a Jewish banker in The Sisters Rosensweig. No one, least of all the actress herself, imagined that she’d soon take on what may be her most challenging role yet – leader of the embattled National Endowment for the Arts.” [CEMBELAST, p. 71-72] In Eastern Europe, with the collapse of communism, Jewish-American billionaire George Soros has “introduced artists to new systems of patronage, exhibitions, and competition” with the Soros Center for Contemporary Arts in Prague, one of 20 Soros-established organizations throughout former communist countries. [BERNSTEIN, R]

One of the things the Eastern Europeans can learn is that in the relatively narrow art world circle, “there is a constant movement of people around the jobs of the art world, from college professor to museum director to dealer to magazine editor.” [BURNHAM, p. 125] All such occupations tend to overlap. Nepotism and interconnectedness run rampant. Prominent dealer Ivan Karp, for instance, started out as an art critic for the Village Voice. He later worked for art dealer Leo Castelli before starting his own gallery, O.K. Harris. Castelli’s ex-wife Ileana (Sonnabend) started her own eventually important gallery too. Artist Alexander Lieberman started out as a layout editor at Vogue. His stepdaughter became a contributing editor for Art in America and was married to another artist, Cleve Gray, who showed at the same gallery as Lieberman, and was also a contributing editor to Art in America, as well as a sometimes writer for Vogue. “Those who questioned Liberman’s art,” notes Thomas Meir, “invariably mentioned his status as editorial director at Conde Nast,” the firm owned by billionaire media magnate Si Newhouse, of whom Liberman has been a close friend for thirty years. [MAIER, p. 70] “Poverty is not conducive to good art,” Liberman told the New York Times in a feature about his studio, “and I have always believed in living life to the hilt.” [MAIER, p. 70] Prominent art critic Clement Greenberg was both an associate editor of the Jewish magazine Commentary and art critic for the Nation.

Such “cross-pollinating” may be witnessed in the recent case of Tom L. Freudenheim who, at the same time, has been an executive at the National Endowment for the Arts, Assistant Secretary for the Arts and Humanities at the Smithsonian Museum, and Board Vice-Chairman of the National Foundation for Jewish Culture. Henry Geldzahler was “curator of twentieth century art at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City, program director for the Visual Arts of the NEA, a close friend of many artists, and a friend and follower of [prominent critic Clement] Greenberg.” [BURNHAM, p. 127]

Artist Jim Rosenquist really got his career started when someone “told Alan Stone [about Rosenquist’s work] who told Ileana Sonnenbend, who told Dick Bellamy and Ivan Karp and Henry Geldzahler and Leo Castelli who came down to the studio in that order to see the picture.” [BURNHAM, p. 106] In the case of prominent artist William de Kooning, his wife – Elaine Fried (both Gentiles) – is credited by some for “largely creating and orchestrating the ‘de Kooning myth,’” including having sex with influential art critic Harold Rosenberg and ARTnews editor Thomas Hess [both Jewish]. “When Elaine slept with Hess,” claims an “unnamed elder statesman in the art world,” Bill got publicity in ARTnews. When Elaine had an affair with Harold Rosenberg, he paid Bill off with attention.” [GLUECK, p. 129] She herself eventually wrote art reviews for ARTnews. And the dominant art critic of that era, Clement Greenberg: “Greenberg’s compulsive womanizing … – often inseparable from his promotion of female artists – has long been legendary … In the early 1950s he carried on an affair with artist Helen Frankenthaler.” [LEWIS, MJ, p. 59]

Incestuous collusion, mutual back-scratching, under the table wheeling and dealing, nepotism, and clique allegiance are intrinsic principles of the modern art world. Another case in point was Bill Rubin, chief curator of painting at the Museum of Modern Art in the 1970s. Rubin’s brother was a New York art dealer. In 1970 Rubin set up an exhibition of the work of Frank Stella, a personal friend, and an artist in his brother’s gallery. Rubin even exhibited at MOMA two Stella paintings he owned himself. The show could be expected to automatically raise Stella’s art prices, personally beneficial to both curator Rubin and his brother.

In 1943 Sam Kootz became an adviser to the Museum of Modern Art; the next year he was also a private art dealer, eventually selling works of art by Picasso. When MOMA held a Picasso exhibition in the 1940s, Kootz was holding a simultaneous Picasso exhibition as a private dealer. [BYSTRYN, p. 186]

Dore Ashton, an art critic for the New York Times, was once reprimanded by her editor for choosing to write about art shows that included her own husband, Adja Yunkers. She wrote that

“Of this trio, Adja Yunkers, showing heroic and sultry pastels at the Emmerich Gallery, is the most romantic, stoking the fire of color and shape to degree of thrilling intensity. Yunkers, who uses pastels with verve and assurance, organizes restless compositions in a truly symphonic way, summing up a complex infinite of shapes and color for the majestic ‘scoring’ of these beautiful and impressive pictures.” [BURNHAM, p. 342]

During the mid-1960s, says John Conklin, “the price of favorable attention by a prominent critic Clement Greenberg was the gift of one or two major works. Critics have built up reputations of artists whose work they have personally invested, and then profited from the sale of the art. Art historian Bernard Berenson sometimes overpraised artworks in which he had a financial stake, even vouching for paintings that he knew had undergone significant restorations so as to be made more appealing to buyers. He earned substantial commissions from the sale of paintings by dealer Joseph Duveen, collecting more than $8 million from Duveen in their twenty year partnership … Moreover, Duveen financed much of Berensen’s art criticism, which he then used to justify the prices he charged to wealthy collectors.” [CONKLIN, p. 44]

Critic Clement Greenberg, member of the Jewish mafia “New York Intellectuals,” and probably the most powerful art critic of his era, carried with him a reputation for paybacks for friendly reviews. “No other critic has so openly allied himself to the merchandizing of art,” wrote Sophy Burnham, “…[It is accused that] he turned his influence to personal profit, accepting free paintings, writing and lecturing about contemporary art, and selling the pictures high.” [BURNHAM, p. 149-150] “For three decades,” notes Michael J. Lewis, “art criticism in America was the domain of a rule-giving prophet [Greenberg] … Where his favor came to rest, as it did for a time on the paintings of Jackson Pollack, there followed national celebrity and success.” Other prominent Jewish contemporary art critics “included Meyer Schapiro and Harold Rosenberg. Hilton Kramer arrived on the scene a bit later.” [LEWIS, MJ, 1998] When British/Jewish art critic David Sylvester died in 2001, London’s Daily Telegraph declared him “modern art’s most influential critic.” [DAILY TELEGRAPH, 7-20-01]

“Jewish emigres in flight from the Nazi genocide and Jews of earlier emigrations, such as Meyer Schapiro and Clement Greenberg, for example,” notes Catherine Soussloff,

“had a definitive and formative influence on art and art history in America and England – and by today in the English-speaking world as a whole. The impact of these Jewish art historians, critics, and artists in the interpretation and exhibition of art in America and elsewhere was central for art history.” [SOUSLOFF, C., 2000]

Among his favorites, Greenberg championed “Washington Color School” artists. “By the end of the 1960s,” notes Burnham, “Greenberg’s Color School artists were being shown in four important galleries in New York, Paris, London, and Toronto. They were collected in museums, including the Metropoli- tan, MOMA, and the Smithsonian, and considerable muttering could be heard – not always good-natured – about the Mafia and the Kosher Nostra.” [BURNHAM, p. 107]

“I’ve decided the kind of people attracted to art are often psychopaths,” Greenberg once said, “You can quote me on that. In art and literature both – Do you know the difference between psychopaths and psychoticis? Psychopaths are people with defective consciences. They cannot tell right from wrong.” [BURNHAM, p. 157] For his part, Greenberg is reputed to have walked into artist Barnett Newman’s studio and asked for a painting. “Barney was going to give him something small – a lithograph perhaps,” notes Sophy Burnham, “I don’t want that,’ said Greenberg, ‘I want that big one over there. It’s your best picture.’ And Newman, inwardly raging, capitulated to his own ambitions and handed over the painting. Greenberg takes only the best … If the critic has an undisclosed stake in the artist’s reputation, it is not for the artist to question.” [BURNHAM, p. 131]

Margaret Olin suggests that widespread Jewish early and mid-twentieth century championing of formalist art (art denuded of social, political, cultural, and religious reference) had – until recent years when celebratory Jewish “particularism” has been unleashed – been rooted in their self-interest in downplaying publicly their Jewish identities. Prominent Jewish art critics Clement Greenberg and Harold Rosenberg, for example, were especially prominent in the encouragement of “Abstract Art.” Occasionally, however, latent counter-attitudes to abstract universalism could indiscreetly surface. Greenberg, for example, once remarked that “it is possible that by ‘world-historical’ standards the European Jew represents a higher type of human being than any yet achieved.” [OLIN, p. 51] This Jewish elitism, lingering just behind a universalistic front, was also manifest in critic Bernard Berenson. Despite his own professed “tendency toward universalism and timelessness” and “the same human quality in every individual,” he further proposed to “erect the same qualities into ultimate standards, and to appraise societies as well as individuals by the extent to which they have possessed these qualities.” “Thus [for Berenson],” notes Margaret Olin, “like George Orwell’s Animal Farm, which found some animals more equal than others, he found some societies more universally human than others.” [OLIN, p. 48]

By the 1980s, art critic Peter Halley found some intriguing historical essences in what he calls a Jewish American artist renaissance:

“Art in the 80’s has been consistently labeled as ostentatious, garish, extravagant, garish, extravagant, vulgar, and over-scaled. These are the epithets of the parvenu or nouveau riche. However, they are also terms that, in earlier decades, were used to characterize Jewish-American taste and style. I want to be very clear that I am not making any claim that anti-Semitism has entered the critical debate. I would suggest instead that the commentators who have thus defined the 1980s have been blind to the meanings that this aesthetic of extravagance may have for Jewish artists of the 80s.” [HALLEY, p. 28]

Halley might have been thinking, among many other candidates, about the Metropolitan Museum of Art’s Jewish curator of contemporary art, as did Lee Seldes, in 1979:

“Trendy Henry Geldzahler [is] the curator of the newly created, hotly debated contemporary arts department. His recent exhibition “New York Painting and Sculpture, 1940-1970,” had set a record for swish ostentation but engaged serious artists and scholars.” [SELDES, p. 5]

“Historically,” notes James Twitchell, “the modern museum has been the site of pitched battles for control, for social territory, for what modern criticism calls privileging.” [TWITCHELL, p. 214] Steadily, in recent decades, traditional wealthy White-Anglo-Saxon-Protestant control of major art institutions has been replaced by Jewish art philanthropy and their own attendant influence and control in shaping – or reshaping – the standards of value and aesthetics in the art world. “Jews significantly support ‘high culture’ in America,” notes Barry Kossim, “Their support of hospitals, museums, symphonies, and universities across the country now appear disproportionate not only to their numbers but also their proportion of the wealthy.” [KOSSIM, p. 26]

Jews have long been prominent in the institutionalized art world, as both formal, public directors and powerful behind-the-scenes “philanthropists”. George Blumental, for example, headed (1933-1941) New York’s influential Metropolitan Museum, as did Thomas Hoving (son of the chairman of Tiffany and Co.) beginning in 1967. Irene and Alice Lewisohn’s Museum of Costume Art merged with the Met in 1946. Michael Friedsam, Jules Bache, and Samuel Lewisohn were other prominent Met philanthropists in that era. “When Henry Geldzahler [the eventual director of the visual arts program of the National Endowment for the Humanities, and the New York City Commissioner on Cultural Affairs] … was brought to the Met as a junior curator of American art, James Rorimer [another Jewish Met director] advised him not to let the trustees know he was Jewish.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 71] “Following the precedents set by Geldzahler,” adds Goodman, “two Jews have since held the prized curatorship of modern art at the Metropolitan. The first was Thomas Hess, well known as an art critic and collector. He was the son-in-law of Edith Stern, a major patron of the New Orleans Art Museum, and daughter of Julius Rosenwald. Stern’s sister, Adele Levy, was a trustee of the Museum of Modern Art.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 72]

In 1969 Robert Lehman, a Vice-President, then the Chairman of the Board, and a Trustee of the Metropolitan Museum of Art for twenty years, willed to it his $100 million collection of Old Master paintings. “Bobby Lehman,” noted a friend after his death, “wanted his pyramid; with plate glass before the art works. See, Bobby, knew about Macys [Department Store]: the entrance is small, but the display windows are large … when you go to Macys, the pots and pans are in the basement and the Lanvin perfume is at the entrance. Art today is a kind of cultural cosmetic.” [BURNHAM, p. 173] By the mid-1980s one-fifth of the Museum’s Board of Trustees were Jewish, including former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, then CBS-chairman Laurence Tisch, and Mrs. Walter Annenberg. [CHRISTOPHER, p. 217] Wealthy Metropolitan Museum philanthropist Saul Steinberg even held his wedding reception at the museum, as did a member of the wealthy Tisch family. [CANTOR, p. 403]

In 1980, Frederic P. Rose, a real estate developer and former President of the New York United Jewish Appeal-Federation, was appointed to the Board of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. (“There’s more yikus [prestige] in being on the Met Board than in being on our own,” said a UJA-Federation official, “and a lot more clout.” [SILBERMAN, p. 215] Soon after, a friend and fellow Jewish real estate mogul, Harold D. Uris, donated $10 million to the Museum. “As a result,” says Charles Silberman, “the museum decided on a new focus for its fundraising drives. ‘Met Museum Aiming to Tap Real Estate Industry,’ a New York Times

In 1991 communications mogul Walter Annenberg willed his whole art collection – “one of the most valuable and highly sought-after in history” – to New York’s Metropolitan Museum. He also pledged a $10 million gift over a five year period to the Los Angeles County Museum of Art. [MOMENT, p. 196] (Annenberg’s wife, Lenore, had been “chief of protocol” for the Reagan administration’s State Department. Renee Crown, wife of the Lester Crown who has controlled the General Dynamics weapons corporation, has served as the chair of the Women’s Board of the Lyric Opera of Chicago. [BAER, p. 210] By the early 1990s, other Jewish mass media barons like S. I. Newhouse of Advance, and Hollywood powerbroker Michael Ovitz, were on the board of trustees of the Met. “On one occasion in the 1990s,” notes Robert Slater, “[Ovitz] scoured [his 2,000 art] books in search of a suitable background for the advertisement that [his company Creative Artists Agency] produced for Coca-Cola. One advertisement, with Coca-Cola bottles falling out of the sky, was meant to be reminiscent of a René Magritte painting.” [SLATER, p. 161]

At the Met, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger (former publisher of the New York Times) eventually became its chairman. He oversaw an institution in which Jews, says George Goodman, “have enriched almost area of the Museum’s collections, including pre-Colombian ceramics (Nathan Cummings), African art (Klaus Perls), ancient Mediterranean and Middle Easter Art (Norbert Schimmel), Old Masters Paintings (Lore and Rudolph Heinemann), French decoration arts (Belle and Sol Linsky) modern European Art (Florence May Schoenborn), modern American art (Muriel Kallis Steinberg Newman; Edith and Milton Lowenthal), Indonesian bronzes (Samuel Eilenberg), and South and Southeast Asian Art (Enid Haupt and Lita Hazen, Walter Annenberg’s sisters).” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 73] Throughout the Met too, galleries, rooms, theatres, and gardens are named after Jewish sponsors including Iris and B. Gerald Cantor, Helene and Michael David-Weill, Lawrence and Barbara Fleishman, Howard Gilman, Leon Levy, Henry R. Kravis, Janice H. Levin, Carroll and Milton Petrie, Arthur, Mortimer, and Raymond Sacker, Laurence Tisch, and Ruth and Harold Uris. (Among the various Jewish curators at the Museum is Barbara Weinberg, head of American Paintings and Sculpture).

By the 1990s, across town, both vice-presidents of New York’s equally prestigious Museum of Modern Art were also Jewish – Ronald S. Lauder and Richard Salomon. (In 2001, another Jewish member of MOMA’s board, media mogul Si Newhouse, resigned after breaking MOMA’s ethical policy when he maneuvered to purchase a Picasso painting that was owned by the museum). [D’ARCY, D., 6-5-01] In 1995 Lauder – cosmetic heir and Eastern European media mogul – became chairman of the board; in 1997 he spent $50 million on a Cézanne painting for his private collection. (In 1988, after a stint as a Reagan-appointed ambassador to Austria, he was the subject of an Austrian parliamentary investigation for his purchase and export from that country 120 art works worth more than $10 million. Lauder decried the investigation, saying that the “investigation is a politically motivated attempt to discredit him for expressing his views on anti-Semitism in Austria.” [PROTZMAN, p. 42] Aside from being a major donator to the right-wing Israeli government of Benjamin Netanyahu, and gobbling up a major share of the mass media system in Eastern Europe, this is the kind of man that today heads one of the most important museums in America:

“[Lauder] did a stint at the Pentagon beginning in 1983 and was an ambassador to Austria from 1986 to 1987, a job for which he was widely lambasted as being ineffectual. (ABC’s Ted Koppel once asked him to comment on reports he was considered ‘a laughingstock’ there, to which he tersely replied, ‘Thank you.’) – Wall Street Journal, [JERESKI, p. A10]

After spending $14 million to buy his way into the position of New York City’s mayor (and failing) in 1989, Richard Reeves wrote an Atlanta Journal Constitution editorial, saying:

“To me, Mr. Lauder stands as an advertisement for confiscatory inheritance taxes and another indictment of American campaign financing. His major claim to credibility – other than a declared net worth of $227 million – is a stint as the U.S. ambassador to Austria. He got that after raising money for Ronald Reagan.” [REEVES, p. A15]

In 1994, Ronald Lauder’s brother, Leonard, was named chairman of another New York City cultural monument, the prestigious Whitney Museum of American Art. (David Ross director of that museum since 1991, became head of the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art in 1998. Adam Weinberg is the Whitney’s Curator of Permanent Collections.) In the early 1990s the Museum of Modern Art wanted to buy the building next door, the Dorset Hotel. The key to its successful acquisition was MOCA (another Jewish) board member Jerry Speyer who “had known the owner, Sol Goldman, for years, and he know Goldman’s children, who inherited the building on their father’s death.” [TRAUB, p. 67]

Also in New York, the prominent Jewish Guggenheim family founded the Guggenheim Museum (1998 president: Jewish corporate raider Ronald Perelman), as well as the prestigious humanities foundation that bears their name. By the 1980s, four of the ten board members that dole out the MacArthur Foundation “genius awards” were also Jewish; two Jews also sat on the board of the Russell Sage Foundation. [CHRISTOPHER, p. 121] The Kaplan Fund has also had an important impact on the art community in divvying out awards. One of J. M. Kaplan’s daughters was married to a prominent artist, another was the Chairman of the New York State Arts Council. [KREFETZ, p. 153]

Jewish dominance in 1990s New York also continues with Ellen Futter (President of the American Museum of Natural History), Betsy Gotbaum (Di-

Up the Hudson Valley, a bit out of Manhattan, in smaller communities, the New York Times noted in 1997 that

Two Wall Street Journal reporters noted a “private party” held at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in the 1980s:

“Outside the Metropolitan Museum that blustery September evening, there was all the anticipation of a Hollywood opening. Through a phalanx of photographers and reporters the cream of New York society hustled outside, the ladies clutching their hair against the wind, the men dapper in tuxedos, flashing invitations by one account ‘as stiff as sheet-rock.’ In went the Saul Steinbergs, Carol and Punch Sulzberger of the New York Times, Jonathan and Laura Tisch, and a hundred others. Few even in this social stratum had the connections to throw a private party at the museum, but greeting their guests inside the wrought-iron gates of its Medieval Court was a couple who had muscled their way in with a $10 million donation: Henry Kravis and his stunning, fashion-designer wife, Carolyne Roehm.” [BURROUGH/HELYAR, p. 128] [All the men mentioned are Jewish]

At New York University, the art department is called the “Tisch School of the Arts.” The philanthropist it is named after, Laurence Tisch, “does not hide his affection for Israel, even when it costs him money. Thus, for example, when Israeli ministers stay at the Regency Hotel [in New York], owned by the Tisch-controlled Loews Corporation, they receive a significant discount.” [HANDWERKER]

Going to Carnegie Hall? You’ll probably be sitting in the recital hall named after Sanford I. Weill, the Jewish chairman and co-chief of Citigroup. Weill gave a large sum of money to them music center in 1983. He is also the current Chairman of the Board of Carnegie Hall. [NEW YORK TIMES, Weill, p. 10]

In Los Angeles, the most important mover behind the creation of the Los Angeles County Museum of Art was a Jewish industrialist, Norton Simon (among his economic holdings is Hunt Foods). Three separate museum buildings were constructed, two of the three named after a Jewish benefactor: Howard Abrahamson, Armand Hammer, and Leo Bing (funded by his wife Anna in his memory). The first chairman of the LACMA board of trustees was also Jewish, Sidney Brody. Eli Broad, another eventual chairman, was once listed by ArtNews to be (with his wife) the most important art collector in the world. (He is the chairman and CEO of SunAmerica). Erica Feinblatt was the curator of prints and drawings; Maurice Tuchman became the curator of modern art. An assistant to Tuchman was Stephanie Barron. “As a Jew,” notes George Goodman, “she was also attracted to avant-garde works considered ‘degenerate’ by the Nazis.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 135] In 1984, Barron married a LACMA (Jewish) trustee, Robert Gore Rifkind.

Early Jewish donors of important art or large sums of money to LACMA included Joan Palevsky (who purchased for the museum the 650 objects in the Heermaneck Collection of Islamic Art), B. Gerald and Iris Canter (owners of the largest collection of Rodin sculptures in the world; New York’s Metropolitan Museum has four galleries named after these philanthropists), Philip Berg, Hans Cohn, and Arthur Gilbert, among others. In 1997 Bernard Lewin, a furniture store owner, later art dealer, and “one of the world’s preeminent collectors of modern Mexican artists,” [JOHNSON, R., p. N1] willed his $25 million Mexican art collection to LACMA upon his death. The Los Angeles Times noted an exhibition of Lewin’s collection at a public gallery three years earlier, curated by a Jewish academic in Latin American studies, Shifra Goldman:

“When a museum show consists entirely of works that are for sale at one commercial gallery [as this one is] …. disappointment gives way to disgust … When Lewin … decided to limit the scope of this show to the stuff he’d like to sell, the die was cast … [Nothing] can redeem such a colossal commercial-cum-vanity showcase.” [CURTIS, p. F1]

In 1974 Richard Sherwood (a member of the local American Jewish Committee) became the LACMA president. Further Jewish donators to the museum included David Lowe, Armand Deutsch, Michael and Dorothy Blankfort, Nathan Smooke, Philip and Beatrice Gersh, Stanley and Ellise Gringstein, Max and Ellen Palevsky, Robert Halff, Betty Asher (“formerly an assistant to Maurice Tuchman,” now an art dealer), Felix and Helen Juda, Frederic and Marcia Weisman (sister of Norton Simon), Lucille Ellis (Norton Simon’s first wife), Bernard Levin (a dealer), and Douglas Cramer (a television mogul).

In later years, Micheal Shapiro, a curator at the St. Louis Art Museum was chosen to head LACMA. “It would have been newsworthy for the County Museum to hire a woman, an African-American, an Asian, or a Hispanic, “says Jewish commentator George Goodman, “but few points would be scored [publicly] for hiring a Jewish director [this was, after all, the norm]. Nevertheless, the board members turned to Michael Shapiro. Shapiro’s selection must have been intended to impress Jewish donors of the museum.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 135]

When Shapiro left, he was replaced by Andrea Rich in 1995. Rich had formally been the Executive Vice Chancellor of UCLA. As Goodman noted it in his article in Modern Judaism about what he calls the “Jewish Art Elite”:

“For its first [combined] president and chief executive officer, LACMA’s trustees made a startling decision, hiring Andrea Rich … A specialist in communications and planning, she had never worked for an arts organization and was not even a dues-paying member of the museum. Ms. Rich is Jewish, however.” [GOODMAN, p. 136]
In 1999, Rich also raised eyebrows by becoming – along with her other administrative posts – the director of the museum.

Elsewhere in southern California, other Jews were active in a virtual lock on important directorships in the art world. Aby Sher hired architect Frank Gehry (a fellow Jew) to build the Santa Monica Museum of Art. Edith Wylie even established the Craft and Folk Art Museum across from LACMA. In 1979 a number of prominent Jewish collectors including Marcia Weissman (who also donated $3 million to the now-called Weissman Art Museum at the University of Minnesota, as well as other funds to Minneapolis Walker Art Center) Eli Broad, Philip and Beatrice Gersh, Lenore Greenberg, Frederick Nichols, and Max Palevsky broke off from the Los Angeles County Museum of Art to form the Museum of Contemporary Art (MOCA). Today’s president of MOCA [1998] is, of course, Jewish: Audrey Irmas. “Although [Director Richard] Koshalek deserves much of the credit for MOCA’s success,” says George Goodman, “he has several talented associates, among whom were the Jews Sherri Geldin, an administrator, and Paul Schimmel, previously a curator at southern California’s Newport Harbor Art Museum.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 139] Note-worthy Jewish philanthropy to MOCA includes that of Barry Lowen, Marcia Weissman, and Taft and Rita Schreiber.

David Leventhal (of the Los Angeles Times) also serves as the current Chairman of the Board of Trustees for the Museum of Contemporary Art (MOCA). In 1996 MOCA’s “Temporary Contemporary” branch was renamed the “Geffen Contemporary” after a $5 million donation from media mogul David Geffen. Earlier, another $5 million gift had changed the Westwood Playhouse theatre near UCLA to the “Geffen Playhouse.” The head of the Geffen Playhouse, Gilbert Cates, is also Jewish. He also “produces the Academy Awards programs and [he] put together the local Israel 50th anniversary celebration.” [TUGEND, 10-22-99]

“Most people, I’d say 90% of donors want recognition of some sort,” remarked Eli Broad, trustee of both the Los Angeles County Museum of Art and the Museum of Contemporary Art, which has its own “Eli and Edythe Broad Reception Hall.” [MUCHNIC, S, p. F1, 5] “For better or for worse,” says Jewish critic George Goodman, “the museum world is full of – and to a large degree formed by – prima donnas. Collectors such as [early Jewish philanthropists] Blumenthal and Lehman wanted wings and galleries bearing their names. In recent years, however, a growing number of Jewish collectors have let their egos run wild.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 147]

Rich Jewish businessmen with enormous art hoards have also created major museums and named them after themselves in Los Angeles to house their collections: the Norton Simon Museum (the Simon’s board of trustees “was led by Jennifer Jones, his second wife, and other relatives”) [GOODMAN, #2, p. 147] and the Armand Hammer Cultural Center, respectively. “The boondoggle of the Hammer Cultural Center – within a lifetime of Armand Hammer’s fraud and deception,” notes George Goodman, “is … documented in Edward Epstein’s biography of Hammer.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 141] [See also Carl Blu-
“was one of the great frauds of the 20th century … The sordid details of his astonishing life [are those of] myth, fakery, and deceit …. [He was] a ruthless charlatan who bullied and betrayed his way to an imposing reputation as billionaire patron of the arts with a long list of powerful friends … [Epstein] also details the brazen forgery that helped build Hammer’s extensive art collection. One benefit of the tycoon’s Russian connection was an official Faberge stamp, given to him in Moscow, which he used to authenticate fake Imperial jeweled eggs.” [ALLEN-MILLS]

Hammer set up the L’Hermitage Gallery, selling Russian art, in New York City in 1925. Years later he later purchased 75% interest in M. Knoedler and Company, “America’s oldest art gallery.” His partner in the business was also Jewish, Maury Leibovitz. [EPSTEIN, 1996, p. 126, 293] In later years, a freelance writer, Martha Kaufman, became Hammer’s mistress. Wearing wigs to hinder recognition by Hammer’s wife, she also became the curator of Hammer’s art collection and eventually the Director of the Armand Hammer Museum of Art and Cultural Center. [EPSTEIN, photo section]

After Hammer’s death, various family members filed lawsuits against each other for parts of the patriarch’s art collection. Others came to court too: “Occidental Petroleum [Hammer’s company] stockholders were outraged at the squandering of company assets [for Hammer’s personal art collection] which they claimed totaled $95 million.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 141] Hammer also, notes Elliot Horowitz, “identified himself … falsely as a Unitarian Protestant throughout most of his life, even after becoming the CEO of Occidental Petroleum … Later he became a great friend of the state of Israel.” [HOROWITZ, E., Too, p. 196] He was once received the Golda Meir “Man of the Year Award” at an Israeli Bonds banquet. [BLUMAY, C., 1992, p. 416] (In 1987 he even flew Soviet Jewish dissident/refusenik Ida Nudel on his personal jet to Israel.) [NUDEL, I., 1990, p. 301-302]

Hammer also has a wing named after him and his wife at the Los Angeles County Art Museum. [BLUMAY, C., 1992, p. 436] At his own museum, the chiseling of his name in marble alone cost $75,000, the “Armand Hammer Fireplace” cost $25,000, and the marble floors cost $1 million. [BLUMAY, C., 1992, p. 454] In downtown Los Angeles, the Mark Taper Forum in the Los Angeles Music Center is named for wealthy Jewish patron S. Mark Taper. (Gordon Davidson, the current artistic director of the Taper/Ahmanson Theatre, is also Jewish). A few miles north, the Pepperdine University Art Museum in Malibu was renamed the Frederick R. Weissman Museum of Art in 1992 after his gift of $1.5 million. (The University of Minnesota also has an art museum named after Weissman; the San Diego Museum of Art and the New Orleans Museum of Art also contain “gallery complexes” that bear his name). Another southern California Jewish philanthropist, Mandell Weiss, was the main patron behind San Diego’s Mandel Weiss Forum. With city public arts cutbacks, in 1993 Leah Goodwin lost her executive director job at San Diego’s Public Arts Advisory Council. [TUREGANO, P., 9-30-93, p. E12] Also in San Diego, Mathew Strauss and his wife Iris organized Art Pac, a lobbying group for government funding to the arts. [TUREGANO, P. 2-13-95, p. D1] Phyllis Epstein, former chairman of the San Diego Center for Jewish Culture, was appointed to be a member of the California Council for the Arts in 1999. [JONES, W., 12-14-99, p. E14] State senator Adam Schiff, also Jewish, is chairman of California’s Joint Committee on the Arts. [CITY NEWS SERVICE, 1-6-98]

In 1999 Glorya Kaufman donated $18 million to renovate UCLA’s old Dance Building, now to be called Glorya Kaufman Hall. It was the largest arts-oriented donation in University of California history. Among those proclaiming public thanks was Daniel Neuman, Dean of UCLA’s Art and Architecture School. (In earlier years, MCA’s mafia-linked Hollywood mogul Jules Stein also founded UCLA’s giant ostentatious medical wing, the Jules Stein Eye Institute). In 2000, Jewish businessman Eli Broad topped Kaufman, donating $20 million to UCLA’s art department. The Dickson Art Center was to be renamed the Eli Broad Center.

After donating an undisclosed sum to the Orange County Performing Arts Center in metropolitan Los Angeles, Henry Samueli became a member of its Board of Directors. Samueli and his wife also gave $50 million to the UCLA and University of California at Irvine Engineering departments. “In exchange for the gifts,” noted the Los Angeles Times in 1999, “the highly ranked UCLA School of Engineering and Applied Sciences and UCI’s School of Engineering will bear Samueli’s name.” [CONWAY, A., 4-13-99, p. E1] Earlier, in 1987, another Jewish mogul, Harvey Stearn resigned as the Orange County Performing Arts Chairman of the Board; he remained chairman of the California Arts Council. That same year Leonard Shaine, “philanthropist long active in community and Jewish causes,” was added to Orange County art center’s Board. [JALAN, A., 8-21-87, p. 1] Jewish real estate mogul Walter Shorenstein “founded the Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics, and Public Policy at Harvard’s Kennedy School of Government.” [MOTHER JONES, 3-5-01]

From Texas in 1998, prominent Dallas art collector and real estate mogul Raymond Nasher donated $7.5 million to his alma mater, Duke University. The Duke University Art Museum would be moved to a new building, to be known as the Nasher Museum of Art. [DUKE, 11-98] In Austin, Texas, Mort and Angela Topfer “have pledged millions to the Austin Museum of Art, the Dell Jewish Community Center Campus and other charitable projects.” [BARNES, M., 6-17-99, p. B1] Likewise, Jewish real estate developer John Price donated $7 million to the Museum of Fine Arts at his alma mater, the University of Utah (Price’s JP Realty offices hold “one of the largest collections of Depression era lithographs in the country.”) [KNUDSON, M., 3-23-97] In Omaha, Nebraska, Mort Richards was once president of Performing Arts Omaha. He also served as the top official for other local organizations, including the Downtown Rotary Club. “In 1978, he received the State of Israel’s’ 30th anniversary award.” [1-14-2000, p. 1]

Even the renowned Getty Museum, founded with funds from the non-Jewish oil mogul, J. Paul Getty (and with $4 billion to play with, the richest museum on earth) has consistently had Jews at the economic helm. In 1998, after 17 years, Harold Williams left the presidency of the J. Paul Getty Trust. Williams, notes George Goodman, was “raised in a Labor Zionist home in East Los Angeles.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 142] Williams had earlier retired as Norton Simon Inc.’s chairman of the board at age 42. He later served as the Dean of UCLA’s Graduate School of Business and Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission in the President Carter administration.

The new president of the J. Paul Getty Trust is another Jewish administrator, Barry Munitz, formerly the chancellor of both the California State University system and the University of Houston. Munitz’s “current project,” says Goodman, “is the renovation and expansion of the [Getty branch] in Malibu, which will open in 2001 … The collections donated by Lawrence and Barbara Fleishman will be one of the highlights.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 144] The new Getty Center opened in 1998, designed by Jewish architect Richard Meier and built at a cost of $1 billion. Earlier, George Goldner had “launched the Getty’s drawing collection.” He later became the Getty curator of paintings and the curator of prints and drawings at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. He was succeeded at the Getty by David Jaffe, a Jew born in England, and formerly of the National Gallery of Australia. (Even the president and CEO of the Getty Petroleum Corporation is Jewish, Leo Liebowitz; in 1993 he was charged by journalist Robert Friedman with being in cahoots in a tax cheating scam with a chief in the “Russian Mafia.” [NATIONAL PETROLEUM, p. 20])

“In Baltimore, Miami, Atlanta, and a host of other cities,” says Charles Silberman, “cultural institutions are increasingly dependent on Jewish support.” [SILBERMAN, p. 214-215] In Miami, for example, Jews were the “creators of the New World Symphony and the Miami City Ballet.” [HURIASH, L., 2-15-99, p. B3] Joseph Meyeroff donated $10 million to the Baltimore Symphony hall, half its cost. [CHRISTOPHER, p. 214] Also in Baltimore, Robert Bergman became the director of the prominent Walters Art Museum in 1981. In his first decade he oversaw a $6 million museum renovation. Half a dozen wealthy Jews “have been among the Walters’ most generous donors.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 123] “Some eyebrows,” says Jewish author George Goodman,

“may have been raised at the awareness of Baltimore’s Jewish ‘Art Mafia.’ At the time, Arnold Lehman was director of the Baltimore Museum of Art, Sergio Commissiona was music director of the Baltimore Symphony (in Meyerhoff Hall), and Frederick Lazarus IV, an arts administrator, was president of the Maryland Institute College of Art. Also, Herbert Kessler, a medievalist …, chaired the well-regarded art history department at John Hopkins [University].” [GOODMAN, #1, p. 123]

By 1993, Director Bergman, by now the president of the Association of Art Museum Directors, became director of the Cleveland Museum of Fine Arts. Bergman was replaced at the Walters Museum by another Jewish administrator, Gary Vikan.
Across town, at the Baltimore Museum of Art, Florence Levy was the museum’s first director; Gertrude Rosenthal was for decades the chief curator. Goodman notes that:

“When he was appointed the [Baltimore Museum of Art] director in 1971, at thirty-five years of age, Tom L. Freudenheim became one of the nation’s most visible Jewish museum professionals. Though secure in his identity as a Reform Jew and a Zionist, he did not seek recognition as a trailblazer. Indeed, he was somewhat puzzled as to why the Museum’s Board sought a Jewish director, especially one with such obvious Jewish credentials. [GOODMAN, #2, p.129]

Perhaps Freudenheim needed only to look at the Museum’s treasury for a solution to this puzzle. Prominent Jewish donors to his Baltimore museum included Helen and Abraham Eisenberg, Jacob Epstein, Julius Levy, Alan and Janet Wurtzberg, Robert and Ryda Levi, and Sadie May. The Museum’s Etta Claribel Cone collection included over 3,000 pieces of art, including paintings by Renoir, Matisse, Van Gogh, Cézanne, and Gauguin. Freudenheim’s other credentials for his post included internships under prominent Jewish art custodians E. H. Gombrich, Panofsky, Ettinghausen, Alan Solomon of the Jewish Museum in New York, and Peter Selz, a curator at the Museum of Modern Art.

When Freudenheim eventually left the Baltimore Museum, he was replaced by another Jewish director, Arnold Lehman, a grandson of a founder of the Gimbel’s department store. Lehman eventually became director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and later the Brooklyn Museum. Like Bergman, Lehman has also been president of the Association of Art Directors.

When Lehman eventually left the Baltimore Museum, he was predictably replaced by yet another Jewish director, Doreen Bolger, whose credentials include museum directorships in Texas and Rhode Island (the largest gift to the Rhode Island museum she directed was from the Jewish benefactors Leonard and Paul Granoff).

Also in Baltimore is the American Visionary Art Museum, founded and directed by yet another Jewish powerbroker, Rebecca Hoffman (formerly a development officer for the Associated Jewish Charities). AVAM’s largest benefactor, of course, has been Jewish: Zanvyl Krieger. “Hoffberger,” notes George Goodman, “remains active as a volunteer in Jewish organizations, and [is] devoted to Torah study.” [GOODMAN, #2, p. 132]

In nearby Washington DC, by 1998 Jews in the upper ranks of the art world establishment included I. Michael Hegman (Secretary, “or Chief Administrator”) of the Smithsonian Museum, real estate mogul Robert Smith (President of the National Gallery of Art), Allen Shestack (Deputy Director of the National Gallery of Art), Neil Ben Ezra (Chief Curator of the Hirshhorn Museum, where fellow Jew Stephen Weil recently retired as Deputy Director), David Levy (Director of the Corcoran Gallery — his wife is a Vice President at PBS broadcasting), and Stephen Ostrow (Curator of Prints and Drawings at the Library of Congress). Years ago, collector Joseph Hirshhorn’s 6,000 art works were donated towards the creation of the Hirshhorn Museum. (Hirshhorn made most of his fortune in uranium mining). Jewish mogul Arthur Sackler’s wing at the Smithsonian is the Arthur M. Sackler Gallery, featuring Asian and Near Eastern art. Sackler’s collection, noted one curator, is ‘by far the largest and most important collection of ancient Chinese art in the world.’ [GLUECK, G., p. B8]

Years ago, Jewish collector Joseph Hirshhorn’s 6,000 art works were donated towards the creation of the Hirshhorn Museum. (Hirshhorn made most of his fortune in uranium mining).

Karl Meyer notes the context for the building (in 1974) of the Hirshhorn Museum – so prominent on the Washington Mall – as a government institution:

“The federal government was to pay the expenses of building a museum bearing Hirshhorn’s name; the design of the museum was to be subject to Hirshorn’s approval, with the title to the art passing to the government only upon completion of the project; a ten-member governing board was to be established, half of whose members would be nominated by Hirshhorn, who also would nominate the director; and Hirshhorn would not be required to supply an endowment to help meet future operating expenses … These terms aroused considerable disquiet in the museum world, in good part because they were likely to encourage other donors to demand equally one-sided arrangements.” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 49-50]

(Hirshhorn’s choice for the museum director position was Abram Lerner). [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 51]

As Sherman Lee, director of the Cleveland Museum of Art, protested in 1966:

“It is a mistake to accept a collection of contemporary art formed by one man and to use a large sum of money to house and administer such a collection. If at least ten million dollars is available for a building to bear, not the nation’s name, but that of a donor, sufficient funds aught to be available to set about the formation of a truly catholic and articulated national collection housed in a building bearing the collective name of all the people. Such a collection is already begun in the National Collection of Fine Arts, now bypassed by this proposed action.” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 50]

In the midst of the controversy over the Hirshhorn museum, Washington newspaper columnist Jack Anderson “reported that Hirshhorn had been in legal trouble years earlier over alleged currency smuggling and stock manipulation.” [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 50]

A highlight exhibition for 1988 at Washington’s Capital Children’s Museum (founder and director: Ann Lewin) was its Holocaust show. “The visiting children,” noted the Washington Post, “who are held to groups of 30, sit on the floor in an intimate room and are told the story of the Holocaust through a video narrated by a child. A dialogue, led by especially trained docents, some of them Holocaust survivors, follows.” [GAMAREKIAN, p. B7] “[Lewin’s] exhibit about the Holocaust, Remember the Children,,” noted the Post years later, “has traveled around the country and partly inspired the permanent children’s exhibit at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.” [KASTOR, p. B1]

By the 1970s Stanley Marcus (of Nieman-Marcus luxury store fame) was the Director of the Dallas Symphony Society, an Advisory Director of the Fort Worth Art Museum, a Trustee for the Public Television Foundation for North Texas, and even a Trustee of Southern Methodist University. Another Marcus, Richard, was on the board of the directors of the Dallas Theatre Center, the Dallas Council of World Affairs, and Assemblage, an organization of the wealthy who are interested in the arts. [COEVER, p. 123]

In 1993, the Director of the Milwaukee Art Center noted in an art catalogue that “since 1957 … the Jewish community has been central to the development of the [Milwaukee] institution … The list of members of the Jewish community who have been monetary supporters of the museum would be too long to elaborate here, as would the many members of the Museum’s Board of Trustees, presidents and officers of that board’s committee, and support group members, and volunteers.” [BOWMAN, p. 1]

In Detroit, prominent Jewish philanthropist/entrepreneurs include financier Max Fisher, Eugen Appelbaum (founder of Arbor Drugs), Sam Franiel (a real estate baron), and international glass magnate William Davidson. Davidson also owns the Pine Knob Music Theatre and the Palace of Auburn Hills, the two most popular music concert venues in the area. His companies also manage the Meadowbrook Music Festival. In Denver, Colorado, Barry Hirshfeld is “past board chairman of the Denver Art Museum.” [PR NEWSWIRE, 3-21-96]

In Canada, Avie Bennett is (1992) vice president of the National Ballet of Canada; Judith Loeb Cohen became president of that organization in 1988. Louis Applebaum headed the Ontario Arts Council from 1971-1980, and was appointed in 1979 to “co-chair a federal review of Canada’s cultural policy; he also helped raise funds for the National Arts Center Orchestra and served three years as its chairman. [CSILLAG, R., 5-4-2000, p. 6] In 1999 Peter Herrndorf, a baptized Jew, was named as the chairman and CEO of the National Arts Center. Garth Drabinsky (until recent financial scandals) owned the Pantages Theatre and also managed and operated the $50-million North York Performing Arts Center. In 2000, a pair of Jewish brothers “were named to head two of the most important government-owned cultural institutions in the country
[Canada].” Victor Rabinovitch became president of the Canadian Museum of Civilization Corp., “the country’s largest and busiest museum.” (His brother, Robert, became president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation). Victor has also been on the Board of Directors for the Ottawa Jewish Community Center. [GORDON, S., 11-30-01]

In Australia, Graeme Samuel became Chairman of the Australian Opera in 1996. Peter Redlich retired from the chairmanship of the Victorian Arts Center in 1994, the same year that Nathan Waks became director of music at ABC (Australian Broadcasting Company). [SINGER/SELDIN, 1995, p. 359]

In England, the current director of the Tate Gallery (one of that country’s most important museums with 2.2 million visitors a year) is also Jewish: Nicholas Serota. In a 1995 obituary to another prominent Jewish businessman, (Lord) Aby Goodman, the Times (of London) noted that, “Not content with being the chairman of the trusts for both the Observer and the Jewish Chronicle, he was at the same time Chairman of the Newspaper Publishers Association; hardly as he finished his second year term as Chairman of the Art Council than he popped up again as Chairman of the British Council.” [HOWARD, A., 1-19-99] In his lifetime he was also Chairman of the English National Opera, president of the National Book League, Director of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden, and a governor of the Royal Shakespeare Theatre. [BOGGAM, S., 1018-99, p. 4]

“Glance at the names of board members of major contributors [in Great Britain] to such institutions as the National Theatre and Covent Garden,” suggests Jewish observer Stephen Brook,

“and the large proportion of Jewish individuals and organizations will be apparent. Jonathan Miller … argues that Jews mostly support only the most prestigious institutions … That I think reflects not so much a commitment to the arts as a commitment to getting a place in the British establishment. It’s a short cut. You can buy your way into the centre of the Establishment. I think it’s rather pathetic.” [BROOK, p. 326]

An example of this is England’s Arnold Goodman, a Jewish mogul who died in 1999. Goodman, notes the Financial Times of London, “became successively or concurrently: chairman of British Lion Films, the [London] Observer, the Newspaper Proprietors’ Association, the Committee of Inquiry into Charity Law, the Arts Council, the Committee on London Orchestras, the Housing Corporation, and the National Building Agency.” [He was also the Director of the Royal Opera House and president of the Theatrical Advisory Committee]. [FINANCIAL TIMES, 10-16-99, p. 4]

Corrupt Jewish early 20th century art dealer “Lord” Joseph Duveen also was a philanthropist to British art causes. Duveen “underwrote the construction costs of entire galleries at the British Museum, the Tate Gallery, the National Gallery, and the National Portrait Gallery in London. (His generosity nonetheless piqued Osbert Sitwell to demure: ‘It is an ironical reflection that while Lord Duveen’s magnificent gifts to the nation stand as a memorial to his name, much of the money that paid for them was earned by the sale to the United States of the flower of eighteenth-century and early nineteenth-century English paintings. We have the galleries now, but no pictures to hang in them.”) [MEYER, K., 1979, p. 180-181]

In Cleveland, Richard Bogomolny’s $3 million gift to the Cleveland Orchestra – the largest ever – secured his position as president of the Board of the Musical Arts Association, the group that controls the orchestra. In Seattle, a new symphony venue is called Benaroya Hall, named in honor of the Jewish Benaroya family’s benevolence to the arts. Also in Seattle, “megadonor” Samuel Strom (major philanthropist of the Strom Jewish Community Center, on Mercer Island) “headed the capital campaign” for the Henry Art Gallery. (Strom is also Chairman of the Seattle Symphony Board and a regent at the University of Washington). [BARGREEN, M., 4-27-97, p. N9] In Washington DC, Lessing Rosenwald donated a major collection of graphic art to the National Gallery. In Atlanta, Georgia, Ned Rifkind directed the High Museum until he moved to Houston to head the Menil Collection in 2001. Even in the hinterlands, in San Antonio, Texas, a museum director noted in 1964 that “the vast majority of [art] collectors are Jewish.” [BRENNER, p. 323]

Even in a place like San Luis Obispo, California, Chris Cohan [owner of professional basketball’s Golden State Warriors and Sonic Communications, a TV station conglomeration] “was a central figure in the building of San Luis Obispo’s Performing Arts Center, donating $2.1 million and enduring a rash of bad publicity in a dispute over whether or not it would bear his name.” [LYONS, ONLINE] In Anchorage, Alaska, the “Sydney Laurence Theatre” is part of the Alaska Center for Performing Arts. [ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS, 3-29-99, p. 2D] In the same genre, in Poland, Zygmunt Nissenbaum planned to provide funds to “renovate the monument to the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and affix a plaque with his name on it” at the site, a narcissistic idea which was “roundly rejected by most Jewish leaders.” [WEINBAUM, L., p. 27]

As James Yaffe noted in 1968:

“Less than 1 percent of all contributors to Jewish charity are anonymous. Donors not only like to have their names known, but immortalized. To satisfy this desire many organizations have adopted the practice of naming things after people. Hospitals give contributors’ names to everything from new wings to new oxygen tents. Brandeis University has a Jewish name attached to nearly every building on campus. The Israelis refer to the United States as Plaquistan.” [YAFFE, J. 1968, p. 175]

Howard Jacobson recounts his amazement about the wealthy Jewish donor name game while visiting the University of Judaism in Los Angeles:

“A list of the university’s founders is done in gold lettering on marble tablets in the hall of what is the SYLVIA AND DAVID WEISZ EDUCATION WING, which is itself, as I understand it, part of the SHIRLEY AND ARTHUR WHIZIN center, (dedicated to the JEWISH FUTURE), which is in turn, as I further understand it, is housed within the WILLIAM AND FRIEDA FINGERHUT ACADEMIC BUILDING, a sub-branch of NORMAN AND SADIE LEE COLLEGE. To get from SYLVIA AND DAVID’S WING to the BESS AND ALEXANDER L. BERG DINING CENTER (fed, incidentally, by a kitchen dedicated to the memory of CELIA AND MORRIS I. PELLOW BY THEIR CHILDREN JUDITH AND LOUIS), you have to negotiate the ELIE J. AND RACHEL GINDI ENTRY PLAZA AND LOBBY.” [JACOBSON, H., 1995, p. 191-192]

In Boston, like anywhere else, censorship of art works and ideas is usually easily disguised via the rejection of artworks for completely subjective and nebulous “aesthetic reasons.” And, of course, there is self-censorship by those who dare not offend those who economically control – and legislate “philanthropic” power – in the art world. An overt case of Jewish manipulation, however, occurred in 1991 when Steve Grossman, a Jewish board member of Boston's Institute of Contemporary Art, resigned in protest of an ICA curatorial decision to show a series of films by Palestinian filmmakers. The Anti-Defamation League soon became embroiled in the matter, as well as high-profile Jewish lawyer Alan Dershowitz, forcing the Museum to present a concurrent screening of Israeli films, as well as an “educational forum” to address the Palestinian film's “political context, not artistic merit.”

The injustice of the ICA decision to fall to Jewish pressure was not lost even to the curator of the Israeli film show, Ela Chohat, who said: “Can you imagine a program on black cinema where someone resigns if they don’t have a white perspective?” [HARTIGAN, p. 75-76] (Balance me apartheid,” says filmmaker Tom Hayes, about his own experiences with Jewish demands to weld their pro-Israel political opinions into any public expression of the Palestinian point of view, “or the Cheyenne, or the Japanese-Americans’ experience during World War II, the slave’s tales with the slave owners.” [HAYES, p. 6] “At any rate,” noted the Boston Globe, “the upcoming Palestinian series prompted Grossman’s resignation, which raised questions about the role of a board of directors in programming.” [HARTIGAN, p. 75-76]

Likewise in Boston, in 1982, prominent British actress Vanessa Redgrave – known for her sympathy to Palestinian causes – was commissioned to narrate an oratorio for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She was ultimately fired. As Lenni Brenner notes:

“A key role in the dismissal [of Redgrave] was played by Irving Rabb, a leading figure in Boston’s Jewish establishment, and a member of the Symphony’s board of trustees.” [BRENNER, p. 331]

(Redgrave sued, with the support of a variety of free speech organizations. She won what she would have been paid for the narration, but a federal judge ruled that she wasn't entitled to damages. And she also had to pay court costs).

Blatant censorship and/or information manipulation takes other forms of course. In New York, for example, in 1971 political artist Hans Haacke had his scheduled exhibition cancelled by the Director of the Guggenheim Museum, Thomas Messer. The curator for Haacke’s show was then fired. Haacke’s “art” show was a public revelation of the various slumlords on the Museum’s Board of Directors. The New York Times noted that “One of the real estate pieces that upset the Guggenheim [was] a deadpan photo documentation of 142 mostly grubby buildings – many in Harlem and on the Lower East side – owned by [Jewish mogul] Harry Shapolsky and associates, a major holder of minor properties in the city.” [GLUECK, #2, p. 27]

The Guggenheim Museum, declared its director, “was not the proper place in which to expose slumlords.” [GLUECK, #2, p. 27]

In Montreal, Canada, in 1972 Jewish pressure “forced the Saidye Bronfman Center to cancel a production [of the play] The Man in the Glass Booth by Robert Shaw, a play about Adolf Eichman that had been performed, without outcry, in Israel itself.” [PARIS, E., p. 99] In Canada, Jewish organizations decided the play was anti-Semitic. Two years later “the same kind of pressure obliged the Saidye Bronfman Center to cancel another event [An Evening with Dudley Kravitz].” [PARIS, E., p. 101] At the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts there’s a performing hall named after Jewish real estate mogul Max Cummings. [EISENTHAL, B., 5-24-01]

Elsewhere in the rolls of Jewish art patrons, in Fort Worth, Texas, prominent philanthropist Rosalyn Rosenthal is on the board of the Forth Worth Opera Association and she is a founder of the Nancy Lee and Perry R. Bass Performance Hall. More curiously, she endowed the E.M. and Rosalyn Rosenthal Chair in Jewish Studies at Texas Christian University’s Brite Divinity School.

Many Jewish art moguls also have some very politically-minded philanthropic interests. In Dallas, Stephen Felder Black was for two terms the president of the Dallas Symphony and a board member of the Dallas Chamber Orchestra. He was also, noted the Dallas Morning News in 1996, “devoted to disseminating information about Israel … Earlier this year, Mr. Block worked to raise money so the Dallas Symphony Chorus could perform in Israel …. At his funeral Monday, 40 members of the symphony chorus sang the Israeli national anthem … At the time of his death, Mr. Black was chairman of the Israel Commission of the Jewish Community Relations Council and on the organization’s national board.” [SIMNACHER, p. 18A]

Another mogul/philanthropist, Joseph Meyerhoff, until he died in 1995, was extremely active in the art circles of Baltimore. But, notes the Baltimore Sun,

“If you think Meyerhoff is a prominent name in Baltimore, you should go to Israel … Meyerhoff … was an ardent Zionist whose interest in Israel started through his involvement with United Jewish Appeal. He was also one of the first investors in Israel Bonds ... Contributions from him and the foundation that was formed after his death are responsible [in Israel] for the construction of 11 libraries, nine day care centers, several community centers, cultural arts centers, the emergency wing at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem and several buildings at universities throughout the country …. 45 to 50 buildings in Israel bear the Meyeroff name.” [RIVERA, p. 2D]

In addition to all this, as sampling, a scanning of merely a few common, and easily recognized, Jewish names in an alphabetical list of American art institution officials (1997–98) revealed the following (selected here are only people at the pinnacle of their organizations or fields):

– Director of the Detroit Institute of Arts: Samuel Sachs II. (The Treasurer of this museum is also Jewish: Gilbert Silverman).

MODERN ART

– Chairman of the Board of Trustees, the Brooklyn Museum: Robert Rubin.
– Commissioner of Chicago’s Department of Cultural Affairs: Lois Weinberg. [BOWKER]

Alan Stein was also Chairman of the Board of the American Conservatory Theatre in San Francisco in the 1990s [WINN, S., 9-24-93, p. C1] and in 1995, also in San Francisco, “a traveling Jewish theatre [was] the lucky winner of a $150,000 challenge grant from the National Endowment for the Arts … [It was] one of only 44 arts organizations in the country (and the only theatre company in California) to receive that kind of NEA grant [that] year.” [JAMISON, L., 3-8-95]

In the actual formation of art tastes and pedigrees, organized Jewry’s influence in art market trends has occasionally been blatant. “[In the 1960s] at first ‘relevance’ meant exhibiting avant-garde art,” says Sophy Burnham, “Some people date ‘relevance’ from the coming of Alan Solomon to the Jewish Museum in 1963. The Jewish Museum had been devoted for years to preserving the historic traditions in its vessels and chalices. Suddenly it turned about face and marched after contemporary art. It was a shock. Everyone was talking about the Jewish Museum and about Alan Solomon, the director. It was showing Rauschenberg, Johns, Larry Rivers, Richard Diebenkorn, Ken Noland, Jean Tinguely, [James Rosenquist] … and later, an exhibit, a social documentary, of life on the [Jewish] Lower East Side… Before the decade was out, the other museums had turned to the chase – the Smithsonian, the Metropolitan, the Corcoran Gallery in Washington, the Pasadena Museum … [BURNHAM, p. 164]

Another seminal turning point in the modern art market was a 1973 auction of Jewish taxi-cab company-owner Robert Scull’s collection of contemporary art. Scull was, says Stuart Plattner, “an early and avid pop collector whom the art world loves to despise for his boorish manners and transparent attempts to use art to increase his social position.” [PLATTNER, p. 35] The auction was a stunning success and launched a flurry of investment interest in collecting this genre of contemporary art.

Art gallery sellings and buyings of important art are usually secret. The most important public gauge for art market prices are the results of art auctions. The most important art auction firm has been Sotheby’s. [The other major auction house, Christie’s, was the subject of movement towards control in December 1997 by a consortium headed by the SBC Warburg company. [CORPORATE MONEY, p. 2-3] (Christie’s chief curator for contemporary art, Neal Meltzer, is also Jewish). In 1966 the Rothschild Investment Trust bought 20% ownership of the Sotheby’s firm, [WATSON, p. 351] but by the early 1980s A. Alfred Taubman, by then “one of the world’s richest men,” a Jewish entrepreneur who made his fortune in shopping malls and real estate, purchased controlling interest in Sotheby’s. (He was also married to a former Miss Israel). [HOGREFE, J., 1986, p. 127]
As a trustee of both the Whitney Museum and the Smithsonian, and now an art dealer, some critics complained, to no avail, that Taubman had a serious conflict of interest in his new buy. “Selling art has much in common with selling root beer,” Taubman told the Wall Street Journal, “People don’t need root beer and they don’t need to buy a painting either. We provide them with a sense that it will give them a happier existence.” [WATSON, p. 385]

In 1998 both Robert Lacey and Peter Watson authored separate books that exposed the scandalous inner workings of the Sotheby’s company. Watson’s expose was supported in part by BBC television; what he discovered, said CBS 60 Minutes reporter Morley Safar, “shook the art world to its foundations.” [MYRPHY, p. 15] “A couple of decades on, Sotheby’s,” noted the Economist, “now controlled by an American property tycoon, Alfred Taubman, has grown beyond recognition. So, too, has its ethical malaise, according to Peter Watson, a British journalist and art-market expert.” [ECONOMIST]

In text and on film, Watson documented Sotheby’s international art smuggling operations, from Old Master paintings in Europe to religious artifacts in the Third World. Watson, noted Newsday

“focuses his story on James Hodges, a disgruntled antiquities administrator in Sotheby’s London office, who amassed thousands of documents that outline the auction house’s various alleged malpractices, including smuggling. Hodges was later convicted of the theft of two artworks from Sotheby’s (which he claims he was “holding” for dealers), but his documents constitute the basis of Watson’s investigations. Most shocking of all of Sotheby’s indiscretions is its alleged collusion in smuggling artworks out of India. With his television crew, Watson visits a tiny Indian village to find the home of a goat-headed stone goddess that was put up for sale on Sotheby’s London auction block. All that’s left of the local shrine, once the home of 20 such goddesses, is a pile of rubble where the villagers still pray.” [LEE, p. B13]

Watson told the New York Times that his investigations led him to believe that such practice at Sotheby’s was “systematic.” [IBRAHIM, p. A9] “Art crime,” notes Richard Myrphy,

“… is far more pervasive than the occasional well-publicized dramas or those crooked dealers’ ploys would suggest. The statistics themselves are sobering. According to a Cambridge University study, 30 to 40 percent of the world’s available antiquities pass through the sale rooms in New York City and London. Roughly 90 per cent of these pieces are of unknown provenance, meaning they were almost certainly stolen, smuggled, or both.” [MYRPHY, p. 15]

Meanwhile, there is an image to be maintained. “Taubman’s most public gambit,” said Watson, in an earlier volume about the art world, “was to flood Sotheby’s board [of trustees] with a raft of rich friends and acquaintances – socialites in many cases – whose job it was to bring in business and create the impression in the minds of prospective sellers, at least in he United States, that Sotheby’s was a sort of club, membership in which conferred social status.”
[WATSON, p. 381] Among this group was Henry Ford II, for a while the vice-chairman at Sotheby’s, who called himself Taubman’s “token Gentile.” [BERMAN, p. C1] (Price-fixing scandals at Sotheby’s forced Alfred Taubman to step down as chairman of Sotheby’s in 2000, although he maintained controlling interest in the company. CEO Donna (Dede) Brooks also resigned with him. That same year, Sotheby’s and Christie’s art auction houses agreed to pay $512 million to satisfy numerous class-action suits brought against them.) [LOS ANGELES TIMES, 9-23-2000, p. C1] In May 2001, Taubman was indicted for price-fixing by a Federal grand jury. [SMITH/HIGGINS, 5-1-01, p. 1]

This elitist, status-laden attitude is not special to Sotheby’s; it has long been the foundation of the modern art world. (In 1993 Sotheby’s even successfully sold the ownership to the abandoned mechanical rover on the moon for $68,000, essentially a conceptual possession, an abstract play thing). High-brow art culture, noted Jewish sociologist Herbert Gans in 1974, serves “a small public that prides itself on exclusiveness.” [DIMAGGIO, p. 142] Sociologists Paul DiMaggio and Michael Useem reiterated the same theme in 1989:

“Our findings clearly indicate that in this country the public for the visual and performing arts is distinctly elite in levels of education, occupation, income, and race. The statistics we were able to summarize from the many studies reviewed show little indication of cultural democracy.” [DIMAGGIO, p. 163]

“Many [art] galleries go out of their way to be rude,” wrote Sophy Burnham, “indeed, one rule of the art world might be that the more ‘important’ the gallery, the more haughty it will be … The gallery of High Art is so discriminating, so refined, deals in such precious artistic sensibility and at such prices, that it affects an ambiance, commensurate with its wares.” [BURNHAM, p. 30]

Among Taubman’s Sotheby’s trustee appointees was the Jewish owner, Max Fisher, of United Brands, a company that was fined for bribing Honduran government officials in exchange for tax breaks. “Still,” notes Watson, “Fisher was chiefly known for his enthusiastic fund-raising for Jewish and Israeli charities … [He also] wrote Op-Ed pieces for the New York Times.” [WATSON, p. 381] Fisher, longtime chairman of the Board of Governors of the Jewish Agency, gives half his multi-million dollar oil and real estate income each year to Israel and other Jewish causes,” notes the (Jewish) Forward. [FORWARD]

The fact that Jews are so dominating in the art world is a reality that is very rarely publicly acknowledged. It is forbidden – as always for anyone, anywhere – to discuss the subject for fear of being branded “anti-Semitic.” Typically, as example, an entire 1989 academic volume on the “Sociology of the Arts” fails to mention Jews as sociological entity in the modern art dynamic. There are analyses of art galleries, “artist groups,” art patrons, and art audiences, broken down into gender, age, income, occupation, and even “racial and ethnic minorities.” We can find that, negligibly, “blacks, Orientals, and persons of Spanish origin constitute about 7% of the art audience,” but there is nothing whatsoever about Jews, even their own percentage of that “art audience,” let alone how many art galleries they own, museums they direct, and articles they generate about art value. [FOSTER/BLAU, 1989]

This kind of false framing is endemic to modern America. (See, for example, a 1998 scholarly volume entitled Ethnic Identity and Power. Cultural Contexts of Political Action in School and Society. The index cites references to Blacks (large case), “white” (small case), “angry white males,” Chicanos, Mexicans, Hispanics, Asian-Americans, Latino, Native Americans, Eskimos, Haitians, “Hmong people,” Moroccans, and so on. There is nothing about Jews in the context of power and ethnicity – they are not afforded a heading in the book’s index). It is institutionalized: no one (certainly not a non-Jew) is allowed to single out Jewry for an analysis of their power. Those few who know the story are afraid to speak. Most are merely ignorant of the dimensions of the issue. Take, for example, American journalist Thomas Billitteri’s crusading article for truth, justice, and fairness, never mentioning Jewry in his critical appraisal of the mass media’s systemic reluctance to hire minorities (i.e., Blacks, et al). Instead, Billitteri’s mass media culprits are the standard punching bags – the amorphous “whites,” by which the very particularistic Jewish dominance in the mass media (especially at the highest decision-making strata) [See mass media chapter] is conveniently subsumed, and thereby, as always, hidden: “79% of television new personnel are white, and 88% of radio news workers are white. In management ranks, 92 percent of television and news directors are white. Only 1% of television news directors are black.” [BILLITTERI, p. 19] Or what of the Los Angeles Times’ dissimulative assertion in 2001 that “90% of each major [Hollywood] guild (Screen Actors, Directors, Writers and Producers) is white, the majority of them male.” [Munoz, L., 3-24-01]

Art critic Peter Halley (self-identified as half-Jewish) took another angle on the “Forbidden to Be Spoken About” machinations of the modern art world, as represented by the ethnicity of many of today’s most successful artists:

“It is my contention that the art world of the 1980s represented a kind of renaissance for Jewish American artists who came of age in that decade. The list of young Jewish American artists who took center stage in the 80’s is long – early in the decade we might think of Barbara Kruger, Laurie Simmons, Sherrie Levine, R.M. Fischer, Donald Sultan, Julian Schnabel, and David Salle. Later, the work of Ross Bleckner, Terry Winters, Haim Steinbach, and Meyer Vaisman come to the fore … What originally motivated me to explore this subject [of growing Jewish artist prominence] was the strange fact that there has been an inexplicable silence surrounding it. Especially in this era of multicultural awareness, it is surprising, to say the least, that no one has mentioned this phenomena … [HALLEY, p. 26-27] …

One possible reason for this silence about a Jewish artist renaissance in the 80’s is that at the same time a great fluorescence of Jewish influence in the areas of philanthropy, business, finance and the bastions of high society was taking place … By the 1980s … in cities with large Jewish populations, like New York, Jews had largely replaced the older WASP elite as standard bearers of social power and prestige in the evolving American postwar ethnic meritocracy.”
Thus a new and yet unexamined social paradigm arose. Jews … [who] had championed the marginal culture of Modernism had suddenly become the pillar of the American establishment. At the same time, a new generation of Jewish artists was emerging whose work was collected as often as not by Jews in the cultural elite as part of a continuing tradition of Jewish support for contemporary art.” [HALLEY, p. 28]

By the 1980s, from such artists, notes well-known art critic Robert Hughes, “never before had star artists been so bathed in adulation … The doings of collectors, the gyrations of the market, the increasingly passive promotional role of museums. The whole social circus attached to the art world supplied limitless fodder for breathless journalists. Art magazines devolved into sycophantic praise-bulletins. Since the magazines depended on advertising, revenue from dealers who were not averse to applying pressure, 95 per cent of the writing published in them was the merest puffery, garnished with opaque Derridian and Lacanian jargon [Jacques Derrida and Jacques Lacan were two French – and Jewish – psychoanalytic philosophers].” [HUGHES, p. 594]

Hughes may have had Milton Esterow in mind when he spoke of the slide into purely money-grubbing, consumerist-spewing “art” magazines. Esterow, the Jewish owner and editor of ArtNews (America’s largest circulation arts publication) and other media interests, was featured in the New York Times in 1995 in his quest “for more consumer, or general, advertising to go along with the substantial art advertising that has traditionally run his magazine.” “Art collectors are passionate about beautiful things,” Esterow said, “This is translatable to beautiful cars, beautiful clothes, exotic vacations. There is no better setting for beautiful things than our magazine.” [SLOANE, p. D9] Esterow noted new ads from Infiniti cars and Rolex watches in his publication. Promotional plans also included an allowance for automobile advertisers to “place a new car in front of a major museum during a particular exhibit,” and an alcohol company “to hold a tasting at an important art fair.” [SLOANE, p. D9]

The Jewish influence in “art photography” – as artists as well as dealers, critics, photographers themselves, and curators– is overwhelmingly dominant. This is certainly in part due to the fact that many photographic artists seep over into the High Art realm from positions of Jewish predominance in hard-to-get advertising, fashion, and photojournalism positions, each deeply part of the business world (Annie Liebowitz at Rolling Stone and Vanity Fair, for instance, or Arthur Penn, Richard Avedon, and Helmut Newton at Vogue and other slick magazines). Even maverick Robert Frank took a vacation to Peru early in his career “because he wanted to escape the commercial success he was beginning to have in New York shooting for fashion magazines.” [WESTERBECK, p. 645] Anthony Heilbut notes that “during the 1930s, American notions of physical beauty were altered by the [Jewish] émigrés, a neat reversal of the pattern that once led East European Jews to celebrate icons unequivocally gentile and heterosexual. Fashion photographers like Horst and Erwin Blumenthal specialized in tableaus of exotic, androgynous women.” [HEILBUT, p. 492]

In England, in 2001 Gemma Levine had a career retrospective at London’s National Portrait Gallery. She “is one of Britain’s leading portrait photographers…Her career in photography was initiated by a commission from [Jewish publishing mogul] George Weidenfeld to take photographs for two books in Israel in collaboration with [Israeli heroes] Moshe Dayan and Golda Meir.” [http://www.absolutearts.com, 2001] Rock and roll photographer Gered Mankowitz had a retrospective exhibition the same year:

“Best-known for his work as the unofficial photographer for the Rolling Stones in the late 1960s, Mankowitz didn’t just take pictures, he created some of the most enduring images of that era. Working with talents such as Jimy Hendrix and the Stones, he produced the kind of photographs that led nice teenagers astray to worship at the altar of rock…Now 55, the photographer has been creating pop images for so long he has become part of the mythology himself. As integral to swinging London’s music scene as flowing hair and weed, Mankowitz’s studio was in the heart of it all.” [SCOTSMAN, 11-13-01]

Jacques Lowe, son a German father and Jewish mother, was John F. Kennedy’s personal photographer. Lowe “became an assistant to the renowned [Jewish] photographer Arnold Newman, who became his mentor.” Lowe founded the Visual Arts agency (later called Visual Arts Projects). [JFK, 2001]

An émigré from Europe in 1938, for decades Miki Denhof was a “noted mentor of fashion photographers” at Esquire, Vogue, House and Garden and Glamour. Her big break was to be hired at Vogue by (fellow Jewish) art director Alexander Lieberman in 1945. She once donated 900 photographs from her father’s personal collection to an exhibition entitled “Fighting for the Fatherland: The Patriotism of Jews in World War I.” Denhof’s influence in the fashion world was so influential that her death in 2000 merited an article in the New York Times. [HELLER, S., 8-6-2000] (The editor-in-chief for 17 years at Vogue was Grace Mirabella, an Italian-American. Her husband, William Cahan, was a wealthy Jewish doctor and socialite; his cousin, Abraham Cahan, founded and edited the Yiddish language Jewish Daily Forward. [MIRABELLA, 1995, p. 167] At her wedding to Cahan, “the Jewish custom in weddings is to step on a glass and break it. So, after we’d kissed, Nate [Cummings, a Jewish friend] brought out a glass wrapped in a napkin, and Bill had to stomp on it. Nate then picked up the pieces, still wrapped, and had them affixed to a canvas background, which he framed. The collage now hangs in our home, like an abstract painting.” [MIRABELLA, G., 1995, p. 175] She notes that “photographers were becoming big stars too” in her era, particularly noting Jewish Vogue photographers Bert Stern who “could only work with ten assistants in his studio,” Richard Avedon, and Arthur Penn.] [MIRABELLA, G., 1995, p. 121-122]
Jewish novelist Judith Krantz notes the Jewish complexion of her photography connections:

“Well-known [Jewish] fashion photographer” Milton Greene “and I became good friends. It was a world of interrelationships. Milton’s ex-wife Evelyn was engaged to [famous Jewish portrait photographer] Dick Avedon … He already had an aura of a vast future about him, a photographer version of the young [Jewish conductor] Leonard Bernstein … Later, when I became a fashion editor, I was always galvanized when we worked together.” [KRANTZ, J., 2000, p. 128-129]

In the field of photojournalism, three of the original six staff photographers for Life magazine were Jewish (Carl Mydans, Margaret Bourke-White, and Alfred Eisenstadt). “Within a few years Jewish photographers Fritz Goro, Eliot Eliosofon, Dmitri Kessel, and others (Curt Gunther, Hebert Gehr, Yale Joel, Hy Peskin, Paul Schutzen, Mark Kaufmann, Nina Leon, Ida Wyman, Arthur Shay, Lawrence Schiller, Henry Groskinsky, Jill Krementz, and Neil Leifer) became staff or contract photographers.” “From the [19]40s to 70s Philip Stern “was known as Life’s photographer in Hollywood.” Look magazine was founded in 1937. “For most of its years the Director of Photography,” notes George Gilbert, “was Arthur Rothstein.” [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 60, 78] The successful “A Day in the Life” series of coffee table photography books (A Day in the Life of – the United States, Russia, Israel, etc.) have been headed by two Jewish photojournalists, Rick Smolan and David Cohen.

An influential documentary photography organization from the late 1930s to the 1950s was the Photo League. “The overwhelming majority of members of the 200-plus group,” notes George Gilbert, “including photographers from Life and from the photo agencies were of Jewish heritage.” Jewish photographers Sid Grossman, Sol Libsohn, and Aaron Siskind founded the group in 1932. [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 230-231] Another influential organization, the American Society of Magazine Photographers (ASMP), was created in 1944. “Starting with 30 paid-up members,” notes Gilbert, “… the group leaped into prominence in the industry, boasting an estimated three of four of all eligible magazine photographers as members. The initial roster, with an exception of two, were all of Jewish heritage.” [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 237]

Famous turn-of-the-century social documentarian Lewis Hine wasn’t Jewish. But the man who controlled his estate at his death, Walter Rosenbaum, was. In 2001, the Times of London reported that “The FBI has begun an investigation into the suspected forgery of hundreds of works by one of America’s most famous photographers. Tests showed that numerous ‘vintage’ prints by Lewis Hine, who is revered for his social realist pictures from the Depression, were printed on paper not available until more than a decade after his death in 1940. The investigation was prompted by a complaint from a dealer in Santa Fe, New Mexico, about Hine’s longtime collaborator, Walter Rosenbaum, an acclaimed war photographer and the former president of the Photo League co-operative where Hine left his archives … This year [Rosenbaum] was reported to have reached a confidential settlement out of court with six dealers to create a 690,000 pound fund to reimburse buyers of between 300 and 500 Hine prints who were unhappy with their purchases.” [TIMES OF LONDON, 8-17-01]

“Since 1996 there has been a proliferation of exhibits on Jews and photography across the United States … [There are also] explicit photographic collections about Jews [that] are increasingly being marked as identifactory texts. As I read it, this larger situation of loss [of the Jewish past] helps account for the growing market for picture books about American Jews.” [LEVITT, L., 2000, p. 90, 65]

Critic James Twitchell calls the omnipresent merger of modern art and business advertising these days “adcult,” and the medium of photography plays a central role. The photographic work of Richard Avedon is a case in point, reflecting the interconnected back scratching of the art and corporate elite. Concerning an Avedon exhibition at the Whitney Museum of Art, Twitchell notes that:

“Si Newhouse’s Advance Publications owns the New Yorker, which gave Avedon more-than-usual space in the week of the show’s opening. The co-publisher of the exhibition catalog, with an essay by New Yorker art critic Adam Gopnik, is Random House, which is owned by Newhouse. Among the six speakers at the Whitney symposium connected to the show were Random House’s CEO Harold Evans and writers Brendan Gil [author of a New York Review of Books article accusing the great folklorist Joseph Campbell of anti-Semitism] and Ingrid Sischy who write for … the New Yorker. The curator of the show was Jane Livingston who does not work for the Whitney but for Avedon, who used a grant from Kodak to pay for the show and the catalog. Synergies, anyone?” [TWITCHELL, p. 227]

Elsewhere in the criss-cross into the art world, for years too Cornel Capa (born Karol Friedman) has run the important International Center for Photography in New York City. Capa’s brother, Robert Capa (Andreas Friedman), was a founder of Magnum, the seminal photojournalism agency. Tom Freudenheim notes that “many of the works [of a “Jewish art” exhibition under his review] are by the most significant photographers of the century and indeed, it can probably be demonstrated that this is a medium which, unlike painting and sculpture, was moved primarily by men and women who were Jewish.” [FREUDENHEIM, p. 28] “Photography has been dominated by Jewish photographers from the 1920s through the 1980s,” says Tom Bamberger, himself both a Jewish photographer and adjunct curator of a Milwaukee art museum. [FREUDENHEIM, p. 28] Even the famous photography repository – the Bett-man Archives – was Jewish-founded, by Otto Bettman, as was Simon Guttman’s London-based international news and photography agency, Report.

Aside from a core of west coast nature photographers like Ansel Adams, Edward Weston, and Wynn Bullock and scattered others across photographic history, there are comparatively few non-Jews who have cracked Jewish dominance of the upper echelon of art-world status in photography. A history of American (and – as many were immigrants – even international) photography reads almost like a history of Jewish photography. A partial list of well-known Jewish photographic artists and/or recurring grant and award winners must always start with the gigantic influence of Alfred Stieglitz. “It was Alfred Stieglitz who was to define the parameters of American ideas about photography’s emotional and expressive potential” [CRICE, p. 661]; his magazine Camera Work and 291 gallery were seminal in moving the “tangible acceptance of photography to the domain of art patrons and other buyers.” [BUNNELL, p. 314] As John Pultz notes: “Stieglitz had been the major force in avant-garde America photography for over forty years. He had exerted his will, and would continue to do so, not only through his own photography but also through the three photography periodicals he had edited between 1893 and 1917 and the three New York galleries he was to run between 1905 and his death in 1946. [PULTZ, p. 484]

“The capitalist concept of the art work [was] a singular rare object,” notes Peter Bunnell, “with a measure of its importance provided by the extent of its economic value … The development of the private gallery, of organized marketing activity replete with regular exhibitions and published criticisms was an American contribution. Largely an urban phenomena, it was orchestrated out of New York by the country’s leading practitioner and spokesman for photography, Alfred Stieglitz … [BUNNELL, p. 314] … [He] applied capitalist economics to the appreciation and acceptance of art. Steiglitz clearly positioned himself at the center of power and he was the major spokesman for Pictorial photography [an early genre of self-conscious “art” photography].” [BUNNELL, p. 315] In 1993, a 1920 “art” photograph by Steiglitz of artist Georgia O’Keefe’s hands and a thimble sold at auction for $398,500, the highest price ever paid for a photograph. Another Steiglitz print went for $107,500. [NYT, 10-9-93, p. A11]

A partial list of celebrated Jewish photographers includes Paul Strand (Stransky), Richard Avedon, painter-photographer Robert Rauschenberg, Herb Ritts (another “photographer of the stars”), Eric Salomon, Alfred Eisenstadt (the “father of photojournalism”), Man Ray (Emmanuel Radnitsky), Robert Capa (Endre Friedman), Cornell Capa, Laslo Moholy-Nagy, Andre Keretsz (“among the most influential photographers in Paris in the 1920s” [WESTBECK, p. 35], Margaret Bourke-White (her father, originally Weiss, was Jewish. She was “surely the twentieth century’s most famous woman photographer” [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. ix], William Klein, Helen Levitt, Aaron Siskind, famous ambulance chaser Weegee (Arthur Fellig, whose father was a rabbi), Robert Frank, Lee Friedlander, Gary Winogrand, Diane Arbus (whose major photography influences were Lisette Model [originally Elise Felice Amelie Seybert] and Marvin Israel), Irving Penn, Joel Sternfeld, Joel Meyerowitz, Duane Michaels, Lewis Baltz, Carl Chiarenza, Michael Bishop, Werner Bischof, Rolof Beny, William Wegman (famed for his in-joke photos of his dog named “Man Ray”), Richard Misrach, Arnold Newman (whose Israeli-born wife was a “one time member of Haganah, the pre-state Israeli underground army” [WALMAN, p. 303], Eve Arnold (originally Cohen: the first woman in the influential Magnum Photo agency), David Seymour (born Szymin, a co-founder of Magnum), Brassai (Gyula Halasz), Susan Meiselas, Cindy Sherman, Walter Rosenblum, Arthur Olman (also the Director of San Diego’s Museum of Photographic Arts), Ruth Orkin, Larry Sultan, Jerry Uelsmann, Judy Dater [Lichtenfeld], Bruce Davidson, Leonard Freed, Elliot Erwitt, Danny Lyon, Larry Fink, Art Kane (Arthur Kanofsky), Jay Meisel, Nan Goldin, Simpson Kalisher, Joe Rosenthal (who took the staged photograph, which has become a patriotic icon, of soldiers planting an American flag at Iwo Jima), Ralph Gibson, Helmut Gernsheim, Phillipe Halsman, Ernest Haas, Annie Leibowitz, Roman Vishniac, John Heartfield (Helmut Herzfelde), Gisele Freund, Sandi Fellenberg, Abigail Heyman, Lauren Greenfield, Arthur Rothstein, Doris Ullman, Rebecca Lepkoff, Sandra Weiner, Andreas Feininger, Lotte Jacobi, Inge Morath, Lynne Cohen, Rosalind Solomon, Milton Resnick, Donald Blumberg, Baron Adolf de Meyer, Ellen Land-Weber, Eva Rubinstein, Dennis Stock (Stockl), Mark Cohen, Paul Diamond, Ray Metzker, Arthur Tress, Peter Simon, Marcia Resnick, Helmut Newton (whose sado-masochistic images for glamour magazines have been seminal to the heroin-addict look in fashion photography criticized by President Clinton in the 1990s), and many others. [See for example, George Gilbert’s compilation of Jewish photographers].

“It is impossible to deny the impact [Helmut Newton] has made, on fashion photography in particular,” noted England’s The Independent in 2001,

“To radical feminists, Newton is the antichrist. This is the man who photographed a woman on all fours with a saddle on her back, and another sitting on her underwear or an unmade bed, with a gun in her mouth … Newton’s vision is fuelled by sex, status, power and, above all, voyeurism … Small wonder, then, that much of the photographer’s most successful imagery has become far more famous than the garments he has chosen to photograph … Newton’s influence is everywhere … In the Sixties and Seventies, Newton’s decadent vision may have been labelled ‘porno chic,’ but today the rest of the world has finally caught up with him and it’s just plain chic. There is barely a stylist, photographer or designer working in fashion today who can fail to acknowledge Newton as an influence … Helmut Newton was born to middle-class Jewish parents in Weimar Berlin in 1920, and the decadent spirit of that place at that time is imprinted on his work … Accusations of misogyny are still constantly made against Newton’s work.” [FRNKEL, S., 5-9-01]

Les Krims’ “taste for the bizarre – deer slayers, dwarfs, murdered women, and naked Jewish mothers making chicken soup – made him one of the most controversial artists of the 1970s.” [RICE, p. 677] Krims’ work “would also be seminal,” notes Shelly Rice, “to the works of Joel Peter Witkin, a young photographer who is continuing, into the 1990s, to explore the domain of the mysterious. Attracted to the bizarre, like Krims and, before him, Diane Arbus, Witkin photographs transvestites, deformed people, dead fetuses, and other strange phenomena.” [RICE, p. 678] Also Jewish, a Witkins relative, Lee, founded the Witkin Gallery in 1969 which “experienced great success and became the first commercially viable gallery devoted entirely to photography.” [ALEXANDER, p. 697] (Among many influential photography galleries were those run by Stephen White in Los Angeles and Marjorie Neikrug Raskin’s Neikrug Galleries in New York (specializing in antique photography. Charles Traub, also Jewish, was the director of the influential Light Gallery). Vicki Goldberg is one of many prominent Jewish critics of photography.

In 1999, another Jewish photographer, Nan Goldin, was provided a one-person show of her work at Prague’s Galerie Rudolfinum, a spectacular art facility in that beautiful city. Goldin’s show, sponsored by New York’s Whitney Museum of Art, framed her as an ambassador of American art and culture to the Czech Republic. And what was the show like? Large scale color Cibachrome prints of the decadent and violent American underworld decorated the elegant museum walls, including huge confrontational images of drug addicts masturbating.

Another Jewish photographer is Peter Basch. His “photographs for male-oriented publications won him the reputation of having photographed 100,000 nude women.” [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 60] Daniel Howard Cohen died of AIDS in 1995. He was “an educator who grew up in Baltimore and went from being an outlaw leftist to running the photography program at one of the nation’s most prestigious journalism schools … [He joined] the leftist Weathermen group in the 1960’s. He went underground for several years while he was wanted by the law.” [Baltimore Sun, 4-17-95]

Europe’s August Sander is also regarded as a seminal influence in the development of documentary photography. Roman Vishniac is another well-known name. Probably the most famous current Polish photographer is expatriate Ryszard Horowitz, a Holocaust survivor, now living in New York City. The best known photographer from Brazil? Sebastian Selgado, also Jewish. Jewish cameraman Yevgeny Khaldei was described by one newspaper as “the greatest Soviet war photographer.” [PIRANI, S., p. 11] W. W. Waglieff Schapiro was the Tsar of Russia’s official “Court Photographer.” [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 135]

A Jewish refugee from Germany, Laslo Moholy-Nagy, founded Chicago’s Art Institute of Design. Prominent Jewish graduates have included Aaron Siskind, Nathan Lerner, Arthur Siegel, Ray Metzker, Ken Josephson, Barbara Crane, and Eileen Cowan, among others. [WESTBECK, p. 656] More commercially, Morris Germaine founded “Germaine’s School of Photography,” H. P. Seidel founded the “School of Modern Photography,” and “on the west coast today’s prestigious Brooks School of Photography also had its start early in the twentieth century by a Jewish family.” [GILBERT, G., 1996, p. 79]

“By 1963,” notes Stuart Alexander, “the teaching of photography at the university level had become such a significant force in the United States that, under the instigation of Nathan Lyons [formerly of the George Eastman House] the Society of Photographic Education was founded to discuss educational issues ... It has its own internal hierarchy and exerts a great influence on American photography.” [ALEXANDER, p. 701] In intellectual cliques, German-born Walter Benjamin is among the best known of “photo-mechanical” theorists. “Benjamin,” notes George Mosse, “consciously [sought] to define his own brand of Judaism. Benjamin, barely out of school at the age of twenty, rejoiced in his newly discovered Jewish identity. Jewish intellectuals, he wrote in 1912, provide the principal support and dynamic for true culture, which in this case included not only literature and art but also socialism and the women’s emancipation movement. Among Jewish intellectuals, he continued, writers were in the vanguard of change ... [Jews] took a central role in creating alternatives to the existing order ... Benjamin’s preoccupation with Jewish thought, which for a time, under the influence of close friend Gershom Scholem, seemed to shift Benjamin’s early definition of Jewishness toward a sporadic interest in cabala [Jewish mysticism] and Zionism.” [MOSSE, G., 1985, p. 66-67]

In 1997, George Gilbert published a volume that identified over 500 Jews who have been prominent in the field of photography as photographers, critics, scientists, or curators. As Jewish critic A. D. Coleman observed about the volume, “this selection can’t exhaust the list of prospects, indeed it barely scratches the surface (as a parlor game of sorts, I sat with a friend for two evenings and compiled a list of at least one hundred figures Gilbert missed)” ... [These “hundreds and hundreds” of Jews are] so integral to photography’s history as we habitually think of it that a written version of that history excluding these figures is difficult to imagine.” [COLEMAN, A., D., 1998]

Among the most important genres of photography is the so-called “New York School.” It is overwhelmingly Jewish (two-thirds of the important artist selections for one book by curator Jane Livingston on this theme are Jews). “In its art historical usage,” says Coleman,

“the term ‘school’ connotes a connectedness among a group of artists that goes beyond mere friendship and social interaction to deeper levels of bonding and influence: master-apprentice relationships, stylistic kinships, parallel and overlapping trains of thought, and general agreement on what the important questions are in the field – what the philosopher of science Thomas Kuhn would call a shared paradigm.” [author’s emphasis, COLEMAN, A., D., 1998]

This “shared paradigm,” of course, is intellectual doubletalk for a “collective world view” or, more pointedly, ideological collusion.

Why such Jewish dominance of the field, Coleman wonders? Or, as he literally says, “How are we to make sense of this?” What Coleman, as all, fail to willfully address is the obvious: Jewish networking and hustling, Jewish predominance in the mass media, Jewish economic dominance of the art world, Jewish power, Jewish money, and the connective agreement upon what does, and what does not, fall within the realm of artistic “quality.” For the “New York
“He had needed to escape from New York because, as a poor Jewish child in a tough Irish-Italian neighborhood, he had spent his youth being terrorized by street gangs. By the time he went back, in the early 1950s, photography was, for him, he has confessed, a ‘weapon’ with which ‘to get even.’ He wanted his photographs to reveal the harshness of life on the New York streets, and he realized that the way to do so was to cultivate in himself a killer instinct for pictures as ferocious as the primal emotions he wanted to betray in his subjects.” [WESTERBECK, p. 644]

The huge, scholarly volume from which this quote is taken declares itself to be the “new” history of photography. And even this book about photographic image-making devotes an entire obligatory page to the specialness of the Holocaust, a brief article (entitled “The Final Solution”) and four photographs. (No such special attention is provided any world wars or anyone else’s’ collective suffering, genocidal or otherwise). The author of this article, Anne Lilensztein, assets that surviving photographs of the “Final Solution” evidentially prove that the Holocaust occurred: “Testimonies of this madness have been brought to us … above all [by the] photographic … Thus photography is the tangible proof of one of the greatest tragedies of contemporary history.” [LILENSZTEIN, p. 600]

The proof cited for this assertion is four Nazi-era photographs – a pile of naked corpses captioned “Buchenwald, 1946,” and a three-portrait series of a woman entitled “Records of an Inmate at Auschwitz, circa 1943.” There is, as usual, no mention in the text that anyone other than Jews died in Nazi concentration camps, or that millions of other people died at fascist hands in other ways too.

The article’s stated purpose is to declare that photography played an important role in “proving” the atrocities against the Jews. And, as always, the bias against non-Jewish suffering is intrinsic – who can say with absolute certainty that the pile of anonymous corpses depicted are only Jewish? And even if they are, far more indicting to the author’s (and editor’s) ethnocentric premise is that, although non-Jews are never mentioned as victims in the piece, the three portrait photos of an Auschwitz prisoner illustrating “proof” of the Final Solution against Jews depict a female prisoner who is, incredibly, not Jewish.

The woman in these images [page 600] has a Nazi-created card in the photograph with her prisoner number noted: it is “POL:F 31848.” In the second photo, a patch with her number and a triangle can be clearly seen sewn to her prison uniform. Tadeusz Iwaszko, in an authoritative volume published by the Auschwitz Museum in Poland, notes that: “Besides being tattooed, another element in the registration process for new arrivals [at Auschwitz] was being photographed in three poses. In the first photograph, a profile, the camp number was visible as well as letter symbols for the category and nationality of the prisoner. Jewish prisoners, who had begun to arrive in mass transports in 1942, were not photographed. (There were certain exceptions to this general rule).” [IWASZKO, p. 61] But even if these photographs in question were such exceptions, Nazi concentration camp prisoners were identified by both tattooed numbers and sewn cloth patches (or painted) symbols on their clothing. A red triangle was a political prisoner, a green triangle meant “professional criminal,” a black one were so called “anti-social” prisoners (including prostitutes, gypsies, and others. Violet triangles signified Jehovah’s witnesses; the Catholic clergy had red triangles and homosexuals pink ones. “Jews,” notes Iwaszko, “were identified with a six-sided star, composed of two triangles of different colors … [Later] Jews began to be identified by the same method as the other prisoners, except that a yellow square patch would be positioned above the single triangle.” [IWASZKO, p. 63-64] [See the photographic section before page 33 in Auschwitz: Nazi Death camp, edited by Piper/Zwieback for photographic examples of the different identification symbols and portraits for Jews and Poles].

The Nazis were of course meticulous in their delineation of ethnic/racial backgrounds. The letters “POL” or “POLE,” and then a number series, denoted a Pole. “JUDE,” followed by a series of numbers, denoted a Jew. Hence, three of the four photographs used to “prove” the Final Solution against the Jews in the New History of Photography are those of a non-Jewish Auschwitz inmate. Why belabor this? Because such an error is systemic in western cultures today. In an otherwise meticulous scholarly enterprise of such international scope, this mistake is no mere oversight. The appropriation of the image of an unnoted Gentile concentration camp victim to “prove” the indisputable facts of the Jewish Holocaust is a surrender to the constant historical revision barrage in all realms of life today whereby only Jews count, and even photographic evidence of non-Jews at Auschwitz is appropriated as further, irrefutable evidence for the uniqueness of Jewish martyrology. There is a profound lesson here that subverts the very thesis of the Final Solution article in the History volume. Even as the author heralds the absolute truth of photographic evidence, her illustrations – as any photographs – are always susceptible to contextual manipulation. In this case, as elsewhere, the widespread, monolithic presumption about the specialness of a Holocaust only for Jews precedes all and any facts on the matter. Yet, ironically, the images used in this book in question actually subvert what the author seeks to illustrate, i.e., that it was only Jews who died in a Holocaust-Final Solution at Auschwitz.
The overwhelming Jewish dominance in all realms of art and photography leads us to one place where, in very recent years, some non-Jews have managed to get considerable attention for their photographic work. In the late 1980s American art went through a convulsion of controversy when religious leaders and elected politicians began attacking – and legislating against – what many perceived as decadent modern art values. Seminal among the troublemakers was the work of Andres Serrano, Robert Mapplethorpe (both photographers), and Karen Finley, each in some form rewarded for their efforts by the National Endowment for the Arts. Andres Serrano’s most controversial piece was a photograph of Christ on a crucifix in a container of urine, entitled Piss Christ. Mapplethorpe – who has died of AIDS – was celebrated in an NEA-funded retrospective of his works including homosexual sadomasochism, for example, elegant photos of a man peeing into another’s mouth and one in which a fist goes up a rectum.

Karen Finley is a performance artist whose central theme was described in one review as “victimization, especially women as victim, women as underclass, tough stuff … she casually peels off her dress and pours gelatin into her bra … she lathers chocolate over her body … strikes blobs of bean sprouts over body and calls it sperm.” [EVANS, p. 209]

None of these controversial artists are Jewish. However, as Michael Medved pointed out about the largely Jewish-run entertainment media, it should also be of serious concern here that in a field so dominated by Jewish curators, collectors, critics, and dealers, such material is not only heavily supported, but encouraged and glorified. And rewarded.

(A similar kind of incident occurred in 1998 in Great Britain when two Jewish women, Amanda Moss and Marissa Carr [a former stripper], self-described as the Dragon Ladies, “female sexual entertainment,” were awarded nearly $10,000 from the British Arts Council. Joe Ashton, a member of Parliament, complained that “It’s like giving a subsidy to porn. This does enormous damage.”) [BROWN, D., 2-22-98, p. 26]

Piss Christ, by any reckoning, is a childish act of sensationalism to engender attention through outrage. It is an assault upon Christian identity, and the response that occurred in reaction to it was predictable. Would the same (largely Jewish) critics, curators, and art financiers who championed this, in the name of free speech and pushing artistic boundaries, feel able to champion a “Piss Star of David” or “Piss Talmud?” If so, where is it? It does not exist because it is, by “politically correct” dictates, forbidden. Likewise, does the victimization mythology heralded by the gay community (in Jewry’s martyrological shadow) entitle Mapplethorpe to be funded and glorified in dehumanizing and degrading human beings in demeaning sadomasochistic acts? And when Karen Finley howls with sensational rage about her victimhood as a woman, narcissistically covered with chocolate on a stage, where might we look for a model for this kind of demand? Victimhood and sensationalism pays off big time in our era; they are presently the pillars of modern art-making. Where, one wonders, did this all come from?

Another art expression of considerable controversy, albeit in the movie world, was Martin Scorsese’s film, The Last Temptation of Christ, a film that engendered a storm of protest from angry Christian organizations. Among the protestors was Reverend Don Wildmon who “during his boycott of the Last Temptation of Christ … informed the readers of USA Today of the Jewish background of the studio president that released the film.” [BOLTON, p. 8]

This revelation is considered by Jews as an act of anti-Semitism. The issue – in the political sense – is not whether the Last Temptation of Christ is a good or bad movie. The issue is really the Jewish double standard as dictated by the modern “art” world: Jewish hallowed sanctity (the Holiest of Holies rendered to be the secular Holocaust mythos of Consummate Uniqueness and Irreproachable Innocence), and all other religions and belief systems subject to critical, and deconstructive, attack. While Jewish economic and institutional support is offered to deconstruct Christian mythology in the name of free speech and the expanding of artistic boundaries, a parallel deconstruction of Jewish mythology – religious or otherwise, including the Jewish mythologies of incessant victimization – is unfathomable.

As “conservative” commentator Robert Knight has noted about a 1993 rash of anti-Christian artmaking:

“Included in the Whitney show were [Jewish artist/father] Joel-Peter Witkin’s ‘Maquette for Crucifix,’ a naked Jesus Christ surrounded by sadomasochistic, obscene imagery and many grotesque corpses and body parts. [Jewish artist] Suzie Silver contributed a film entitled A Spy, in which Jesus is depicted as a naked woman with her breasts exposed. It was reminiscent of the Easter event in 1984 at the Episcopal cathedral of St. John the Divine in Manhattan, when a statue of ‘Christa’ was unveiled to give the world an image of Jesus Christ as a buxom, bare-breasted goddess. The Whitney [which is headed by Jewish mogul Leonard Lauder] exhibit also included the famous Andres Serrano work ‘Piss Christ,’ a photo of a crucifix in a beaker of the artist’s own urine, and a film by [Jewish] porn star Annie Sprinkle titled, ‘The Sluts and Goddesses Video Workshop, or How to be a Sex Goddess in 10 Easy Steps.’” [KNIGHT, R., 1998, p. 168-169]

In May 1996 the Jewish entertainment mogul, David Geffen (“whose personal collection of art is perhaps one of the two finest collections in the western United States”) donated $5 million to the Los Angeles Museum of Contemporary Art (MOCA) which renamed an exhibition center after him. (Geffen has also been a philanthropist for immigrant Russian and Ethiopian Jews in Israel). A little over a year later, in August 1997 (under the auspices of Jewish curator Paul Schimmel), the “Geffen Contemporary” featured an art installation by homosexual artist Robert Gober, once an altar boy. The installment featured a life-size sculpture, in classical pose, arms open, of the Virgin Mary. A large metal shaft like a spear protruded from her midsection. “While the spiral drain pipe pokes a hole in the Virgin Mary and her protective dogma,” says art critic Suzanne Muchnic, referring to its accompanying catalogue, “It also functions as a phallic symbol that penetrates her body bloodlessly.” [MUCHNIC, Stop]
The setting up of Gober’s art exhibition was a major undertaking, involving the removal of 8,000 cubic feet of earth, essentially creating a basement for the Geffen Contemporary museum. “No one will specify the total cost of installing the piece,” noted the New York Times, but the Geffen’s own costs approached $200,000. [SMITH, R., p. E1,4]

When Gober first cast the Virgin Mary sculpture in New York, the Italian family that owned the business he hired to do the job initially told him, “You shouldn’t be doing this. If you were a Muslim (and made a similar artwork), you’d be dead.” [MUCHNIC, Stop, p. 6] “The piece,” noted the New York Times, “also set off a storm of protest letters from some of the city’s Roman Catholics, including the director of media relations for the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. Then it received a positive review, with a photograph in the Los Angeles Times.” [SMITH, R, p. E1] (The president of the Los Angeles Times’ parent company, Time-Mirror, has been David Levinthol, who is also the chairman of MOCA’s Board of Trustees). A rally against the artwork at the museum drew hundreds of protesters and the Geffen was barraged by “thousands of letters, most of them negative.” [LA TIMES, 12-20-97, p. B4]

The show continued unabated. Compare this lack of response to protest to the response of the San Jose Mercury-News – the second largest newspaper in northern California – in 1992 when it completely changed its advertising acceptance policy because the Anti-Defamation League, the Jewish Community Relations Council of San Jose and the County of Santa Clara, and the Human Relations Commission saw anti-Semitism in a carpet ad run in the San Jose newspaper’s pages. The ad featured a “Moses-like figure holding tablets above an epithet that said, “Thou Shalt Not Pay Retail.”” [WOLKOFF, p. 25] No more religious characters in ads would be accepted for publication.

In stark comparison, in 1994 Recycled Paper Greetings, the fourth-largest greeting card company in America, headed by Jewish co-founders Phil Friedmann and Michael Keiser, came under heated attack by Muslim and Arab groups for a “get well” card in its line. The card depicted a head-to-toe woman in a black veil and was captioned with “Rather than confront her morbid fear of germs, Millicent changed her name to Yazmine and moved to Tehran.” Inside, noted the Houston Chronicle, there was “irreverent play on the word ‘Mecca’ and ‘Shiiite.’ Hundreds of telephone callers protested to the company and there were two death threats. The company continued to refuse to pull the card from it’s line. [FRANKLIN, S., 1994, p. 9]

When the Gober exhibit finally closed, the Religion page of the Los Angeles Times ran a small article about the artwork (that defamed one of the symbols of the Catholic faith), entitled “Exhibit That Touched Off Catholic Protest Closes.” Next to it, on the same page, in a story many times larger, an article entitled “Reform Rabbis Back Return to Dietary Kosher Laws” respectfully elaborated how some liberal Jews were returning to aspects of Jewish Orthodoxy. [LA TIMES, p. 12-20-97, p. B4]

In 1999, a parallel event occurred on the opposite American coast. The Brooklyn Museum made headlines with its exhibition called “Sensation: Young British Artists from the Saatchi Collection.” New York mayor (of Catholic heritage) Rudolph Giuliani and others were outraged by the show which included real mutilated animals and an artwork entitled, “The Holy Virgin Mary.” This piece “included cut-outs from pornographic magazines and lumps of elephant dung.” Giuliani accused the Museum board of “turning the museum into a preserve of Catholic-bashers, people who have no regard for animals, and no regard for the sensitivities of children.” [CASIMIR, L., p. 4] Visitors to the exhibit were formally warned that the show “may cause shock, vomiting, confusion, panic, euphoria, and anxiety.” [BARSTOW, p. B1] Even the United States Senate passed a resolution condemning public funds for such artwork. (One-third of the Museum’s budget is provided by New York City coffers, another $500,000 in the last three years came from the National Endowment for the Arts).

As Michael Holden of the Baltimore Sun complained:

“Imagine a painting about eight feet tall and five feet wide. The subject? Martin Luther King, Jr., or the prophet Mohammed, or Buddha, or the Star of David. Now cover the face in that painting with elephant dung. Next, surround the figure in the picture with color photographs of female genitalia. Call the finished product ‘art,’ more specifically, a ‘collage.’ Then, try to get a museum or art gallery to display your picture for the public. No one would touch it. Why? Because covering a picture of King or Buddha or the Star of David with feces and pornography would be condemned as a hate crime … But if you take the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus and a central figure in Roman Catholicism as well as in other Christian religions – and cover her image with elephant dung and female genitalia, your picture will be displayed in London and New York art galleries.” [HOLDEN, M., 10-10-99, p. 46]

Based on alleged abrogations of the museum’s stated policies in securing city funds, the Giuliani administration instituted legal actions to pull its funding from the museum. It also accused the Brooklyn Museum of “conspiring with Christie’s auction house, a sponsor of the show, to inflate the value of the artwork displays, which are all privately owned by Charles Saatchi, the British advertising executive.” [HERSZENHORN, p. A1] In turn, the museum sued Giuliani, accusing him of shutting down free speech.

Not surprisingly, most of the central power mongers in this drama – the manipulative inflation of (controversial) art prices, the celebration of the defamation of a Christian icon in the name of free speech, and the glorification of religious attack, were Jewish. These included the owner of all the art work—Charles Saatchi; the head of the Brooklyn Museum, Arthur Lehman; the Chairman of the Board of the museum, Robert S. Rubin; the lawyer who led the counter suit by the museum against the city, “First Amendment expert” Floyd Abrams; and American Civil Liberties Union defender of the museum, Norman Siegel. The New York Times (whose editorial board is largely Jewish; see earlier) printed an anonymous editorial entitled, “The Museum’s Courageous Stand.” (The actual author of the Virgin Mary depiction elevated to fame was not Jewish. He was African. Lerner insisted that critics of the painting were being culturally intolerant, that the animal feces that decorated it was really a fertility symbol.)

The Saatchi show was formulated and first exhibited at the Royal Academy in London; that venue is also headed by a Jew: Norman Rosenthal. For another Rosenthal exhibition, after Sensation, the Times of London noted that the “curators of the Royal Academy insisted yesterday that hardcore porn and images of mutilation by contemporary artists were comparable to the Old Masters. They likened a sado-masochistic video to Michelangelo and Renaissance drawings, a pile of rubbish to the 16th-century painter Giuseppe Arcimboldo, and an assemblage of mutilated toy soldiers to another 16th-century master, Pieter Breughel the Elder. Norman Rosenthal, exhibitions secretary of the 237-year-old institution, and his colleague, Max Wigram, defended the latest objects to fill Burlington House - a sequel to the 1997 Sensation show - against suggestions that they could not be described as art. Walking round the Apocalypse exhibition yesterday before it opens to the public on Saturday, they repeatedly drew comparisons with the Old Masters … Mr Rosenthal was unable fully to explain how it differed from pornography screened in any Soho sex shop: ‘I don’t see porn videos in Soho. This is about men and women. It is a very Existentialist work of art, like a very beautiful drawing.’” [ALBERGE, D., 9-20-00]

London’s Daily Telegraph complained that at this same Royal Academy show, Apocalypse, “its organizer Norman Rosenthal … basks amidst a freak show almost wholly devoid of authentic art.” [JOHNSON, D., 9-20-00] Or, as London’s Guardian noted:

“The Royal Academy is a perverse British institution, and Norman Rosenthal is a perverse institutional figure. You can’t imagine him anywhere else. The [London art gallery] Tate would never have put on Sensation!, the exhibition of Charles Saatchi’s collection the Academy mounted in 1997: how could the Tate have allowed Saatchi to stamp himself on history in that way? But Rosenthal had no qualms about importing all this stuff into the sacred halls of Burlington House, and for many Sensation! is the defining exhibition of young British art, not only here but in America. In his office is a framed front page of the New York Post leading with mayor Giuliani’s attempt to ban the show last year. ‘I was at the opening (at the Brooklyn Museum). All the glamorous people were there. But, he says, no protesters at all. ‘I was almost disappointed. The whole thing took place not in real people’s experience but in the cliches of politicians and journalists. That’s so boring. Art is beyond that.’ This denial of a desire to create a stir is frankly unbelievable. Rosenthal is the epitome of the art curator as showman … Rosenthal’s shows have helped to define British culture now, making the exhibition a phenomenon, a public ritual … Since he became exhibitions secretary more than 20 years ago, Rosenthal has turned the Royal Academy into a venue for event art. Buzz, hype, noise, crowds are what this purportedly posh and staid organisation thrives on.” [JONES, J., 1-4-00]

“As an arts educator, I think that the behavior of the Brooklyn Museum has been self-interested and short-sighted … The Brooklyn show [Sensations] is a perfect example of the improper diversion of public monies – in this case to aggrandize a single British collector [Saatchi], an obnoxious advertising executive of dubious taste … And I’m just as sick of ‘Catholic-bashing’ as Giuliani himself. I may be an atheist, but I was raised in Italian-Catholicism, and it remains my native culture. I resent the double standard that protects Jewish and African-American symbols and icons but allows Catholicism to be routinely trashed by supercilious liberals and ranting gay activists … That a Jewish museum director had no compunction about selecting a parodic image of the Madonna from the whole of [artist] Chris Ofili’s dung-bedecked oeuvre shows either stupidity or malice.” [PAGLIA, C., 1999] [Salon.com even had a subtitle for Paglia’s article, Why are a Jewish collector and a Jewish museum director promoting anti-Catholic art?, but it was later discretely removed. POLLITT, K., THE NATION, 1999]

“Charles Saatchi is clearly the big winner in this,” said Bruce Wolman, editor of Art and Auction magazine, “… Saatchi is not a great advertising man for nothing.” [CONNOR, p. 51] The head of the Brooklyn Museum, Arthur Lehman, also stirred Catholic ire earlier when he purchased an Andy Warhol version of the Last Supper for a Baltimore museum. (In October 1999, the Jewish ethnic magazine Forward noted that the Council of American Jewish Museums “was circulating a letter in support of the Brooklyn Museum of Art in its battle with Mayor Giuliani.” Likewise, “the associates division of the American Friends of the Israel Museum were scheduled to visit the Brooklyn Museum exhibit on October 17. The visit was to be followed by a cocktail reception at the home of the Brooklyn Museum’s director, Arnold Lehman.”) [FORWARD, 10-8-99, p. 5]

And the judge selected to hear the city’s case against the Museum? Nina Gershon, described by the New York Times as having studied “psychiatry and the law at the Hampstead clinic, run by Anna Freud, the daughter of Sigmund Freud. She is married to Bernard J. Fried, an acting state Supreme Court Justice in Manhattan.” [FRIED, J., p. B3] In November 1999 Judge Gershon ruled in the Museum’s favor.

Thus armed, completely insensitive to Catholic complaint, Arnold Lehman and his Brooklyn Museum returned in 2001 with yet another controversial defamation of Catholicism. This time African-American artist Renee Cox was afforded space for her photograph “Yo Mama’s Last Supper,” in image in which Christ is depicted as a nude woman. The curator of this exhibition was also Jewish, Barbara Milstein. [HERMAN, J., 2-16-01] As Catholic Defense League president William Donohue wrote to Ms. Milstein:
“I would love to know whether there is any portrayal of any aspect of history that you might personally find so offensive as to be excluded from an exhibition at the Brooklyn Museum of Art. For starters, would you include a photograph of Jewish slave masters sodomizing their obsequious black slaves? And worry not, when contemplating your answer, just think of it as a work of high artistic merit.” [DONOHUE, W., 2-15-01]

Meanwhile, across the world, in 2001 “the Jewish director of Warsaw’s leading state-funded art space, the Zacheta Gallery” resigned. Anda Rottenberg had been under critical fire and national pressure to be fired for two of her controversial exhibitions. [ART NEWSPAPER, 3-13-01] In the first, she presented the work of an Italian artist who had a life-like sculpture of the Pope (a revered figure in Poland) lying on the floor, crushed by a meteor. Upon viewing the exhibit,

“two MPs [members of the Polish Parliament] from the Catholic nationalist party, Halina Nowina-Konopka and Witold Tomczyk, seriously damaged the sculpture when it was on display … They authors of the attack alluded to the Jewish origins of Anda Rottenberg, the museum’s director, ‘How would [s]he like a sculpture to be sent to the National Museum of Israel showing a rabbi squashed by Stalin or Arafat?’ … The Polish Minister for Culture has been inundated with letters of protest about the sculpture calling for Mr Rottenberg’s dismissal.” [ART NEWSPAPER, 2-23-01]

In the Rottenberg exhibition, it was reported that

“one of Poland’s best known actors and film stars is currently under police investigation and faces a possible prison sentence for slashing a portrait of himself, in an exhibition in Warsaw’s leading contemporary art gallery … The show consisted of an uncaptioned series of photographs of actors in Nazi uniform, taken from film stills without the actors agreement, by the Polish artist Piotr Uklanski … Accompanied by TV cameramen and reporters and as the cameras rolled, the actor Daniel Olbrychski, featured in one of the portraits, pulled a sword from under his greatcoat and slashed some of the exhibits, then tore the two featuring himself from the wall and left. The choice of the sword was significant: it was one used in a film about a swashbuckling Polish hero and patriot Kmicic. Mr. Olbrchski later declared: ‘I defend the right to say that there are some frontiers of decency which were clearly overstepped in this exhibition, and I reacted violently in the hope that my gesture will highlight my objections. I did it in the spotlight of the camera and flashlights because I wanted Poland to know my feelings about such ‘artistic practices.’ Furthermore, I received the agreement of other actors whose portraits were in the show, including the French film star Jean-Paul Belmondo who agreed that I should protest in their name. I can understand that there are opportunistic artists but I cannot understand why a director of such a serious institution as Zachenta has accepted this. Soon Mrs. Anda Rottenberg will organize an exhibition at which she will expose the faces of known actors on lavatory paper because she considers that as we are public figures she is entitled to do so.” [ADAM, G., 2001]

* Note a similar museum case in 1968 and a different result (an example of the usual double standard), when the Jewish community felt defamed by a New York City art institution. A Metropolitan Museum of Art catalogue for its African-American photography exhibition, Harlem on My Mind, was decried as anti-Semitic largely because of the comments about the Jewish community by African-American author Candice Van Ellison. Van Ellison noted high amounts of anti-Semitism in the Black community, due to, as she saw it, the many Jewish landlords in Harlem, the many Black servants and maids in Jewish homes, and other forms of exploitation. Jewish pressure forced the museum to pull the catalogue from circulation, despite the fact that the curator of the show and head of the catalogue was Jewish, Allon Schoener, and the fact that Van Ellison’s offending comments were merely paraphrases of quotes from a sociological study by Jewish author Nathan Glazer and non-Jew Patrick Moynihan. [HOVING, T., 1993, p. 176]

The curator of the Metropolitan, Thomas Hoving, recalls that he received a call from the office of then-NYC mayor John Lindsey, who was also under heat from the Jewish community to act against the catalogue. “Lindsay,” said Hoving, “called upon me to withdraw [the catalogue] at once.” “My advice to you,” (Jewish) mayoral aide Joe Feldstein told Hoving, “is to act now. Do what the Mayor wants or you’re in deep shit!” [HOVING, T., 1993, p. 171] “Two members of the City Council,” notes Hoving, “were calling for a hearing – at once! – to consider halting all funds for the museum until the offensive catalogue was removed from sale … [HOVING, p. 172] … There were increasing outcries from City Council members to ‘launch an economic boycott against the Metropolitan’ …[HOVING, p. 173-174] … On Thursday … twelve of the more prominent members of the City Council issued a resolution requesting the immediate withdrawal of the catalogue and the withholding of city funding until such time.” [HOVING, p. 175]

Museum trustees even called in a former (Jewish) Secretary of Labor, Arthur Goldberg, to provide advise about how to resolve the situation. The trustees hoped Goldberg could “figure a way out of this mess” but “what he did was almost the opposite. Goldberg intoned that in his view there was nothing to be gained by the ‘continuance of offering for sale the offending catalogue.’” [HOVING, T., 1993, p. 173] Even the New York Times, defender of “free speech” in the later Brooklyn Museum’s defamations against Christianity, “published a bitter editorial condemning the show and its anti-Semitic statements.” [HOVING, p. 174]

The offending catalogue was published under Metropolitan auspices by Random House. The president of Random House, Robert Bernstein, and its chairman, Bennet Cerf, were both Jewish. Hoving notes that Cerf and Bernstein,

“who had distinguished career fighting for civil rights all over the world, had called [curator and catalogue head Allon] Shoener to task, asking him to issue a personal apology for the catalogue. Schoener had refused. The publishing executives had informed Schoener that under the continuing and increasing pressures from the Jewish community, they might not be able to hold out much longer on withdrawing the book. Schoener said flatly, ‘But that would be book-burning.’ Cerf, incensed, shaking all over, thrust his finger towards Schoener’s face and shouted, ‘Do you know what you have done to Random House?’” [HOVING, T., 1993, p. 174-175]

The Metropolitan Museum and Random House soon caved in to Jewish pressure and withdrew the catalogue.

Likewise, notes J. J. Goldberg, “In 1994 the San Francisco Jewish community rose up and protested an anti-Semitic mural on the student union building at publicly funded San Francisco State University. Unlike the Brooklyn Museum [and its Saatchi collection], San Francisco State backed down.” [GOLDBERG, J. J., 10-8-99, p. 14]

Also, in 2001, due to immediate pressure from both private individuals and the city of Los Angeles, part of a mural painted by two Hispanic artists in Los Angeles on private property was painted over even before it was finished. The offending section – part of a “timeline” about the Hispanic experience in California – depicted “an unflattering caricature of a Jewish landlord.” The mural was in Boyle Heights, an area of Los Angles once largely Jewish, and now Hispanic. Although Jewish slumdors are a verifiable part of ghetto history throughout America (See Chapter 20, p. 734, p. 889, p. 889), the landlord image was even construed – sight unseen – by the local SPARC artist organization, as the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles tells it, to be “hateful and racist.” Even a non-Jewish local artist, Dawn Pentecost, volunteered to destroy the art work in her neighborhood. “I don’t think we have to accept expressions of anger and hate in our environment,” she told a Jewish reporter, “We have to have standards.” [TEITELBAUM, S., 3-12-01]

Also in 2001, always eager to check anything that depicts Jews or Judaism in anything less than an idealistic light, the American Jewish Congress formally protested “B.C.” cartoonist Johnny Hart for his depiction (at Easter) of the candles of the Jewish menorah going out, being replaced at the end of his comic strip by a cross. “Supercessionism,” the AJC declared, “the belief that Christianity can and will replace Judaism, has been strongly repudiated by many leading Catholic and Protestant theologians … Whatever the cartoonist’s personal beliefs, the sudden insertion of religiously offensive cartoons into the comics section of Sunday newspapers is highly inappropriate and abuses readers, especially young children, who turn to B. C. every week.” There are certainly such people who have bowed to such Jewish lobbying pressure, but not only is Christianity a “supercessionist” faith, but so is Islam, which holds that the prophet Mohammed is the last in the line of prophets descending from Jewish and Christian tradition. And how is Juda-ism itself not “supercessionist?” How could it not be? Judaism was invented in a social, political, and religious vacuum? The AJC “urged newspapers across the country to either replace [the cartoon] or print a disclaimer on Sunday.” [AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS, 2001]
“Washington is an easy place to be Jewish these days. There are some 200,000 Jews living in the area, making this the seventh-largest Jewish community in North America … No one would dispute that area Jews are disproportionately represented in the upper echelons of law, politics, medicine, science, journalism, accounting, and other professions.” [The Washington DC Jewish community includes “at least 62 synagogues” and “32 Jewish preschool and day schools.”]

Barbara Matusow, MAY 2000, p. 79

“Jewish organizations like to deny that there is such a thing as a Jewish lobby, which is, of course, nonsense, but it may fairly be said that the massive strength of the Zionist lobby is of comparatively recent origin.”

Chaim Bermant, 1977, p. 253

“Oscar Cohen, a long-time official of the Anti-Defamation League, wrote to a friend that by the 1970s organized American Jewry had become ‘an agency of the Israeli government… follow[ing] its directions from day to day.’”

Peter Novick, 1999, p. 149

“The president of the United States is concerned about our intelligence. He goes to the president of Israel and asks him to share the secrets of Mossad, the Israeli intelligence agency. The Israeli president is unable to help him but suggests something. He tells the president, ‘If you want to know anything, just go to the synagogue. The Jews there know everything.’ The president dresses up in a skull cap, beard, and all the accouterments of the religious Jew and goes to a temple. He sits down next to an old Jew and says, ‘What’s happening?’ The old Jew says, ‘The president is going to be here.’”

“With money in hand, you can demand.”

Old Yiddish folk saying, [KUMOVE, S., 1985, p. 178]

“Follow the money.”

Common folk wisdom about any given political situation

“No election [in modern America],” says Lenni Brenner, “would be thought complete without the domestic politicians, down to the ranks of mayors and city council members, rushing to appear before Jewish organizations to reaffirm their fealty to ‘the only democracy in the Middle East.’” [BRENNER, p. 9] “While some Jewish agencies have persistently denied the existence of a Jewish vote,” says Stephen Isaacs, “just as persistently the politicians have pandered specifically to ‘Jewish’ interests and issues. The pandering has been especially observable since 1948, when the state of Israel was created.” [ISAACS, p. 142]

“The percentage of Jews … who involve themselves in party affairs as policy-makers and fund-raisers,” noted Will Maslow, general counsel of the American Jewish Congress, “is probably higher than any other racial, religious, or ethnic group. The result is that Jews play a role in the political life of the country whose significance far transcends their proportion of the total population.” [BRENNER, p. 121] There are, suggested the 1999 Jewish Democratic Council executive director, Ira Foreman, a “disproportionate number of opinion leaders among Jews.” [ROTH, B., 10-11-99] Jewish theologian and political activist Seymour Siegel suggested that the “messianic drive is present in many great Jews. Having lost the faith that there is a God, but not wanting to give up messianism, they go into politics …” [ISAACS, p. 20] “The pursuit of salvation through politics is a modern disease,” wrote Norman Podhoretz, “And a lot of Jews are infected with it.” [ISAACS, p. 26]

“American Jewry cannot claim the dubious distinction of being normal,” notes Henry Feingold, “It is, to be sure, shaped by the American society with which it casts its lot; but it also has, as part of it, Jewish connections, a long separate history of its own that shapes its vision. It lives delicately suspended between two cultural pulls, the Jewish and the American. It’s that connection to k‘lal Yisrael, the mysterious tie that binds Jews everywhere together, and that also determines its unique political character … It is also that connection that compels American Jewry to exert a special effort to influence the United States government … United States foreign policy contains the most discernible signs of a specific Jewish influence.” [FEINGOLD, p. 115] Jewish influence in American popular culture and government is so great that sociologist Irving Horowitz even felt comfortable asserting that “the critique of American imperialism, reformism, and welfarism readily spills into a critique of America’s Jewish element.” [HOROWITZ, I., p. 91]

So what is the main Jewish concern in high level American politics? Crime? Pollution? The unemployment rolls? The economy? Racism? “In the world of big-league Jewish politics,” noted the Baltimore Jewish Times in 1996, “one question overshadows all others, year after year: how friendly is the current [White House] administration of Jewish and pro-Israel interests? Jewish leaders may be interested in a host of domestic and international issues. But in the end, an unfriendly administration, or one that sends mixed signals, becomes the central organizing principle of Jewish political life.” [BESSE BESSE BESSE [LOVE], p. 34]

“[Israel supporters’] influence,” wrote former United States Congressman Paul Findley in the 1980s, “is pervasive throughout the government and in almost every aspect of life, private and public, across the United States.” [FINDLEY, p. xxvi] Behind the scenes Jewish American political and economic lobbying for governmental concessions to Jewish concerns has a long history.
In 1906, for example, financier Jacob Schiff and other wealthy Jews formed the American Jewish Committee, initially to help fellow Jews across the world in Russia. One way to accomplish this was to put severe economic pressure on the Tsar’s economy. American President Taft, however, was not receptive to Jewish demands for an abrogation of the Russo-American trade treaty. “Calling upon friends and resources,” says Edwin Black, “the [Jewish] Committee began a widespread public appeal to have Congress force the President to end commercial relations with Russia. Within weeks, House and Senate abrogation resolutions – each personally approved by the Committee – were prepared.” [BLACK, p. 31] The rescinding of the treaty passed in a vote shortly thereafter.

Powerful financier Bernard Baruch (whose father was a South Carolina member of the Ku Klux Klan) [COIT, M., p. 12-13] was head of President Woodrow Wilson’s War Industries Board during World War I. [PLESUR, M. 1982, p. 86] A 1957 dust jacket blurb for his biography notes that “for nearly fifty years Bernard M. Baruch has been almost as well known to most Americans as that of the President of the United States, and yet he has never held an elective office … Mr. Baruch is best known in the role of ‘adviser’ not only to six Presidents, but to Cabinet members, congressmen, generals, diplomats and party leaders … As Chairman of the War Industries Board in the First World War, he controlled the entire industrial establishment of the country.” [COIT, M., 1957]

Jeffrey Potter notes his influence in the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration, when, in 1944, the President fell ill:

“The condition was serious enough for him to go to Bernie Baruch’s plantation, Hobcaw, in South Carolina, for recuperation. FDR didn’t really like his host, [Jewish media mogul] Dorothy [Schiff] explained, as both he and Eleanor thought Baruch too conservative, but he was a source of campaign funding.” [POTTER, J., 1976, p. 194] (Schiff was also an influential friend of Roosevelt: “By the time Dorothy visited [Roosevelt] at Warm Springs, Georgia, a few weeks before Christmas, 1938, she no longer felt ill at ease. As usual, she had to make her own travel arrangement, and it never occurred to her to wonder why it wasn’t done for her. She now suspects [Roosevelt] was afraid to have it known that it was always at his invitation that they met.”) [POTTER, J., 1976, p. 155]

Another such case is that of Jewish Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis, “one of [President Woodrow] Wilson’s key advisers.” [MURPHY, B., 1983, p. 27] “After meeting with Jacob de Haas, a former secretary to [Zionist leader] Theodore Herzl in 1912,” notes current Jewish Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer, “[Brandeis] joined the American Federation of Zionists and started making public remarks in support of Zionism … In 1917 … his intervention with President Wilson helped secure American support for the Balfour Declaration [in support of a Jewish state in Palestine], thereby assuring its issuance. In 1938, not long before his death, he called upon President Roosevelt, seeking FDR’s public diplomatic support for allowing more Jewish refugees to travel to Palestine.” [BREYER, p. 18] [De Haas actually became Brandeis’s secretary.] [MURPHY, B., “Since Brandeis,” notes Kevin Avruch about the Zionist currents in American government, “the Zionist movement in America functioned effectively as banker for the world [Zionist] movement and as a fulcrum for the political leverage sometimes needed to mobilize American presidents and public opinion in support of the Jewish cause.” [AVRUCH, K., 1981, p. 32] “

By 1956, American Secretary of State John Foster Dulles complained that “I am aware of how almost impossible it is in this country to carry out a foreign policy not approved by the Jews.” [SORIN, p. 216] On another occasion, long before Jews had built their modern political machine, he complained about the “terrific control the Jews have over the news media and the barrage which the Jews have built up on Congressmen … I am very much concerned over the fact that the Jewish influence here is completely dominating the scene and making it almost impossible to get Congress to do anything they don’t approve of. The Israeli Embassy is practically dictating to Congress through influential Jewish people in the country.” [FINDLEY, DEL, p. 105]

In 1984, Admiral Thomas Moorer, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, complained that “I’ve never seen a President – I don’t care who he is – stand up to [the Jews] … They always get what they want. The Israelis know what is going on all the time. I got to the point where I wouldn’t write anything down. If the American people understood what a grip these people have got on our government, they would rise up in arms.” [CURTISS, p. 267]

Another former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General George J. Brown, told an audience at Duke University that “[the Jewish lobby] is so strong you wouldn’t believe now. We have the Israelis coming to us for equipment. We say we can’t possibly get the Congress to support that. They say, ‘Don’t worry about the Congress.’ This is somebody from another country, but they can do it.” [CURTISS, p. 267] Brown’s comments almost cost him his job when Jewish lobbying groups attacked him with charges of anti-Semitism.

A distinction must be made, wrote Republican Senator Charles Matthais, “between ethnicity, which enriches American life and culture, and organized ethnic interest groups, which sometimes press causes that derogate from the national interest.” American elected politicians, adds the senator, “have been subjected to recurrent pressures from what has come to be known as the Israel lobby.” [BLITZER, p. 134]

“During the 1944 presidential campaign,” notes Steven Spiegel, “[Franklin D.] Roosevelt was pressured into promising to work for the establishment of Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth [i.e., modern Israel].” [SPIEGEL, S., p. 12] “There were so many Jews in Roosevelt’s advisory entourage – Samuel Rosenman, Benjamin Cohen, Felix Frankfurter, David Lilienthal, Bernard Baruch, Anne Rosenberg, Sidney Hillman, and David Niles,” says Jewish scholar Barnet Litvinoff, “as well [Louis] Brandeis, [Henry] Morgenthau [Roosevelt’s Secretary of Treasury from 1933-45], and [Herbert] Lehman [the governor of New York] – that many people believed that the President himself must be descended from German Jews.” [LITVINOFF, S., p. 41] (“During the war, Republican campaigners, referring to Roosevelt’s prominent Jewish associate Sidney Hillman, put up billboards across the nation: ‘It’s Your Country—Why Let Sidney Hillman Run It?’) [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 42] “David Lilienthal was chosen by Roosevelt to direct the Tennessee Valley Authority, an agency that virtually reshaped the role of government toward business. Later, he was also chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.” [PLESUR, M., 1982, p. 142]

At least three of Roosevelt’s “Palace Guard,” reputedly his seven “most intimate advisers,” were Jewish (Frankfurter, Niles, and Rosenman). [MURPHY, B., 1983, p. 257] Rosenman was an official Roosevelt speechwriter; Frankfurter, a Supreme Court justice, was an unofficial one. The judge also “gradually advanced himself till he was virtually an informal campaign manager [of Roosevelt’s presidential campaign], playing a central role in every aspect of the campaign, from drafting speeches to plotting election strategy. [MURPHY, B., 1983, p. 194-195, 205] “Roosevelt surrounded himself with so many unmistakably Jewish advisers,” notes Barbara Matusow, “that his enemies took to branding his programs the ‘Jew Deal.’” [MATUSOW, B., MAY 2000, p. 79] Leo Rosten was a “popular Jewish writer” and head of the Office of War Information’s ‘Nature of the Enemy’ department. [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 27] In 1943, William Bullitt, a former ambassador was complaining that “the Roosevelt administration’s emphasis on the European war as opposed to the Asian one was the result of Jewish influence.” [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 28]

Roosevelt himself once joked, when running into Samuel Rosenman, Stephen Wise (a rabbi and World Zionist Organization president) and Nahum Goldmann (who succeeded Wise in the Zionist group) outside his weekend home in the country (where Rosenman rented a home nearby): “Carry on, boys, Sam will tell me what to do on Monday … Imagine what [Nazi leader] Goebbels would pay for a photo of this scene: the President of the United States taking his instructions from the three Elders of Zion.” [GOLDMANN, N., 1978, p. 156] (Decades earlier, President Theodore Roosevelt’s Jewish circle included Oscar Solomon Strauss, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor who declined an offer to become the country’s Secretary of Treasury. “He was afraid,” says the director of the American Jewish Historical Society, Michael Feldman, “too close an association of Jews and money would be bad for the image of the Jew.” [LIEBLICH, J., 8-19-2000, p. A10] Earlier there was Julius Rosenwald, the Sears-Roebuck mogul: “An unabashed admirer of the solid conservatism of William Howard Taft, and one of his most loyal supporters within the Jewish community, Rosenwald contributed generously to the campaigns of every Republican candidate of his era. He was an especially ardent backer of his friend Herbert Hoover, contributing $50,000 to Hoover’s 1928 presidential campaign and becoming a close adviser and confidant during his presidency.”) [DALIN, D., 1998] Close to Hoover was also Lewis Strauss, Hoover’s “private secretary” and “lifelong friend and trusted confidant.” “Strauss’ volunteer job would not only start a lifelong friendship with Hoover but also open up channels of cooperation and amity between Hoover and leading members of the Jewish community.” [WENTLING, S., 2000, p. 377, 382] “In March 1919, as the feast of Passover approached, Hoover was asked to ensure that the Jews of Poland received flour in time to make Passover bread. The chief readily complied.” [WENTLING, S., 2000, p. 383]

As early as the 1940s, Zionist propaganda to move American foreign policy to Zionist dictates was massively orchestrated. As Melvin Urofsky notes

“Zionist groups organized massive petition and letter-writing campaigns. President Roosevelt received one such petition in January 1945 seconding the Biltmore program [favorable policy to the Jews in then-Palestine] and signed by more than 150 college presidents and deans and 1,800 faculty members drawn from 250 colleges and universities in 45 states. A total of 41 state legislatures and hundreds of municipalities, representing more than 90 per cent of the nation’s population, approved pro-Zionist resolutions.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 34]

Roosevelt was, of course, a Democrat. From the Republican Zionist side against Roosevelt, Arthur Hertzberg notes the case of Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver, president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis:

“[Silver] remained a factor in Republican politics, because he could and did produce the necessary Jewish votes in Ohio, especially for his friends in the [politician] Taft family. As a Zionist leader he translated this power into political leverage against Franklin Delano Roosevelt, when the latter faltered on Zionist issues.” [NEUSNER, J., 1972, p. 40]

In the next American presidency, notes Steven Spiegel, “it is astonishing that [President Truman] was not more pro-Zionist, given the pressures on him … [SPIEGEL, S., p. 16] … Truman was often bitter about the Zionist pressures on him. ‘If Jesus Christ couldn’t satisfy them here on earth,’ he is reported to have exclaimed, ‘how the hell am I supposed to?’” [SPIEGEL, S., p. 20] Under Truman, a Jewish White House officer, David Niles, “was strongly committed to the Zionist cause; he was not only prepared to argue with the President in favor of a Jewish state but to counter the effects of the [White House] bureaucracy … [SPIEGEL, S., p. 17] … [Niles’] modus operandi seems to have been to act for the president as long as Truman had not ordered him against a particular action … Truman does not seem to have known precisely what Niles was doing.” [SPIEGEL, S., p. 29]

“Our great stroke of luck,” wrote World Zionist Organization president Nahum Goldmann, “was that Roosevelt was replaced by Harry Truman … He said: ‘My friends are Jews, the Jews want partition [in Palestine], all right, they can have it’ … The president had a Jewish childhood friend called Jacobson, his co-partner in a shop before we went into politics, and it is partly due to this man that we got the Negev [desert as part of modern Israel].” [GOLDMANN, N., 1978, p. 33] Eddie Jacobson, member of a B’nai B’rith lodge in Kansas City, flew to Washington DC to expressly implore Truman to see Zionist leader Chaim Weizmann. As Melvin Urofsky notes:

“Although Truman was always glad to see old friends, as soon as Jacobson started talking about Palestine, the President tensed and said that he would rather not discuss the subject, letting the whole problem run its course in the United Nations. But Jacobson, by now very self-conscious, would not stop, even when Truman started complaining about ‘how disrespectful and how mean’ some of the Jewish spokesmen had been.” [UROFSKY, 1978, p. 165]

Theo Thackery, the non-Jewish husband of Dorothy Schiff (then-owner of the New York Post and granddaughter of famous Jewish investment banker Jacob Schiff), explains an incident he had with President Harry Truman in the White House:

“Almost immediately in the conversation [Truman] said, ‘Now Thackery, if only the goddamn New York Jews would just shut their goddamn mouths and quit hollering ... They’re screwing up the situation, and I could get along with them, if they would just get together and decide what the hell they want. They’re all over the lot, the goddamn Jews, and here you are, not even a Jew, representing the spearhead that’s causing all kinds of hell.’ I had to say, ‘Well, Mr. President, you make it impossible for me to continue this conversation. I’ve got to assume by ‘goddamn New York Jews’ you must mean my wife, who is a Jew. I know you better than to believe that you are consciously anti-Semitic, but I consider it absolutely outrageous.’ Immediately, I went to his press secretary and the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. I told them I’d had this absolutely terrible conversation with the President and suggested he be advised more clearly on such matters.” [POTTER, J., 1976, p. 202-203]

Melvin Urofsky notes the successful Zionist pressures upon American government towards the founding of the modern Jewish state of Israel (in 1948):

“Edwin M. Wright has charged that ‘the Zionist propaganda machine was efficient and thorough, blanketing the American political processes in systematic campaigns targeted at the general population, city halls, state houses, and on up the ladder to Washington.’ A study of American periodical coverage of the Palestine debate confirmed that the Zionist viewpoint dominated the medium, with an emphasis on the humanitarian and religious aspects of the movement. Recent studies of Harry Truman’s role in the propartition [of Arabs and Jews in then-Palestine] decision agree that Zionist-generated political pressure proved the major factor in the White House overruling State Department advice, a conclusion James Forrestal [the Secretary of Defense] bitterly reached thirty years ago.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 147]

Behind the scenes Zionist lobbying for special favors swayed FBI director J. Edgar Hoover (he turned a blind eye to Jews smuggling arms out of the U.S. to the Jewish army in Palestine), [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 157] and New York City mayor William O’Dwyer (who arranged for policeman to abandon guard of a Zionist cache of weapons headed also to the Middle East.) [UROFSKY, p. 157]

In recent decades, President Dwight D. Eisenhower in the 1950s best resisted Jewish lobbying pressures. As Melvin Urofsky notes,

“The first five years of the Eisenhower administration … marked the low point in relations between the Israeli and American governments.
One analyst has suggested that Eisenhower, as the only President from Truman to Ford who did not serve in Congress, had never been exposed to Jewish political pressure. Eisenhower’s military career had shielded him from this experience, and of all recent Presidents, he showed, the least inclination to befriend the Jewish community.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 305]

During Eisenhower’s administration, in 1956, in a secret plan devised with France and Great Britain (both which had interests in the Suez Canal), Israel – in an act in direct contradiction to American foreign policy interests – invaded Egypt’s Sinai desert. Then, despite Eisenhower administration and United Nations insistence that Israel withdraw from the territory it had seized, the Jewish army remained. Urofsky notes the American Jewish mood of the period and its efforts to dictate American foreign policy:

“Although American Jews agonized over Israeli intransigence, they did not worry about the old charge of dual loyalty. Here was the classic case that the anti-Zionists of the American Council for Judaism [a now extinct Jewish anti-Zionist group] had so fearfully predicted: a clash of policies between the United States and Israel, with American Jews caught in the middle. What would they do? They bombarded Congress and the White House with demands and protests that the Eisenhower administration pursue a more pro-Israel course. Some experts believed that American Jews would hesitate before contributing – even indirectly – to a nation at odds with their own. Yet just the opposite happened. UJA contributions jumped 20 per cent, from $58.8 million to $70.6 million.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 315]

Eisenhower was an exception in his resistance to incessant Jewish pressures. What has increasingly developed over recent decades in American government, much more the governmental norm, was bluntly addressed on June 6, 1972, by a troubled U.S. citizen, Norman F. Dacey, of Southburg, Connecticut, who bought a full page ad in the New York Times to state his perception that the United States had become “a dancing bear, responding dumbly to the commands given by the government of Israel and indirectly through a potent fifth column which operates here in America and which gives blind obedience to the Zionist credo that all Jews everywhere owe national loyalty to Israel.” The Jewish community responded to Dacey’s ad with outrage; the Anti-Defamation League even bought Times space for a rebuttal. In the midst of a unified Jewish attack against the Times for allowing such an ad, the Jewish vice-president of the paper, Sydney Grenson, formally apologized to the ADL for printing the critical ad, saying that the Times was “trying to work out a policy with the Advertising Acceptability Department to make sure that even the barest chance of such an implication for any ethnic group should not appear in the paper.” [FORSTER/EPSTEIN, p. 120-121]

Jewish influence in (and upon) government is extraordinary. In the spring of 1977, for instance, Congress passed a bill that prohibited American corporations from complying with the ongoing Arab economic boycott against Israel.
“The bill was hammered out between Jewish defense agencies and the Business Council, a prestigious, high-powered big business organization headed by Du Pont’s chairman, Irving Shapiro.” [KREFETZ, p. 92] “The pro-Israeli banks were so dominant in the field,” said Business Week, that they ‘cannot realistically be avoided because of their sheer size.” [KREFETZ, p. 98] “The domestic political game played around the activities of the United States in the Middle East has only one major player,” says Seymour Lipset, “the organized Jewish community who, with campaign contributions, activism, and media influence, constitute a major force.” [LIPSET, p. 157]

In November 2001, during the chaotic Palestinian Intifada (uprising) against Israeli occupation and international outcry against repeatedly bloody Israeli invasions of Palestinian towns and territory (let alone Israeli campaigns of “targetted assassinations”), 89 U. S. Senators wrote a formal letter to President George W. Bush and “urged him not to restrain Israel from retaliating fully against Palestinian violence and to express his solidarity with Israel soon.” “There is constant concern about the administration’s wavering,” declared Jewish Senator Arlen Specter, “[Secretary of State Colin] Powell talks about the cycle of violence that suggests one produces the other and that there is a moral equivalency, which is not true. Terrorists killing civilians is totally unjustified, and Israel’s response is self-defense.” [SCIOLINO, E., 11-17-01]

This focus on Jewish international concerns in United States governmental actions, even aside from Israel, often overrules American ones. “In 1979,” says Jewish scholar Stephen Whitfield, “… the FBI had arrested two Soviet spies operating on American soil. The spies were exchanged not for Americans in Soviet custody but for five Soviet nationals who were political prisoners, including two Jews convicted …. nine years earlier. For American diplomacy to consider the lives of non-American citizens so precious was a pointed contrast to its failures before and during the Holocaust.” [WHITFIELD, American, p. 16] In 1986, a Jew, Karl Koecher “one of the most important [Soviet] spies in United States history” was released from an American prison in exchange – not for an American, but – for Soviet dissident Anatoly Acharansky who then moved to Israel and later became the Jewish state’s Minister of Trade to capitalist Russia. [DEUTSCHE PRESSE AGENTUR, 1-26-97; KESSLER, R., 9-17-98, p. C1]

In 1973 the Jewish Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, “convinced the Soviets that Jewish emigration was a necessary price for winning … coveted trade benefits.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 171] “In 1975,” notes Menachem Kaufman, “when President Ford and Secretary Kissinger were unable to convince the Rabin government [in Israel] to withdraw from the Mitla and Gidi Passes in Sinai without a formal renunciation of belligerency by the Egyptians, the Ford administration placed a partial curb on U.S. military and financial support for Israel. American Jewish reaction was a nationwide campaign of support for Israel.” [KAUFMAN, p. 247] In May 1977 Congress passed an anti-boycott bill against the unified Arab economic war against the Jewish state. “The Jewish organizations,” notes J. J. Goldberg, “had worked together more or less seamlessly, securing the cooperation of friendly Jews in the news media, business, the administration, and Congress. The result was a major change in United States policy.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 171]

Prominent (Jewish) CBS television newsman Mike Wallace wrote about the Jewish lobby that heavily leaned on the media, and him, in 1975:

“At that time the so-called Jewish lobby was one of the most powerful pressure groups in America. That is no slur but a simple statement of fact. It was organized, well-financed and extremely savvy, especially when it came to dealing with the media. According to The Power Peddlers, a book published in 1977 about the effect of lobbying activities in the United States, ‘The Israeli lobby is unique among lobby groups with its ‘clout’ with the press. [No other lobby] has succeeded in making reporters look over their shoulders as much as the Israeli lobby.’” [WALLACE/GATES, 1984, p. 286-287]

Jewish influence in the American government is well-known in political circles throughout the world. In 2000, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported on this phenomenon, in an article entitled Nations See Jews as Key to Winning with U. S. :

“Why U. S. Jews want to meet with world leaders is clear and well known. The focal point of most of these meetings is Israel and how the Jewish state can strengthen alliances around the world. Why world leaders want to meet with Jews is more interesting, less publicized, and to some Jews, discomfiting. These leaders believe in Jewish power … In fact, Jewish leaders nowadays receive mostly red-carpet treatment. They have access to the corridors of power in most capitals around the world … American Jewish leaders explain all this buttering up in euphemistic terms, suggesting that foreigners have a fascination ‘with or appreciation’ for American Jews. But when pressed, Jewish leaders admit the true driving force behind it is the lingering belief that Jews are capable of making or breaking relations with the United States and capable of wrecking havoc on the world’s financial markets.” [JORDAN, M., 9-13-00]

Per the Jewish state, by 1994, wrote Benjamin Ginsberg, “that fully three-fourths of America’s foreign aid budget is devoted to Israeli security interests is a tribute in considerable measure to the lobbying prowess of AIPAC [the American Israel Public Action Committee] and the importance of the Jewish community in American politics.” [GINZBURG, p. 2] “Each year the United States Congress donates to Israel the equivalent of $1,000 for every Israeli man, woman, and child,” complained former Congressman Paul Findley, “No matter how sharply Congress cuts other items in the Federal budget, gifts to Israel sweep through without restrictive amendment or murmur of opposition. My years on Capitol Hill led me to conclude that aid to Israel is more sacrosanct there than even social security or Medicaid.” [FINDLEY, p. xxvii] … Since 1987 direct economic and military aid to Israel has annually totaled $3 billion or more. In addition, financial arrangements worked out solely for Israel bring the total to about $5 billion a year … [FINDLEY, p. 110] “The magnitude of United States support for Israel,” notes Cheryl Rubenberg, “– militarily, politically, economically, and diplomatically – goes beyond any traditional relationship between states in the international system.” [FINDLEY, DEL, p. 111] “By the late 1980s,” notes Glenn Frankel, “Israel was not only receiving more United States foreign aid than any other country, but also getting it at more favorable terms than anyone else. While other countries received their economic aid in quarterly installments, Israel got its aid in a lump sum at the beginning of the year, allowing the Israelis to make an extra $75 million in 1991 by investing in United States Treasury bills.” [FRANKEL, p. 223] In the 1990s, when the 104th Congress “slashed nearly all other foreign assistance,” Israel got its regular $3 billion. [BLOOMFIELD, D, Election, p. 52]

“More than one-third of United States world-wide aid,” notes Richard Curtiss, a former career foreign service officer, “has gone annually to one of the smallest and least populous countries on earth.’ [CURTISS, p. 2] The total amount of U.S. taxpayer aid to Israel since 1949 totals well over $83 billion – a value of $14,346 for every single present Israeli. [CURTISS, p. 4] In addition, notes Curtiss, “fueled by the unique U.S. law that grants U.S. tax exemption to donations from the U.S. to any Israeli institution that is exempt from Israeli taxes, the total of tax-exempt [private] U.S. donations to Israel now approaches $1 billion annually.” [CURTISS, p. 6] (Israel and the worldwide Jewish lobby has even managed a deep cash-flow from Holocaust guilt-ridden Germany. Since World War II, Germany has paid $95.64 billion in restitution payments to mostly Jews worldwide, “of which approximately $26 billion has gone to individual recipients in Israel or the state of Israel itself.” [CURTISS, p. 8]) While Israel regularly gets its huge sums, the neglect of other nations is breathtaking. A Washington Post commentator noted in 1999 that “the United States ranks last among developed nations in percentage of resources devoted to foreign aid.” [OVERHOLSER, G., p. 7]

Jane Adas notes that

“All the funding for the National Endowment for the Arts since its creation in 1966 amounts to less than eight months of aid to Israel; the $10 million cut in funding for PBS equals 16 hours of aid to Israel; in 1996 cuts in programs for America’s poor totaled $5.7 billion, cuts in aid to Israel were zero, aid to Israel was $5.5 billion.” [APAS, p. 106]

Among the results of the gigantic American welfare program for Israel (and its subsequent welfare programs) is that noted by Israeli scholar Menachem Friedman: “The establishment of the state of Israel as a western welfare state created nearly ideal economic and social conditions for the flourishing of special Haredi [ultra-Orthodox] educational institutions.” [FRIEDMAN, M., p. 185]

And Israel’s repayment for such phenomenal aid? In 1999, even ardent pro-Israeli (and Jewish) columnist William Safire was aghast at Israel’s installing of aerial reconnaissance radar on Chinese planes. Worth hundreds of millions of dollars to the Jewish state, Safire said the deal reflected “Israel’s amoral policy.” “This flies in the face of U.S. security interest,” he wrote, “… American forces will be directly threatened by Chinese air, naval and missile forces emboldened by Israel’s Phalcon battle management

... Though candidates for U.S. President today are fearful of raising this question, American supporters of Israel want to know if Israel tips the technological balance against a democratic American ally in Asia [Taiwan], why should the United States guarantee that Israel continue to have a ‘qualitative edge’ in the Middle East?” [SAFIRE, W., 12-25-99]

In 1995, Duncan Clarke, professor of international relations and coordinator of the United States Foreign Policy field at American University, addressed the threat to America of widespread Israeli resale of American weapons systems:

“Other countries have been caught evading U.S. re-export controls, but Israel’s case appears unique. Not only is it the beneficiary of massive U.S. support, but it is also by far the principal offender and foremost concern of U.S. officials responsible for implementing the laws on re-export of U.S. defense products. Unauthorized Israeli re-transfers of U.S. defense items and technology are of particular concern for several reasons, say U.S. officials: Israel re-exports much more often than do other allies and with more sensitive technology; it sells to ‘pariah’ states with which the United States refuses to deal; its sophisticated defense industry makes re-transfers harder to track than other arms exporters; and its re-transfers are generally governmentally sanctioned and not simply the result of a wayward company, as is usually the case elsewhere. Israel’s unauthorized re-transfer of U.S. defense products is part of a larger pattern of illicit behavior that includes diversions of U.S. military aid, industrial espionage, and improper end use of U.S. military equipment. Israel often re-transfers U.S. defense products to states that are potentially hostile to the United States or are blatant violators of human rights. These re-transfers have threatened American commercial interests, compromised intelligence, upset regional stability, strained diplomatic relations, and confirmed the U.S. national security bureaucracy’s long-standing distrust of Israeli technology transfer practices.” [CLARKE, D., 1995, p. 89-90]

Israeli weapons retransfers include versions of the U.S. Sidewinder missile, aerial refueling systems, the Popeye missile, the Star cruise missile, the Arrow missile, thermal imaging tank sights, space launch vehicles, and jet fighters. [CLARKE, D., 1995, p. 104-107] What kind of country are we apparently dealing with here? “Israel,” adds Clarke, “engages in unauthorized defense re-exports largely to nourish its economy’s large defense sector and because it is confident, for good reason, that Washington will not or cannot enforce the law. Indeed, the Clinton administration relaxed curbs on the transfer of sensitive technology to Israel despite Israel’s dismal record record of unauthorized transfers. There has been a persistent pattern of misconduct ... Israeli scholar Ehud Sprinzak holds that his society is afflicted with an ‘elite illegalism’ that is central to the country’s domestic political culture and international behavior ... [E]lite illegalism deprecates the idea of the rule of law and assumes ‘that democracy can work without a strict adherence to law,’ as Sprinzak writes. He asserts that past leaders like Moshe Dayan

(a ‘soverign personality’ above the law) were role models for a generation of IDF officers.” [CLARKE, D., 1995, p. 108-109]

In 2001, an Israeli newspaper noted that the United States might literally become a parking lot for Israeli weapons:

“Israel has asked the United States to permanently base some Israeli fighter jets at a U.S. Air Force in America for combat training of Israeli pilot, officials of the two countries said Wednesday.” [HAARETZ, 8-2-02]

“Because the security and welfare of Israel are so pivotal to Jewish destiny,” says Jewish scholar Stephen Whitfield, “and to the future of the Jewish people everywhere else, pro-Zionism has become the prerequisite for the practice of Jewish politics in America.” [WHITFIELD, p. 103] Jewish members of the 99th United States Congress included eight seats in the Senate and 29 in the House of Representatives. By this time Jews had also chaired the Council of Economic Development, the Federal Reserve Board, the National Security Council, as well as headed the Department of Defense and the American delegation to the United Nations. [WHITFIELD, p. 92] By 1996, slowly – but ever – increasing, 10 of the 100 U.S. Senators were Jewish (over representing their population percentage by 400%). By 1998 the number was 11. In the House of Representatives, before the Republicans gained control of that body, (http://jewishtribalreview.org/jincong.htm) 7.5% of the House, [GOLDBERG, JJ, Bagels, p. 13] more than a 300% overrepresentation of the Jewish population in America. Among these Jewish Congress members was Marjorie Margolies-Mezvinsky, a former reporter for NBC. Prominent 1970s-era New York Congresswoman Bella Abzug was probably not atypical in her political perspective when she declared: “Ever since my youth I’ve been a Zionist, and I’ve worked hard for the cause of Jewish homeland too. I’ve visited Israel and I’ve raised my kids with a very strong background in Jewish culture. Besides that, I spent a couple of years of my life as a Hebrew teacher!” [ABZUG, B., 1972, p. 70]

In 2001, the (Jewish) Forward noted the situation for Jewish influence in the now Democratically-controlled Senate (thanks to a defection by a Republican senator to the Democratic side):

“Nothing symbolized the prospect of increased access more clearly than one stark demographic statistic: The 50 Democrats who make up the Senate’s new majority caucus will include nine Jewish members, just shy of one-fifth. The Republican caucus includes just a single Jewish member, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania. Some of those Jewish Democrats will hold positions of crucial importance to Jewish activists when the Senate changes hands. Senator Carl Levin of Michigan is slated to chair the Senate Armed Services Committee, which oversees crucial areas of U.S.-Israeli military cooperation. Senator Dianne Feinstein and Senator Barbara Boxer, both of California, will chair the subcommittees dealing with domestic and international terrorism respectively on the Judiciary and Foreign Relations committees. Most observers expected little in the way of a shake-up in Middle East policy following the shift. ‘We don’t expect much of a change,’ said Ken Bricker, spokesman of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the leading pro-Israel lobby. “That’s one of the benefits of being an organization that places so much emphasis on bipartisanship.” [DONADIO/SCHWARTZ, 6-1-00]

By the 1970s and 1980s more and more Jews were highly visible in positions of great political power in government. At the local level, mayors of New York City (Ed Koch); Atlanta (Sam Massell); Kansas City (Richard Berkeley); Omaha; and San Francisco (Diane Feinstein) were Jewish. Jewish mayors with tenures in the late 1980s and 1990s (some into the new century) included those of San Diego (Susan Golding); Indianapolis (Stephen Goldsmith); Dallas, Texas (Annette Strauss); San Jose (hub of California’s hi-tech Silicon Valley: Susan Hammer); Portland, Oregon (Vera Katz); Las Vegas (Oscar Goodman); St. Paul, Minnesota (Norm Coleman); Louisville, Kentucky (Jerry Abramson); Tucson, Arizona (George Miller); Virginia Beach, Virginia (Meyer Orbendorf); Toronto, Canada (Mel Lastman); Prescott, Arizona (Sam Steiger); and Ottawa, Canada (Jacquelin Holzman). Linda Lingle was also the “mayor” of Maui County in Hawaii for a time in the same era. Even the ceremonial Lord Mayor of London, England, is Jewish: Peter Levene. Much earlier in his career, controversial TV talk show host Jerry Springer was the mayor Cincinnati. [JEWHO, 2000] Even the mayor of Fargo, North Dakota, was Jewish in the 1970s. [GOLDEN, H., 1973, p. 6]

In Massachusetts, The Jewish Advocate noted in 1994 that “[the Boston-area town of] Chelsea’s former mayor, Joe Pressman – also a Jew – was indicted for corruption shortly after the city was taken into receivership.” [SINERT, M., 12-22-94, p. 1]

Jewish state governors over the years have included those of Oregon (Neil Goldschmidt), Madeline May Kunin (Vermont), Rhode Island (Frank Licht and Bruce Sundlun), Connecticut (Abraham Ribicoff: also Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under John F. Kennedy), and New Mexico (Arthur Seligman). David Barrett served a term as the premier of Canada’s British Columbia in the 1970s. [JEWHO, 2000] In 1977, the Jewish governor of Maryland, Marvin Mandel, and four others were “convicted of conspiracy to have the Governor influence race track legislation in return for $380,000 in bribes.” [AYRES, B.D., p. A1] (Shortly thereafter, in 1982, another Maryland Jewish politician was sentenced to prison. Baltimore City Council President Walter Orlinsky pleaded guilty to “one count of extortion … [He also] conceded that the Government could prove other charges against him.”) [NYT, 9-23-82, p. A24] [BALTIMORE JEWISH TIMES, 1-23-98, p. 8]

Kenneth Duberstein was Chief of Staff to the President from 1988-89. Philip Klutznik was President Jimmy Carter’s Secretary of Commerce. He was also the honorary president of the World Jewish Congress and a “former president of B’nai B’rith International, who raised millions of dollars for Israel.” [OLIVER, M., p. A16] In 1959, he was instrumental in holding, for the first time, the B’nai B’rith yearly gathering in the Jewish state. [GRUSD, E., 1966, p. 268] Carter’s Secretary of Treasury, W. Michael Blumenthal was also of Jewish heritage, as was his Secretary of Defense, Harold Brown. Philip Klutznick was Secretary of Commerce and Neil Goldschmidt was Secretary of Transportation. “Two of the top nine aides” to Carter were also Jewish, Robert Lipshutz (formerly head of the Atlanta chapter of B’nai B’rith) and Stuart Eizenstat. Other prominent Jewish officials in the Carter administration included Kenneth Axelson, Anthony Solomon, Julius Katz, and Arthur Borg. [LILENTHAL, A., p. 236; PLESUR, M., 1982, p. 142] Robert S. Strauss [was] “Carter’s choice for almost everything.” [PLESUR, M., 1982, p. 143]

Under Republican president Gerald Ford, prominent individuals of Jewish heritage included Henry Kissinger (Secretary of State), James Schlesinger (Secretary of Defense), and Edward Levi (Attorney General). History could have been different: Kissinger’s parents almost emigrated from Germany to Israel. [GOLDMANN, N., 1978, p. 158] “You are much more Jewish unconsciously than consciously,” Zionist lobbyist Nachum Goldmann once told him. “This,” wrote Goldmann, “is quite apparent in his attitude to Israel.” [GOLDMANN, N., 1978, p. 163] “During Israel’s first years as a nation,” notes Steven Silbiger, “the United States offered it very little financial or military aid. The huge influx of direct aid occurred during the Nixon administration in the 1970s under the leadership of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the first Jew to hold the position. Aid skyrocketed from $300 million to $2.2 billion annually, making Israel the recipient of more U.S. dollars than any other nation.” [SILBIGER, S., 2000, p. 52]

Appointed positions, however, are not everything. Nor are electoral seats, of course, the real locus of political power. “The one question that Jewish activists tend to tiptoe around,” wrote Stephen Isaacs in 1974, “is the one concerning Jewish money … Jewish money has played a significant role in the current exercise of power … [It] can sometimes play a major factor in whether a senator has won re-election.” [ISAACS, p. 260] “It is one of the worst-kept secrets in American Jewish politics,” noted J. J. Goldberg, “that the campaign contribution is a major key to Jewish power … Almost none of those involved in the process of Jewish campaign funding … donors, fundraisers, candidates, monitors … are willing to talk about it on the record … Jews fear that discussing Jewish money will encourage anti-Semitic conspiracy theories. Non-Jews fear that talking about it will leave them open to charges of anti-Semitism. But it is a fact … [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 266] … The most notorious use of Jewish campaign money is not to support candidates who have been friendly, but to oppose those who have been unfriendly.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 269]

Jewish money in Washington D. C. was even crucial in the very founding of the modern state of Israel. Jewish Democrats Dewey Stone, Abe Feinberg, Ed Kaufmann, and others were key fundraisers for Harry Truman’s Presidential campaigns; they were also Zionists. Going against the will of his own State Department, Truman followed the Zionist line in supporting a 1947 United Nations vote for the partition of Palestine into Jewish and Arab sections. Afterwards, said long time Democratic activist and brother-in-law of John F. Kennedy, Stephen Smith: “Two million dollars went aboard the Truman [campaign] train in a paper bag, and that’s what paid for the state of Israel.” [COCKBURN, p. 26-27]
During the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration, “at the urging of [prominent wealthy Jews] Henry Morgenthau, Sr. and Felix Warburg” the president appointed James D. McDonald as “high commissioner for refugees (Jewish and others) coming from Germany … The bulk of financial support McDonald received came from private Jewish relief societies. Of his advisory council of twenty voluntary agencies, ten were Jewish, and Felix Warburg was personally obliged to supplement McDonald’s meager salary … McDonald [was] … a lifetime supporter of Jewish causes and eventually [became] America’s first ambassador to Israel.” [NICHOLS, p. 43-44] “The State Department representatives [among advisers to President Truman],” notes Melvin Urofsky, “strongly urged that a trained foreign service career officer be nominated, but the President [Truman] after politely listening to their nominees (nearly all of whom came from the Middle East desk), chose James G. McDonald.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 186] Under Secretary of State Robert Lovette, for example, “questioned whether McDonald’s known sympathy for the Zionist cause ought not to disqualify him.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 187]

John F. Kennedy had a strongly negative reaction in 1960 to the conditions Jewish contributors demanded for their donations to his presidential campaign (their “initial” contribution was $500,000). Seymour Hersh notes a conversation Kennedy had with a friend, newspaper columnist Charles L. Bartlett:

“’As an American citizen [Kennedy] was outraged,’ Bartlett recalled, ‘to have a Zionist group come to him and say: We know your campaign is in trouble. We’re willing to pay your bill, if you’ll let us have control of your Middle East policy.’ Kennedy, as a presidential candidate, also resented the crudity with which he’d been approached. ‘They wanted control,’ he angrily told Bartlett.” [HERSH, p. 97]

Among these Jews was Abraham Feinberg, president of the Israel Bonds Organization, who “had helped bankroll Harry S. Truman’s seemingly doomed 1948 presidential campaign; by the presidential campaign of 1960 he was perhaps the most important Jewish fundraiser for the Democratic Party. There was nothing subtle in his message: the dollars he collected were meant to insure continued Democratic Party support for Israel.” [HERSH, p. 93] “My partner to power,” said Feinberg, “was cooperation in terms of what they needed – campaign money.” [HERSH, p. 94] To appease Jewish interest in Kennedy’s White House, Myer Feldman, a liaison to the Jewish American community, was also afforded extraordinary access to “monitor all of the State Department and White House cable traffic on the Middle East.” [HERSH, p. 99] Robert Kennedy, the president’s brother, noted in an interview published in 1988 that Feldman’s “major interest was Israel rather than the United States.” [HERSH, p. 100] Feldman also helped write Kennedy speeches and was “an adviser to columnists Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson.” [BLUMAY, C., 1992, p. 66] Also, ‘One of Kennedy’s most trusted, and little-known advisers during the 1960 campaign [was] Hyman Raskin, a Chicago lawyer who had helped manage Adlai Stevenson’s presidential campaign in 1952 and 1956.” [HERSH, S., 1997, p. 90]
Upon election, John F. Kennedy lobbied unsuccessfully for ways to reform “the financial base of our presidential campaigns.” “In a statement that was far more heartfelt than the public or press could perceive,” says Hersh, “he criticized the current method of financial campaigns as ‘highly undesirable’ and ‘not healthy’ because it made candidates ‘dependent on large financial contributions of those with special interests.’” [HERSH, p. 97] So important to Democratic purse strings, Abe Feinberg became influential in the Kennedy White House and even managed to get the beholding president to appoint Feinberg’s brother, Wilfred, to a position as a federal judge. [HERSH, p. 97-98] (On the Israeli side of things, he was eventually rewarded for his lobbying efforts on behalf of the Jewish state by being allowed to be a principal owner in the Coca-Cola franchise in Israel. [HERSH, p. 192]) Pierre Salinger was Kennedy’s Press Secretary. Even a Jewish New York physician, Max Jacobson (the infamous “Dr. Feelgood” to so many Hollywood celebrities), regularly drugged the President with painkillers and stimulants, so much that some in the White House entourage began to worry about the President’s reliance upon them. “Carrying his bag of drugs and needles,” notes Seymour Hersh, “[Jacobson] ‘came and went’ in and out of the White House without challenge. He was part of the ‘inner circle.’” [HERSH, S., 1997, p. 234]

In modern political America, in the competing attempts to buy influence, one half of major donations to the Democratic Party is believed to come from Jews, [SLAVIN, p. 20] as is one half of Democratic Presidential campaign funding. [GOLDBERG, p. 276] As early as 1967, William Domhoff, in Who Rules America?, found that 50% of the highest echelon of campaign contributors (“of whom we could find information”) to the Democratic Party in 1960 and 1964 were Jews. [DOMHOFF, p. 95] “Jews donate or raise as much as half of all Democratic Party campaign funds,” noted Jewish author Steven Silbiger in 2000, “… Again, to quote the Jewish proverb, ‘He who pays has the say.”’ [SILBIGER, S., 2000, p. 55] (In 1968, of 21 people who loaned Hubert Humphrey more than $100,000 for his failed Presidential bid, 15 were Jewish. [TIVNAN, p. 84]) Understandably, in 1970, Jewish entrepreneur Robert Strauss was named Treasurer of the Democratic National Committee. “The tiny world of Democratic political consulting and fundraising is a world that is dominated by Jews,” noted J. J. Goldberg in 1996, “Many of them are former employees of AIPAC [the pre-eminent pro-Israel political action committee] and the UJA [United Jewish Appeal].” [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 275] (Even the American Revolution reputedly relied in great part upon Jewish money, particularly Hayim Solomon: “Legend has it,” says Julia Lieblitch, “that George Washington appealed for funds to financier Hayim Solomon on the highest of holy days, Yom Kippur.”) LIEBLICH, J., 8-19-2000]

In 1977 Steve Chapple and Reebee Garofalo noted the research of sociologist G. William Domhoff who had “pointed out that principals in Gulf and Western …, 20th Century Fox, and MGM have been part of what he calls the ‘Jewish Cowboy’ fundraising clique that forms a significant part of the Democratic party’s financial base. Arthur Krim and Robert Benjamin, key powers at United Artists, and directors of the parent firm Transamerica have been major Democratic fund raisers in New York. Benjamin has also been a member of the Council on Foreign Relations. MCA’s Lew Wasserman has also long been an important behind-the-scenes figure in the Democratic Party.” [CHAPPLE, p. 222]

Investigative journalist Dan Moldea wrote an entire volume about the relationship of Republican President Ronald Reagan to MCA, noting that: “President Ronald Reagan’s professional life – his acting career, his personal fiscal fortune, and his rise in politics – has been interwoven with and propelled by a powerful, Hollywood-based entertainment conglomerate named MCA. For nearly fifty years, Reagan has benefited both personally and financially from … the Music Corporation of America – as well as his close associations with the firm’s top executives: Jules Stein, Lew Wasserman, and Taft Schreiber.” [MOLDEA, p. 1]

Stein and Schreiber were prominent Republican activists; Schreiber even was a co-chairman of the finance committee to re-elect Reagan. [MOLDEA, p. 266] Wasserman, a friend of Reagan’s and once his personal Hollywood agent in his movie years, was, as noted, a prominent Democrat. “The antitrust problems [MCA had with the government],” notes Dan Moldea, “would be eliminated in the future by maintaining good relations with both political parties … While Stein and Schreiber covered the GOP, Wasserman was busy making friends with the Democrats. He became a close friend of Lyndon Johnson, a relationship he never discussed, and became a key fund-raiser in the Democratic Party.” Wasserman even reportedly turned down an offer to be Johnson’s Secretary of Commerce. [MOLDEA, p. 236] (There were also problems with MCA’s link to organized crime. Wasserman even reportedly risked a meeting in his office with mobster Meyer Lansky and mob lawyer Sidney Korshak in 1965). [MCDOUGAL, p. 328]

At an awards ceremony for Wasserman in 2000, notes Mother Jones magazine, President

“Clinton joked that he had been to so many fundraisers at Wasserman’s home that, ‘I half expected him to prorate this year’s property tax and send me my share.”’ [MOTHER JONES, 5-3-01]

Jews were also key in the Reagan administration’s Iran-Gate scandal [when his administration circumvented a Congressional ban on funding the Contra rebels of Nicaragua by secretly selling weapons to Iran and using the resultant money to pay for Contra weaponry.] Four Israelis – Yaakov Nimrodi, Al Schwimmer, David Kimche, and Amiram Nir – who “arranged the weapons deliveries” demanded immunity from prosecution during a Congressional investigation of the matter. [Three Israelis were also granted immunity in the Jonathan Pollard spy investigation]. [SINAI, R., 1987] The Jerusalem Post reported in 1994 that [Jewish] National Security Adviser Howard Teicher “was being called the mastermind of the [Iran-Gate] affair.” [RODAN, S., 1994, p. 18] The Jerusalem Report also noted heavy Israeli involvement in the “October Surprise” that many believed was planned for Reagan to gain the American presidency: “Regarding just weeks ago as a paranoid delusion, the theory of a secret 1980 deal between the Reagan-for-President campaign and revolutionary Iran is now official Senate business … Conservative versions of the theory allege that Israeli officials cooperated with the Reagan campaign in what amounted to a bid to prolong detention of U.S. hostages [in Iran] to tilt the 1980 election away from incumbent Jimmy Carter … The current flap seems to have Israeli fingerprints all over it.” [GOLDBERG, J.J., 6-11-91, p. 26]

Yet another Jewish Iran-Contra player was Elliot Abrams. “An Assistant Secretary of State under President Reagan,” noted the Jewish Week in 1997, “who pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor counts during the Iran-Contra scandal, Mr. Abrams has reinvented himself as a leading advocate of increased Jewish religiosity.” [FORWARD, 11-14-97, p. 14] (Reagan himself went far out of his way in asserting Jewish allegiance. “Astoundingly,” notes Anthony Bianco, “Reagan once told Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir that he had seen firsthand the devastation wrought by the Holocaust as a member of an army film crew that filmed the liberation of the concentration camps. ‘From then on,’ Reagan said, ‘I was concerned for the Jewish people.’ The fact was, though, that Reagan never left the United States during World War II and indeed lived at home with his wife throughout his four years in uniform.” [BIANCO, A., 1991, p. 14]

Another angle to Jewish criminal elements in Washington is the case of Teamsters president Jackie Presser (also Jewish, he took the helm of the union in 1984). Presser, well-known to be associated with organized crime (like the Teamsters itself), was the highest paid union official in America at $530,000 a year. He was appointed to act as a senior labor adviser in the Reagan administration (the Teamsters union was the only major labor organization that supported Reagan’s candidacy). [BARRON, p. 4] Presser’s uncle, Allen Friedman, has written a book about his own life in the union and its links to the underworld. In the Washington realm, he notes, “a few years ago, Bill Presser handed me a briefcase he said was filled with cash and told me to take it to [Reagan official] Edwin Meese in Washington … After Reagan [became president], he named Bill’s son, Jackie Presser, to his transition cabinet. Then he wanted to make Jackie under secretary of labor, though I guess cooler heads prevailed.” [FRIEDMAN, A., 1989, p. 3] In the Zionist realm, “Jackie sold Israel Bonds and raised money to build a children’s home in Israel. He also convinced the Teamsters rank and file to buy such bonds, the union leadership and locals buying more than 25 per cent of all the bonds sold in the United States in 1977.” [FRIEDMAN, A., 1989, p. 257] (Russell Mokhiber adds that the Teamsters Union “was not alone in its fondness for the [Israeli] notes. Despite below-market yields and unusually high risk, some of America’s largest unions, pension funds and major corporations have collectively loaned billions of dollars to the Israeli government. Israel’s violent repression of the Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and Gaza – and the threat the uprising poses to Israel’s shaky economy – appears not to have affected investor confidence. Nathan Zirkin [also Jewish], comptroller for the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, told the Multinational Monitor that his union ‘absolutely’ plans to continue purchasing Israel bonds, despite the repression in the occupied territories. ‘The Palestinians didn’t have a damn thing until Israel came in,’ Zirkin said.”] MOKHIBER, R., 4-88]
Presser’s “close associate” in Los Angeles, Marty Bacow, was once involved in Detroit’s (Jewish) Purple Gang. [MCDOUGAL, p. 456] Another Jewish Teamster official from Presser’s home state, Harold Friedman, president of the Ohio Council of Teamsters, was “convicted of racketeering and embezzling” in 1989. [FRIEDMAN, A., 1989, p. 264] In Minnesota, in 1995, the (Minneapolis) Star Tribune noted a few more Jewish Teamsters in trouble, including Jack Mogelson, also a former Board Member of the American Civil Liberties Union in that state:

“Mogelson has been a familiar figure for decades in labor, civil rights and political circles in Minnesota. So when the state’s largest Teamsters’ local was placed in trusteeship earlier this month for alleged financial improprieties, the name on everyone’s lips was Mogelson – not because he is considered less or more culpable than his three fellow officials [president Robert Wiesenburger; Treasurer David Morris; and vice president Lawrence Bastian], but because he’s the one people know … By most accounts Mogelson is a man of contrasts: an old style unionist with liberal leanings, a forceful representative of law enforcement who has been arrested for soliciting a prostitute and who in his youth took a baseball bat to a cop who was arresting his brother for shoplifting … A dedicated activist, Mogelson has fought passionately on a range of issues from workers’ rights to the security of Israel.” [HODGES, J., 5-15-95]

Among other accusations, Teamsters financial indiscretions by the above officers included $55,000 from union funds for sports tickets; $28,000 for message therapists; $7,800 for magazine subscriptions; and a $20,000 (apiece) Teamsters raise for themselves when the union chapter was in financial difficulty.

Then there is the Newspaper and Mail Deliverers Union:

“Formed in the early 1900s, the Newspaper and Mail Deliverers Union was equal parts Irish, Italian, and Jewish, a reflection of the city’s then dominant ethnic groups. Well into the 1970s, Jewish racketeers played a major role in the union … In more recent times, a hustling gangster named Irving Bitz – nicknamed ‘the Little Guy’ for his diminutive stature – also helped keep peace among mob factions in the industry. Bitz, an NMDU member who also ran Imperial News Service, carried his own fearful legend: the feisty businessman was credited with the 1931 slaying of famed [Jewish] gambler Legs Diamond … In 1959, [Bitz] was convicted of conspiring with NMDU officials to control Long Island’s newspaper and magazine deliveries. Bitz remained a powerful force in the industry up until the day in 1981 when his trussed-up body was found in a Staten Island swamp. His murder was never solved.” [Robbins, T., 3-701]

In 1993 a controversial book about former FBI chief J. Edgar Hoover appeared, written by Anthony Summers. Subtitled The Secret Life of J. Edgar Hoover, Summers claimed the decades-long director was a closet homosexual and cross-dresser. This has been refuted and ridiculed by others. Summers argued that the reason Hoover didn’t – inexplicably – corral organized crime was because Meyer Lansky, the Jewish head of “The Syndicate,” had incriminating photographs (or other documentation) of the FBI director. For what it’s worth, fact or fiction, in this outrageous scenario brewery mogul Lewis Rosentiel (also Jewish) plays a key role:

“Early in Hoover’s career, according to mob interviews, he was trapped by his own homosexuality. Mafia boss Meyer Lansky, who specialized in the use of damaging information to manipulate men in public life, had reportedly obtained compromising evidence – probably photographs … [p. 13] … ‘The homosexual thing,’ said [Lansky associate Sidney] Pollock, ‘was Hoover’s Achilles’ heel. Meyer found it, and it was like he pulled strings with Hoover. He never bothered any of Meyer’s people …’” [p. 243] … By the end of World War II [Rosentiel’s] company, Schenley, had become the leading U. S. distiller … Rosentiel’s lifelong involvement with the Mafia came to light only in 1970 … [p. 248] … [Rosentiel’s fourth wife] Susan Rosentiel’s final and most sensational revelations suggest her husband and [Jewish lawyer] Roy Cohn [famous as the right-hand man of Senator Joe McCarthy during the so-called witch-hunts for communists in the 1950s] involved Edgar in sex orgies – thus laying him more open than ever to pressure from organized crime.” [SUMMERS, A., 1993, p. 253]

“In the thirties,” adds Summers, “Edgar began a long association with the columnist who reigned as the nation’s premier purveyor of gossip for thirty years, Walter Winchell [also Jewish].” [SUMMERS, A., 1993, p. 84] Summers also notes Lansky’s underworld in support of the U.S. government war efforts:

“The OSS [precursor to the CIA] and Naval Intelligence had extensive contacts with the Mafia during World War II, enlisting the help of criminals in projects including the hiring of burglars and assassins, experimentation with drugs, the protection of American ports from Nazi agents and the invasion of Sicily. Lansky helped personally with the latter two operations, meeting with Murray Gurfein, a New York Assistant District Attorney who later became one of William Donovan’s most trusted OSS officers.” [SUMMERS, A., 1993, p. 245]

In 1999, a Tennessee newspaper published an alarming front page article. “The shadow of organized crime,” said the Tennessean,

“has descended on Tennessee’s political landscape, via campaign contributions from the operator [Rod Aycox] of Georgia-based ‘auto title’ loan companies. The man who operates these companies was the top individual contributor to Tennessee’s 1998 political campaigns. Court documents show he is also a business partner of a Florida man, Alvin Malnik, who has been found to have close ties with the mob … Malnik’s associates have included some of the country’s top mobsters.”

The article is not about Aycox (who is depicted as merely a mob front), but Malnik, who in 1997 received half the profits of Aycox’s businesses and in 1999 completely bought him out. Malnik, who lives on a 34-acre estate in Boca Raton, with a private bowling alley and Arabian horse area, was once director of the Bank World of Commerce, a known shell company for mob money laundering. Malnik was also a business partner with mobster Sam Cohen, including
Robert Kennedy once wrote about another formal (Jewish) Teamster member, Paul Dorfman:

“[Dorfman] was a big operator – a major figure in Chicago’s underworld who also knew his way around in certain labor and political circles ... [Teamsters boss Jimmy] Hoffa made a trade with Dorfman. In return for an introduction to the Chicago underworld, the [investigating government] Committee found, Hoffa turned over to him and his family the gigantic Central Conference of Teamsters Welfare Fund Assistance.” [MARRIS, 1989, p. 383]

(Earlier, in 1983, another Dorfman, Allen, former manager of the Teamster’s Central States Pension Fund, was found murdered). [MOLDEA, 1989, p. 366]

Also from Chicago, came mob-linked lawyer Sidney Korshak, also Jewish, and a mainstay in every book about underworld crime and Hollywood. As Dennis McDougal notes:

“While he was gaining a foothold in Hollywood, Korshak continued to practice law in the Chicago loop. Among his closest associates was Alderman Jacob Arvey, a celebrated political fixer in his own right, as well as a pal of Capone syndicate since the 1920s. Alex Louis Greenberg’s longtime business partner in Lawndale Enterprises, Inc., Arvey [also Jewish] was the most powerful figure in Chicago politics. Korshak’s younger brother, Marshall, also became an Arvey protégé and went on to become a state senator, and one of the primary conduits between the Chicago Mob and the Illinois Democratic political machine.” [MCDOUGAL, p. 141]

(Jacob Arvey, notes Harry Golden, “controlled the Democratic Party in Illinois from 1947 to 1959.” By the early 1970s, seven Jews sat on Chicago’s City Council; the Sheriff of Chicago-area Cook County was also Jewish, as was the mayor’s press secretary, who wrote “many of the mayor’s speeches.”) “When they were Democrats,” noted Chicago committeeman Bernard Neistein, in the same era, “the Illinois State Legislature was empowered to invest surplus funds in Israeli bonds.” [GOLDEN, H., 1973, p. 210-211, 216, 218, 220]

Another pal of Sidney Korshak was yet another Jewish lawyer, Paul Ziffren. In 1960, the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee praised Paul Ziffren, saying he “has been the greatest single force and most important Democrat in the resurgence of the Democratic party in California.” Not long after, a Reader’s Digest article outlined “Ziffren’s long-standing ties to major organized crime figures.” [MOLDEA, p. 137] According to a Los Angeles Police Department report, Ziffren was also a supplier of prostitutes to the wealthy and powerful: “It is a matter of general police knowledge that Ziffren’s name appears in many of the call girl trick books which are confiscated by police when these individuals are arrested ... All readily admit to being in the Ziffren service department.” [MCDOUGAL, p. 278]
Many Jewish politicos move in close quarters. As Dennis McDougald notes:

“Just as Wasserman’s close friend and ally Paul Ziffren quietly controlled the California delegation of the Democratic National Committee for many years, so [Jewish lawyer Ed] Weisl ran the New York delegation of the party, particularly during the 1960s when all three would become confidants of President Lyndon Johnson.” [MCDOUGAL, p. 231]

Infamous Jewish lawyer Roy Cohn notes that

“Edward Weisl, Sr., the Democratic power broker who was to become President Johnson’s chief confidant, poured out an earful of venom against Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, who had voted against Paramount Pictures in a major anti-trust case. Weisl, a good friend of Paramount’s president Barney Balaban [also Jewish], had gone to Douglas to ask for his vote. He thought he had every right to do this because he was one of Douglas’s closest pals. As Weisel put it to me: ‘We got him in as head of the Security Exchange Commission, we put him over the rim for the Supreme Court nomination with FDR when there were five other people ahead of him, we made the bastard. And now we ask him for something like this, something perfectly proper, and he tells us to drop dead.’” [ZION, S., 1988, p. 22-23]

Former Democratic National Committee Chairman Robert Strauss was also, since 1980, a member of MCA’s Board of Directors (Wasserman’s company). [MCDOUGAL, p. 461]

A more recent example of above-the-table, reputable purse strings influence in Hollywood is the clout wielded by the three Jewish media moguls – David Geffen, Stephen Spielberg, and Jeffrey Katzenberg, and their personal business empires in recent years melded into one, Dreamworks SKG. Dreamworks “became the largest contributor to the Democratic Party with donations totaling over $2 million.” [GOODMAN, p. 379] “I don’t want to present myself as a person with influence,” Geffen remarked in an interview. “Then,” reports Fred Goodman, “he proceeded to return telephone calls to Michael Ovitz, Lew Wasserman, Barry Diller, Ted Field, and several others arranging for them to meet President Clinton when he passed through Los Angeles the following night.” [GOODMAN, p. 379]

In the election year of 1996, Bill Clinton’s re-election year to the presidency, the top six individual donators to the Democratic Party were Jewish moguls from Hollywood:

David Geffen – $575,000
Lew Wasserman – $507,000
Steven Spielberg – $503,000
Jeffrey Katzenberg – $408,000
Sidney Sheinberg – $321,000
Edgar Bronfman, Jr. – $318,000
The three greatest individual beneficiaries of this political philanthropy were California’s two Jewish senators, Diane Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, and West Los Angeles (Jewish) Congressman Mel Levine. President Clinton and Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy ranked fourth and fifth in the amount of money received from the above-mentioned six Jewish moguls. West Los Angeles Congressman Howard Berman, also Jewish, was the next ranked beneficiary. [MCDOUGAL, p. 520] In overview, a 1992 Los Angeles Times article noted Mel Levine to have been the object of the largest Jewish donations in the city. “When it comes to the potency of pro-Israel giving,” the paper noted, “... Representative Levine is exhibit A ... Levine has been one of Capitol Hill’s most vocal supporters of Israel.” (Levine’s father-in-law, Max Greenberg, once headed the Anti-Defamation League). [MILLER/MORRIS, 1-26-92, p. A1] And as the Jewish Telegraphic Agency noted after Levine later left office, “One of [Vice President Al] Gore’s oldest and closest friends in Los Angeles is former Representative Mel Levine.” [TUGEND, T., 2-16-2000, p. 8]

The central members of another – largely Jewish – Hollywood Democratic fund-raising political clique of the 1970s (called by Ronald Brownstein the “Malibu Mafia”) included Sidney Sheinbaum (whose wife is the daughter of film mogul Harry Warner), Norman Lear, Miles Rubin, Ted Ashley, Max Palevsky, Harold Willens, and Leopold Wyler.

In 1992, the Los Angeles Times also singled out another local key Jewish political fundraiser (this one in the garment business), Stanley Hirsh: “Hirsh is one of the financial magnets who draws politicians from all over the United States to Los Angeles.” “We have a book at the house,” he told the newspaper, “that my wife keeps with records of annual votes by candidates that we follow. A lot of it is how they vote on Israel [and two other issues].” “[MILLER/MORRIS, 1-26-92, p. A1] The Times article focused on the treasure trove of (overwhelmingly Jewish) political money available from the wealthy of the city, noting that

“For individual candidates from either party, supporting Israel may well be the single most important thing they can do to help themselves raise money in Los Angeles. Above all else, this means voting for the annual foreign aid bill, which currently contains $3 billion for Israel ... Most of the biggest political beneficiaries of Los Angeles largesse in 1989 and 1990 are regarded as important friends of the Jewish state ... [Paul Simon of Illinois] became a hero to the pro-Israeli community in 1984 when he ousted former Sen. Charles H. Percy, an influential critic of Israel ... By all accounts [Congressional] pro-Israel credentials give them special entre and appeal.” [MILLER/MORRIS, 1-26-92, p. A1]

Elsewhere, in 1998, billionaire Haim Saban, “the biggest Israeli player in Hollywood, ... hosted a fund-raiser at his home [in Los Angeles] for President Clinton that yielded $1.5 million in donations.” [TUGEND, T, 3-28-99] “[The Sabans,” notes the New York Times, “have given as much as $10 million over the years to the Democratic Party and its candidates.” [WEINRAUB, B., 3-4-01, sec. 3, p. 2] (In Canada, Gerald Schwartz, head of the Onex corporation, friend of both liberal and conservative politicians, “became a major fundraiser.” ) [NOBLE, K., 10-11-99] Margery Tabankin, also Jewish, headed the “powerful Hollywood Women’s Political Committee” and “ruled the glittering world of left-liberal political fundraising in Tinseltown” till 1997 when she took over the reins of Steven Spielberg’s $55 million Spielberg Foundation. “She also heads the Barbara Streisand Foundation.” [FORWARD, 1-5-01]

Across the country, at America’s other nerve center, in 1994, Crain’s New York Business journal published the results of a report listing “New York’s top contributors to federal elections, parties, and political action committees.” All of the top five money donors mentioned were Jewish: Bernard Schwartz, CEO of the Loral Corporation; Maurice Templeton, chairman of Lazare Kaplan International; Arthur Ortenberg, co-founder of Liz Claibourne Inc.; Robert Rubin, former co-chairman of Goldman Sachs & Co. and later a Bill Clinton cabinet member; and Jeffrey Keil, president of the Republic New York Corporation. [FEIDEN, p. 6] In October 2000, the Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz noted that S. Daniel Abraham, founder of the Slim-Fast company, was “the Democratic Party’s single heaviest private donor, contributing no less than $993,000 over the past 18 months.” [LEIBOVICH-DAR, S., 10-13-2000]

In 2001, Mother Jones magazine listed the top 400 individual contributors to political [Democratic and Republican] campaigns. [MOTHER JONES, MAY 2001] These are the people who seek to influence the American political process by economic means. Although Jews represent merely 2.5% of the American population, at least 41 (and quite likely a few more) of the first 100 people listed were Jewish, including four of the top five. Of these first four, three are noted as having strong ties to Israel:

#1 was S. Daniel Abraham, former mogul of Slim Fast Foods, who “has spent most of his political and charitable energies in the last decade supporting Israel and the troubled Middle East peace process. He has helped fund Birthright Israel, a program which sponsors tours of Israel for young American Jews.” Abraham contributed $1,518,500 to the Democratic Party.

#2 was Bernard Schwartz, CEO of Loral Space and Communications, a defense contractor moving more and more into the telecommunications industry. Schwartz donated $1,317,000 to the Democratic Party.

#3 was David Gilo, head of the wireless communications company, Vyyo. Gilo was born in Israel and “emigrated to the United States in 1982, retaining dual citizenship.” Gilo contributed $1,311,000 to the Democratic Party.

#5 was Haim Saban, who is also immigrant from Israel.

More Jews on the list of the nation’s biggest economic string-pullers include:

9. Constance Milstein – “born to one of New York’s most prominent real estate families.”

14. David Shimon – “California’s leading contributor to state campaigns”

18. Walter Shorenstein – “… controls 25 percent of [San Francisco’s] downtown.”
19. Steven Kirsch – founded computer company Infoseek

20. David Steiner – New Jersey-based real estate mogul and former president of the Israeli lobby, AIPAC. He had to resign from that position when he was tape recorded boasting “about his political sway, saying he had ‘cut a deal’ with the Bush administration to give more aid to Israel. He had arranged for ‘almost a billion dollars in other goodies,’ he added and was ‘negotiating’ with the incoming Clinton administration over appointing a Secretary of State who was pro-Israel. ‘We have a dozen people in his [Clinton’s] headquarters,’ Steiner bragged, ‘and they are all going to get big jobs.’”

23. Sam Fox – “He and his wife are particularly active in promoting the views of Jewish Republicans. Marilyn Fox was the first woman president of the Jewish Community Centers Association in its 112 year history, and her husband is chairman of the Republican Jewish Coalition. The RJC supports a strong Israel... Fox is one of eight leaders of the RJC on the Mother Jones 400. Others include Laurence Kadish, Max M. Fisher, John Price, Earle I. Mack, Clifford Sobel, Lewis M. Eisenberg, and David M. Flaum.”

37. Philip Levine – president of Onboard Media

38. Lawrence Kadish – “has been topping lists of Republican donors since George H. W. Bush was president. A real estate investor in New York and Florida, Kadish has long worked to build ties between the Republican Party and American Jews. He is chairman of the Republican Jewish Coalition... The group has supported a hard-line approach to negotiating an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord, criticizing President Clinton for ‘appeasing Chairman Arafat’ instead of requiring ‘responsibility and compliance from the Palestinian Authority.’ Allied with Israel’s Likud government, the group supported the construction of the controversial Har Homa settlement in East Jerusalem, over Palestinian objections that the project jeopardized the peace process. It also supports continued American military support of Israel, including a recent project to build an anti-ballistic missile system. On the domestic front, the RJC supports school choice and voucher initiatives, saying they help curb the ‘risk of assimilation’ for some Jews living in the United States.”

39. Jeffrey Levy-Hinte – heads an independent film production company, Post 391

41. Alfred Lerner – ranked by Forbes as the 51st richest American. He is the chairman and CEO of MBNA, the giant credit-card company

42. David Saperstein – “the biggest stockholder in Westwood One, the nation’s largest radio network.”

50. S. Donald Sussman – “president of hedge fund Paloma Partners... He also sits on the board of governors of the Weizmann Institute of Science [in Israel].”

51. David Koch – “Koch Industries, a conglomerate with major oil and gas holdings, is the second-largest privately-held company in the United States. It is also the recipient of the largest civil fine ever imposed on a corporation for violating federal environmental laws.”
54. Marc Nathanson – appointed twice by Bill Clinton “as chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and other federal broadcasting services.”

56. Meyer Berman – a stock trader

57. John Price – real estate mogul, head of Utah-based JP Realty

58. Jeffrey Katzenberg – Hollywood mogul, one of the heads of Dreamworks

59. Jonathan Tisch – He “brought a torrent of bad press to the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. As CEO of the Loews Hotel chain, Tisch was fighting to stop a union drive among 300 housekeepers and other service workers at the Loews hotel in Santa Monica, where delegates were scheduled to stay. Loews, as it turned out, was also a major contributor to an effort to kill a labor-backed living-wage measure in Santa Monica and replace it with a business friendly initiative.”

60. Harold Snyder – pharmaceutical mogul; member of the Board of Directors of Teva, an Israeli company

61. Michael King – heads, with his brother Roger, King World Productions, “one of the most powerful firms in television syndication.”

63. Marvin Davis – a billionaire who made his fortune, initially, in real estate. Former owner of 20th Century Fox.

65. Louis Weisbach – head of Halo Branded Solutions

66. Alan Solomont – nursing home mogul and once finance chair of the Democratic National Committee

68. Leonard Lauder

70. Max Fisher

74. Denise Rich – ex-wife of criminal fugitive Marc Rich, the most controversial of President Bill Clinton’s executive pardons.

75. Bren Simon – his family’s Simon Property Group is “the nation’s largest mall owner in the United States.”

79. Samuel Heyman – “His manufacturing firm, GAF Corporation, spent at least $7 million on lobbyists since 1997.”

86. Norman Pattiz – “Founder and chairman of radio giant Westwood One.”

87. Eve Weinstein – wife of Harvey Weinstein, co-chairman of Miramax Films.

88. Bernard Marcus – co-founder of Home Depot. “Marcus is also attempting to alter politics in the Middle East through a think tank he chairs called Israel Democracy Institute ... Marcus is also working to link the Israeli economy to his home state ... [T]he hardware mogul has helped persuade state officials to offer ... Israeli firms incentives to relocate in Georgia.”

89. Lew Wasserman – popularly known as the “Godfather of Hollywood .. He sits on the board of advisors for the William J. Clinton Presidential Foundation with the [Jewish] DreamWorks triumverate of Jeffrey Katzenberg, David Geffen, and Steven Spielberg.”

93. Frederic Mack – “Like his brother Earle, Frederic Mack has long shown an abiding interest in U.S. relations with Israel ... MAck is currently on the national board of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the nation’s largest and most influential pro-Israel lobby. He also chairs the board of AIPAC’s Northeast chapter, and sits on the board of the New York Jewish Community Relations Council, the Jewish Theological Seminary, and the Israel Policy Forum.”

97. Ira Lipman – is “the owner of one of the nation’s largest security firms” – Guardsmark, “which now boasts offices in more than 400 cities in the United States and Canada.”

100. Irwin Jacobs – founder of Qualcomm, Inc., “the telecommunications company that has grown to $3.3 billion in annual revenues.”

In Texas, in June 1998, a news article out of Ft. Worth noted that President Clinton was expecting to raise $500,000 for his political party at a fund-raising dinner in the Dallas home of Jewish real estate developer Ray Nasher:

“For between $10,000 to $25,000 per couple, about 60 well-heeled Democratic donors were expected to dine on grilled salmon, lobster salad and fruit sorbet at the posh Park Lane-area home of Nasher, who developed the NorthPark Center but may be best known for his world-famous collection of sculptures displayed in and outside his spacious home ... During [the President’s] Houston trip, Clinton also raised $800,000 for the Democratic National Congressional Committee at an event at the fashionable Royal Oaks home of attorney Richard Mithoff.” [NIX, M., 6-2-98]

In Massachusetts, Elaine Schuster, heir to the Wingate Construction Company, is one of the most prominent philanthropists to the Democratic Party. Her father, Ben Siegel, “was barred in 1967 by the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development from receiving Federal funding due to his history of mortgage defaults and managerial problems. Siegel also had been convicted in U.S. District Court for bribing a Federal official in order to obtain a federal contract.” [MIGA, A., 4-18-96, p. 6] During the 1970s, Wingate Construction received government subsidy funds and “operated one of New York City’s most notorious slums” in the South Bronx. A New York State Assembly investigation of the company reported that the firm “had apparently committed fraud” and that it is an “unscrupulous developer only interested in profits.” [MIGA, A. 4-18-96, p. 6] In 1996 the Boston Herald noted that “Elaine Schuster is living proof that in politics, money talks. The veteran Democratic fundraiser ranks among President Clinton’s strongest financial backers in Massachusetts.” Personal paybacks to Schuster, noted the Herald, including a Clinton appointment to the Advisory Committee on the Arts for the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. [MIGA, A., 4]

Incredibly, in 1995, the American Congress even awarded Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, head of the Chabad Orthodox movement, the Congressional Gold Medal, “the country’s highest civilian honor.” Chabad is arguably a kind of Jewish Ku Klux Klan. See http://jewishtribalreview.org/chabad2.htm for citations from another chapter about Schneerson’s and Chabad’s principles of racism] [Also, http://jewishtribalreview.org/micsam.htm for an emailed moral indictment of Chabad by Jewish scholar Michael Samuel] U. S. Senators and “more than 20 ambassadors and other embassy officials” attended the dinner honoring Schneerson. [BATOG, J., 7-3-95, p. 4] Why was such a racist heralded by Congress? “Rabbi Schneerson,” explained the Baltimore Jewish Times,

“was the first religious figure to get the coveted medal, which was approved by Congress last October. More than a year of intensive lobbying by Chabad forces generated some 225 House co-sponsors of the authorizing legislation. Copies of the gold medal – which was underwritten by donations from admirers of Rabbi Schneerson – are being sold by the Treasury Department. According to Washington sources, that could be a big moneymaker for the federal government.” [BESSER, J., 6-30-95, p. 32]

Payoffs for Lew Wasserman and MCA in the Reagan era included an exclusive contract (i.e., entitlement to monopoly) to run all guided tours in Washington DC (under MCA’s subsidiary Landmark Services). Likewise, MCA attained exclusive rights (through its Curry company) at Yosemite National Park for “tours, lodging, concessions, and hotels.” MCA’s contract stipulated that the park’s cut of total revenues would be three-quarters of one percent).
[MCDOUGAL, p. 345, 369] (In this genre of political influence, Jewish alcohol mogul Lewis Rosentiel’s heavy lobbying worked to get Congress to pass the “Forand Bill, named after the Congressman of that name, freeing liquor companies from punitive tax on stored whisky for a dozen extra years – ample time to dispose of their stocks. For Rosentiel it meant bonanza as well as salvation. The bill saved the company between $40 and $50 million, and the value of Schenley [Rosentiel’s firm] stock soared by $33 million in a single day.” [SUMMERS, A., 1993, p. 252] (One of Rosentiel’s ex-wives, Susan, even alleged that Rosentiel later once paid president Lyndon Johnson half a million dollars and “a large sum of money” went to Emanuel Celler, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee). [SUMMERS, A., 1993, p. 252]

Likewise, Jewish billionaire Gary Winnick’s contribution of over a million dollars to the Bill Clinton presidential library netted him a $400 million military defense contract for his company Global Crossing. “Global Crossing’s rivals,” notes journalist Joseph Perkins, “including AT&T, Qwest Communications, Sprint and Worldcom, protested that the Clinton administration rigged the bidding process to favor Winnick’s company.” The then-head of the Democratic National Party, Terry McAuliffe, also “got rich off of Global Crossing, parlaying a $100,000 investment in the telecommunications company into $18 million in a little more than a year’s time.” [PERKINS, J., 2-8-02]

Another version of Jewish financial power in wrenching state and federal funds for special Jewish transglobal interests is the case of Florida and its literal functioning as an agent for Jews and their insurance claims in the Holocaust. Lest we forget, the Holocaust occurred a half a century ago, in Europe, and is merely one of dozens of mass human tragedies and injustices that have befallen groups of people since – and before, for that matter – then. But Jews as a transnational lobby must be economically reckoned with. Hence, in 1998, following a meeting with the World Jewish Congress, Florida Treasurer and Insurance Commissioner Bill Nelson announced that, among other actions:

- his state was budgeting $500,000 to fund Florida’s Department of Insurance “to investigate unpaid Holocaust claims.”
- the Florida insurance pool would “drop two Swiss banks from participating in the insurer’s line of credit if the banks don’t reach satisfactory settlement in a class-action lawsuit brought against them by Holocaust victims.”
- three Swiss banks were warned that Florida intended to drop business with them unless they decided upon a “fair settlement” with Jewish complainants. [PR NEWSWIRE]

Across the country, also in 1998, the National Underwriter noted that “the California Assembly has unanimously approved a plan to establish the comprehensive Holocaust Insurance Registry in the Department of Insurance, giving Commissioner Charles Quackenbush the authority to suspend the business licenses of companies that fail to participate. The 76-0 vote in the normally fractious Democratic-controlled Assembly reflected the importance of Holocaust insurance as an election year issue.” [HOWARD, J.] [Quackenbush was forced to resign his position two years later for a kickback scandal that involved major insurance companies] [TUGEND, T., 7-10-2000, p. 9]

In Illinois, the governor signed a bill in 1999 that declared that heirs to Holocaust “reparations and other compensations awarded to victims of Nazi persecution” didn’t have to pay taxes on the sums coming their way. [GRAHNKE, L., 12-24-99, p. 12] Norman Finkelstein notes the worldwide Jewish efforts to force reparations from the Swiss government:

“The WJC [World Jewish Congress] working with institutions including the US Holocaust Memorial Museum and the Simon Wiesenthal Center, mobilized the US political establishment. Using the House and Senate banking committees as springboards, the Holocaust industry orchestrated a shameless campaign of vilification. The campaign rapidly degenerated into a libel of the Swiss people.” [FINKELSTEIN, N., 7-13-2000, p. 4]

Among those many caving in to Jewish economic (and, hence, political) pressure in California in 1998 was an Asian-American candidate for the senate, Matt Fong. “Fong’s decision to champion the issue [of a Swiss bank boycott],” said the San Francisco Chronicle, “could enable him to gain backing from Jewish groups, which generally support his opponent in the United States Senate race, incumbent Barbara Boxer, who herself is Jewish ... It was influential Jewish groups in southern California, such as the Simon Wiesenthal Center, that pushed the issue, prompting Fong to respond ... Dozens of other states and cities are expected to enact similar sanctions.” [COLLIER, p. A1]

In New York, both the state and Manhattan drew up sanctions against the Swiss. It helped that the New York City’s comptroller, Alan Hevesi, was not only Jewish but a president of B’nai Zion and a member of the Presidents Conference of Major Jewish Organizations. The (Jewish) Forward notes that “Mr. Hevesi put his role overseeing some $70 billion in assets to pressure the Swiss in the banking scandal. He has led a campaign to get other public pension fund managers to get Switzerland to own up to its role in Jewish assets it received during World War II. Having made his first trip to Switzerland in May as part of the effort, he has become more involved with Israel.” [FORWARD, 11-14-97, p. 14]

In 1997, the Wall Street Journal also reported that the United States promised to donate $4 million to the Nazi Persecution Relief Fund, aimed at compensating victims of the Holocaust, and hopes to give $25 million over three years, according to the [Jewish] Undersecretary of State Stuart Eizenstat. “ [FRANK, R., p. A19]

What, one wonders, is so special about the suffering of the Jews above and beyond all other millions of non-Jews who also were subject to “Nazi persecution,” let alone the millions of other people who have been murdered or maimed over the years in other distant lands and situations? Surely they all deserve our sympathy. But as it is dictated for us, for an inexplicable reason some merit our money. So by what perverse reasoning should U.S. taxpayers pay for solely Jewish “relief” for events across the world half a century ago, when we were by no stretch of the imagination remotely responsible as ourselves “persecutors?” If such things are on the economic agenda, where are those clamoring to make economic amends to Native Americans who have truly been robbed, quite literally, of the ground we all stand on?

Jewish lobbying pressure is worldwide in scope. In February 2000, a news item noted that “Poland’s bid to join the European Union could be thrown into doubt unless it makes amends to holocaust survivors, a British Euro-MP warned today ... A group of holocaust survivors [led by New York Jewish lawyers Ed Klein and Mel Urban] visited Euro-MPs in Brussels for help in pressing their claims.” [PRESS ASSOCIATION NEWSFILE, 2-9-2000]

In 1999, a newspaper article entitled “In France, Resentment Is Building Over U.S. Holocaust lawsuits.” Two class-action suits were filed by Jews in New York demanding Holocaust-era restitution from French banks. “The French government and the banks are fighting the suit,” noted the International Herald Tribune, “contending that it violates France’s sovereignty.” French and American Jewish organizations even began squabbling over the issue. [WARDSON, A., 1999] At the fore of the burgeoning lawsuits in Europe in the name of Holocaust restitution has been the World Jewish Congress. The Christian Science Monitor noted in 1997 that “famed Vienna-based Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal ... has said that the focus should be on those who killed Jews, not those who stole from them. And he expressed worried that what he calls the WJC’s stridency could spur a revival of anti-Semitism in Europe.” [ECHIKSON, W., 1997]

The Jerusalem Post added in 1999 that

“Restitution of Nazi-looted property is an issue Jerusalem cannot avoid. The Holocaust is a hot topic driven by the U.S.: by [Jewish Assistant Secretary of Commerce Stuart Eizenstat and American Jewish agitation as well as by sanctions, threats, congressional hearings and class action suits in federal courts targeting Swiss, German, French, Italian and Austrian interests.” [HENRY, M., 9-17-99, p. 4B]

Jewish demands for “restitution” from the past has also turned to Arab nations. As the Jewish Week noted in 1999, “Having successfully recovered millions of dollars worth of Jewish property lost in the Holocaust, restitution experts in Israel and the U.S. are now setting their sights on the Arab world.” Jewish groups were looking to claim “tens of billions of dollars in property left behind by Jews who emigrated to Israel from Arab/Muslim countries.” [CHABIN, M., 1-29-99, p. 1] The double standard here, vis-à-vis the hundreds of thousands of Palestinians who had their property formally confiscated by the Jewish state when forcibly driven away by the Israeli military, is astounding. Jewish author David Pinsky once wrote about a Jewish family that took over an Arab house in Israel. The wife watched her children playing with toys the Palestinian children left behind:

“What right had she and her family to occupy a house which did not belong to her? To use a garden and field which were taken by force from other people who ran away in the panic of war and are not permitted to return? Are she an her family not living on goods robbed from others? Is she not doing to Arabs what the Nazis did to her and her family?” [EL-LIS, M., 1990, p. 62]

Reparations for vast sums of stolen Palestinian property by the Jews of Israel is to this day rarely even mentioned, let alone legally addressed.

The avalanche of Jewish lobbying internationally for Holocaust reparation demands has caused some Jews, like the head of the Anti-Defamation League, Abraham Foxman, to worry that the vast amounts of money being demanded by Jews today only confirms notions that international Jewry has immense economic power and that “the Jews died [in the Holocaust not] because they were Jews, but because they had bank accounts, gold art, and property.” [SCHOENFELD, G., SEPT 2000, p. 27]

Gabriel Schoenfeld, editor of the American Jewish Committee’s Commentary magazine, notes with concern the endless Judeo-centric demands upon many of the world’s governments,

“With the exception of the forced laborers and some other currently favored groups like Gypsies, homosexuals, and the mentally ill, both European corporations and Jewish organizations have said embarrassingly little about the great numbers of non-Jews who were deprived of life, limb, and property at the hands of the Nazis ... Jewish organizations are fighting first and foremost for Jewish interests ... To lead or participate in a process through which some are given restitution while others in similar circumstances, but on the wrong side of lists, are not, is to sow the seeds of needless acrimony and to court censure on grounds to which Jews of all people should be especially sensitive.” [SCHOENFELD, G., 2000, p. 34]

“The pursuit of billions in Holocaust guilt money,” observes Jewish columnist Charles Krauthammer, “has gone from the unseemly to the disgraceful.” [SCHOENFELD, G., 2000, p. 34]

There are apparently even special rules for bending American law when Israel is concerned. Yitz Greenberg recalls

“From the age of about the age of 12 on, I went out with Jewish National Fund boxes into the Brooklyn subways to collect money for Israel ... My older brother had an old broken down car that he used to transport the boxes from our local branch to the main office. One day he parked his car in a no parking zone to deliver the money and got a parking ticket. The price of the ticket could have broken the back of the organization. Besides that my brother was very headstrong; fighting that ticket was a matter of principle. At the traffic court, everyone was ‘guilty, guilty,’ no matter what they said. When it was his turn, he said, “Well, I had these boxes to deliver and so I had to park.’ ‘What boxes were they?’ asked the judge. ‘Those were JNF boxes,’ he answered. ‘It’s a good cause.’ ‘Not guilty,’ the judge said. Back at the office, no one believed my brother. They called up the traffic court. It turned out that the judge was Manuel Rothenberg, president of the Jewish National Fund.” [FROMMER, M., FROMMER, H., 2001]

There are of course a variety of issues that powerful Jewish groups actively lobby. As Jack Wertheimer notes about organized Jewish Orthodox organizations:

> “Orthodox Jews actively engage in the American political process to further their own aims. In this regard, the most right-wing sects have been especially adept at exploiting political opportunities. It has now become routine in New York politics for local and even national politicians to pay court to Hasidic rabbis. What is less well known is the sophisticated lobbying effort that won for Hasidic groups the status of a ‘disadvantaged group,’ with the attendant entitlement to special federal funds.” [WERTHEIMER, J., 1993, p. 119]

On smaller, local scale levels, the underlying machinations of the Jewish community are the same. “In localities across the country,” adds Stephen Isaacs, “Jews like non-Jews have been known to invest in candidates in return for government contracts, favorable rezonings on potentially valuable plots of real estate ... Jews have tended to be active in such instances of bribing ... Yiddish has a word for the bribe: shmeer (to grease), a word that has somewhat come into the American English idiom.” [BRENNER, p. 78]

There are more public – albeit modified – examples of the bribe. In 1997 the New York Times expressed concern that New York governor George Pataki’s acceptance of income-producing speaking engagements > “invited conflict of interest. Through a Manhattan talent agency ... for $15,000 each, the Governor has already given four speeches, all to out-of-state groups. The audiences included a magazine conglomerate [Jewish?], two chapters of the Jewish National Fund, and the Cosmetic, Toiletry, and Fragrance Association [Jewish?].” [NY TIMES, p. A22]

The (Jewish) Forward noted the close ties between Pataki and cosmetics heir and media baron Ron Lauder (who we’ve met before):

> “The payments by the JNF [Jewish National Fund] – a series of speaking fees of $15,000 apiece to Mr. Lauder’s pal, Governor Pataki (whose wife is a Lauder consultant) – have raised eyebrows in some corners.” [FORWARD, 11-14-97, p. 14]

A further Pataki example: In 1998 Federal prosecutors were “examining whether state officials gave lenient treatment to a Hasidic rabbi imprisoned in a widely publicized kidnapping case after appeals were made on his behalf by a fund-raiser for the campaign of Governor George E. Pataki.” [LEVY, p. 29] The U.S. government prosecutor in the case complained that “prison officials told him the transfer [decision to eventually release] has been made at high levels.” The rabbi in question, Shlomo Helbrans, was not even an American citizen – he was an Israeli. Originally sentenced to prison for 4-12 years, he was shifted to a program where he was freed on the only condition that he had a job. The “prominent fundraiser” who pulled the strings behind the scenes in this case, Leon Perlmutter (also a member of the ultra-Orthodox Satmar sect) also “lobbied state officials” for the release of two other Israelis convicted of drug dealing. They were paroled and deported home. (Ziv Oved was serving time for his participation in a “$1 million-a-week heroin and cocaine drug ring in Brooklyn.”) [GREENBERG, E., 5-1-98, p. 10] Another Perlmutter associate, Abraham Lekkow, had given $45,000 to the Pataki campaign. [LEVY, 4-26-98, p. 29] Jeff Wiesenfeld, “Pataki’s executive assistant who deals with Jewish affairs, appeared before a grand jury in Brooklyn” about the favoritism allegations. [GREENBERG, E., 5-1-98, p. 10]

In January 2000, New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani’s “chief fundraiser and former chief of staff,” Bruce Teitelbaum, was investigated for political favors to Orthodox Jewish groups. (Teitelbaum, a Republican, is the husband of Suri Kasirer, “a major Democratic fund-raiser and lobbyist.”) [TOPOUSIS, T., 1-5-2000, p. 10] The collapse of a building under construction that killed a Mexican-American laborer and injured 11 others, says the New York Times, “led prosecutors ... to examine the building practices of the owner, Chaim Ostreicher. But early in the inquiry, Gaston Silva, the city’s former building commissioner, told prosecutors that he had been pressured by Mr. Teitelbaum ... to reassign Joseph Trivisanno, a chief buildings inspector whose style had annoyed some developers in the Orthodox Jewish community. Mr. Trivisanno has told prosecutors he believed he was forced from his position because he has been too tough with Orthodox builders and developers in enforcing regulations. Mr. Teitelbaum was the administration’s liaison to the city’s Orthodox Jews, among whom the mayor has long enjoyed political support.” [BARRY, D., 1-12-2000, p. B10]

In 1978, Alex Liberman (a survivor of Auschwitz), took over as New York City’s director of leasing under the (also Jewish) mayor Ed Koch administration. Liberman oversaw $80 million and soon became New York’s “director of negotiations.” Jack Newfield and Wayne Barrett describe what happened next:

“By this point in his career, Liberman was already taking advantage of his discretionary public power and demanding an assortment of kickbacks for city leases. Landlords were writing checks to his synagogue at his suggestion, and Liberman was pressuring his fellow directors at the temple to split the contributions with him. At first, the synagogue’s president rejected the idea, and Liberman got no part of the initial small donations. But Remsen Heights Jewish Center had a working-class, struggling congregation, and when Liberman began dangling larger and larger contributions, the temple’s leadership weakened ... Eventually the synagogue was laundering $10,000 checks ... [NEWFIELD/BARRETT, p. 215] In the real estate world] the biggest of the immunized bribe-payers was Seymour Cohen, ... a major force in Manhattan real estate. The company and its principals, who leased more office space to the city than any other landlord, had given Koch $40,000 in campaign contributions and let him run his gubernatorial campaign rent free out of one of their buildings. It had been no less generous with other city officials – giving Comptroller Jay Goldin $178,000 (he had never audited one of their leases) and Manhattan borough president Andrew Stein the free and exclusive use of Cohn’s luxurious Hampton’s home for a summer.” [NEWFIELD/BARRETT, p. 215]

On the Republican side of “the bribe,” in 1995 prominent Congressman Newt Gingrich’s wife raised eyebrows by taking a position (while he was in office) as the vice president for business development for the Israeli Export Company. She had visited the Jewish state in 1993 under the auspices of Israel’s political lobbying arm, AIPAC. Ms. Gingrich was “hired at an undisclosed salary to help recruit business for a free-trade zone in Israel.” [BAER, S., p. 6]

Jewish/Israeli influence in local politics on the other side of the country? In 1989 the Los Angeles Times featured an expose on the questionable personal and business relationship between Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley and his “friend” Abraham Spiegel. A federal grant jury was in fact beginning a criminal investigation, also subpoenaing Bradley’s campaign fund-raiser (also Jewish), Ira Distenfield. (For his part, Distenfield, a Republican, yet the largest personal campaign contributor to Democrat Bradley in 1985, was eventually “sued by five current and former city commissioners for allegedly misappropriating their investments in a limited partnership that included several other political insiders.”) [CLIFFORD, F., 3-27-85, p. B1; KRIKORIAN, G., 9-3-90, p .B1] “The City Attorney,” noted the Times, “found no illegality in ... the way a top mayoral aide cut through city red tape for three Spiegel [real estate] developments ... Nonetheless ... the relationship raises questions about the degree of access to the mayor enjoyed by political contributors and supporters who have dealings with the city ... The sheer number and personal nature of Spiegel favors for the mayor ensures that he shares an intimacy with Bradley that few others enjoy.” [PASTERNAK/BUNTING, p. 1]

Spiegel even drew the African-American mayor of Los Angeles into the web of international activism for Israel. “Bradley,” noted the Times, “has traveled twice to Israel to participate in ground-breaking, and dedication of museum and university buildings donated by Spiegel. And Spiegel in turn raised funds at a Los Angeles dinner to establish a Tom Bradley Chair in Social Integration at a college near Tel Aviv ... Spiegel has often invited local officials to galas for visiting Israeli dignitaries.” The Times noted one especially disturbing meeting Bradley had with Spielberg; the other two guests were former Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban and Israel’s Los Angeles consul general. “The discussion at their table,” said the Times, “centered on two topics – Bradley’s friendship for Israel and Spiegel’s construction projects in Los Angeles ... Spiegel became Bradley’s ‘point man’ in Los Angeles’ Jewish community, raising the mayor’s profile among Israeli officials and thus among affluent local supporters of Israel.” [PASTERNAK, J.; BUNTING, Glenn, F.; p. 1]
The mayor that succeeded Tom Bradley? The Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles notes that another Jewish “mover and shaker,” Steven Soboroff, is the “best pal and top adviser to Mayor Richard Riordan, who is backing Soboroff as his successor in City Hall.” [TUGEND, 10-22-99]

The case of California governor Gray Davis? “Back in the late 1970s, “notes Joel Kotkin in the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles, “... Davis became acquainted with [former Governor Jerry] Brown’s powerful coterie of Jewish political bankrollers like financiers S. Jon Kreedman, superagent Jeff Wald, and Eli Broad. The big Democratic political money in Los Angeles Democratic politics, Davis realized, was Jewish ... Davis made it his job to be the Gentile champion of the Jews.” [KOTKIN, 5-29-98] As the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California noted in 1999,

“This was Davis’ fourth trip to Israel, his first as governor. It’s gratifying to see a political leader who understands and cares about the Jewish homeland.” [JEWSH BULLETIN OF NORTHERN CALIFORNIA, 11-5-99, p. 24A]

In 1999, Davis “signed a state budget ... that included $2 million for building the new Jewish Museum in San Francisco and $1.25 million for construction of the Peninsula Jewish Community Center in Foster City.” [SCHUSTER, J., 7-9-99, p. 17] Can we imagine millions of tax-payer dollars earmarked for a Christian or Muslim Museum, or a Polish or Guatemalan Community Center?

Former Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres notes his impressions of then-California governor Jerry Brown in the 1980s:

“I once appeared with Governor Jerry Brown before the Union of Meat Cutters in San Diego. He made a wonderful speech. He said, ‘Well, I live on my salary. I never invested in anything. The only thing I’m going to invest in are the bonds of Israel, because I love Israel. If you would show me a map and ask me to identify Israel, I probably couldn’t find it. But Israel is in my heart.’” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 225]

(In 2001, Tom Hayden, left-wing darling of progressive causes, former California state representative, and ex-husband of Jane Fonda, was defeated in a bid for a seat on the Los Angeles City Council. He lost to a Jewish opponent, Jack Weiss, “a former prosecutor who has never held an elected office.” As the Los Angeles Times discreetly noted about the election, “A Midwestern Catholic, Hayden ... faced a subtle challenge in a district known for electing Jewish community activists as leaders.”) [FOX, S., 6-17-01]

What about politics in Philadelphia, the icon of American patriotism? In 2000, President Clinton appointed “Philadelphia attorney, communal leader and state Democratic fundraiser S. David Fineman” as a U.S. District judge for Eastern Pennsylvania. Fineman had been earlier appointed by Clinton as a high official at the Post Office where he “helped shepherd a postage stamp honoring the deeds of Holocaust hero Raul Wallenberg as well as the first stamp to mark Chanukah.” [FELDMAN, S., 3-23-2000, p. 15]

In late 1999, Ed Rendell, a Jew, ended his term as Philadelphia’s mayor. (President Clinton attended a $1,000-per-plate dinner honoring Rendell at the end of his term.) [FELDMAN, S., 12-9-99, p. 5] The former mayor then became the new general chairman of the Democratic National Party, “the chief spokesman for the Democratic Party.” [CATABIANI, M., 10-3-99, p. A1] Within months his office announced the appointment of three new “finance vice chairs” for the party. Two, Kenneth Jarin and Alan Kessler were also from Philadelphia and they were both Jews. (A third Jew from Philadelphia, Thomas Leonard, continued, since 1993, as a DNC finance vice chairman. He also served as the state of Pennsylvania’s Democratic Party finance chairman).

In Fall 1999, a Jewish Republican, Sam Katz, ran against an African-American, Democrat John Street, (who beat a Jewish opponent, Marty Weinberg, in the primary) to replace Rendell as the mayor of Philadelphia. (Katz’s dog, noted a Jewish journal, is even named Jabo, in honor of the famous right-wing fascist/Zionist Ze’ev Jabotinsky). 87% of the Jews of Philadelphia – despite high nationwide Jewish proclivities to liberalism and the Democratic Party – voted for Republican Katz. [FELDMAN, S., 3-2-2000, p. 1] Katz lost the mayoral contest, however, to the African-American by a narrow margin. A victory against Jewish political dominance? Hardly. Jews, after all, are central to the Democratic Party machine. As the Jewish Exponent observed about the African-American candidate’s victory:

“From mayor Ed Rendell to District Attorney Lynne Abraham to City Controller Jonathan Saidel to primary opponent Marty Weinberg to campaign co-finance chairman Robert Feldman to State Senator Allyson Schwartz – it appeared clear that Street could not have gained his slim victory over Republican Sam Katz Tuesday without key Jewish supporters. Need more proof? Also on stage in the [victory] ballroom at the Warwick Hotel were campaign insiders Leonard Ross, Leonard Klehr and Mark Alderman; Rabbi Solomon Isaacs, who helped get the votes out in the far Northeast, and Philadelphia Federation of Teachers president Ted Kirsch, who prominently endorsed Street in September. In the back of the room, chief campaign spokesman Ken Snyder was busy fielding last-minute questions from reporters, and looking on was campaign media consultant David Axelrod.” [FELDMAN, S., 11-4-99, p. 1]

In a follow-up article, the Jewish Exponent noted that “As was the case during Street’s campaign, Jews are playing prominent roles in the transition phase [to the new mayor].” Two co-chairs of the transition committee were Jewish: Leonard Klehr and Judith Rodin (the president of the University of Pennsylvania). Education Committee chiefs included Lee Annenberg, David Cohen, and Ralph Roberts; working under them were Lois Yampolsky and Deborah Kahn, who was later named to be Philadelphia’s Secretary of Education. [FELDMAN, S., 3-9-2000, p. 15] The Government Organization Committee included Leonard Ross, Mark Adelman, and Alan Kessler. Marty Weinberg was in Policy and Programs. Jewish Task Force transition leaders also included Ed Schwartz, Emmanuel Freeman, Ira Lubert, Moshe Porat, Marciarose Shestack, David Marshall (Campaign Chairman for the Jewish Federation of...
Greater Philadelphia), Harold Goldman (president of Jewish Family and Children’s Services), Michael Blum, Harriet Dichter, Ken Jarin, Robert Feldman, John Binswanger, Steven Cozen and Rabbi William Kuhn. [FELDMAN, S., 12-2-99, p. 10]

Two weeks later the Jewish Exponent featured another article about the many Jews in mayor Street’s entourage, joking to its Jewish audience that “the Jewish community is well represented in this round of appointments. In fact, if your name is not on the list, you just might feel left out.” Appointments of Jews in city government included:

Education: Shelly Yanoff, Sandra Fellman, Ted Kirsch.

In the same time frame, the Exponent also did an article about the visit of the Tel Aviv mayor to Philadelphia, noting that the two sites were “sister cities.” “There has been, for a long time – or as long as I can remember,” noted the Chairman of the Jewish Federation, Joseph Smukler, “a special relationship between Tel Aviv and Philadelphia.” [FELDMAN, S., 4-20-2000, p. 13] Among new mayor John Street’s ceremonial tasks was to cut the ribbon to open Philadelphia’s new “National Liberty Museum: America’s Home for Heroes.” The museum’s Executive Director is Gwen Borowsky. Wealthy media mogul Irwin Borowsky founded the organization. He also is the founder of the “American Interfaith Institute, which aims to expunge anti-Jewish sentiment from editions of the New Testament.” Borowsky’s museum, like so many these days, clearly aims to appropriate American patriotic heritage under the umbrella of Jewish Holocaust mythology. In the heart of Philadelphia, one of the icons of American heritage, the Liberty Museum features a second floor “hall of heroes [which] is studded with Holocaust memories.” [MONO, B., 1-20-2000, p. 9]

And new Philadelphia mayor John Street’s inevitable bending to Jewish Zionist concerns and their ties to Israel? In 1998, while still a city councilman, Street, his wife, and son were flown to Israel for eight days as a guest of a Philadelphia Jewish businessman, Joseph Zuritsky. Criticism of Israel, nor Jewish loyalties, was not the focus of a Philadelphia Daily News story about the trip. After all, as the paper observed, “Most of the potential candidates in the 1999 mayor’s race, as well as Mayor Rendell, have traveled to Israel at some point in their careers – and in most cases the trip was paid for or subsidized by one of several groups promoting closer U.S. ties to the Jewish state.” These politicians courted by Zionists include Happy Fernandez, Doug Evans, and John White, Jr.) [BUNCH, W., 11-2-98]

Rather, the Daily News piece examined the economic self-interests of Zuritsky (the CEO of the Parkway Corporation, Philadelphia’s major “parking lot developer”), in sponsoring Street’s trip to the Jewish state. The future mayor’s journey

“was paid for by a parking-lot magnate at the same time his firm was lobbying the [City] Council for millions of dollars in low-cost financing for a Center City development ... Zuritsky said he had no motive in sponsoring the trip – which had planning assistance from several local Jewish community leaders – other than to educate Philadelphia’s highest-ranking black leader about Israel and Mideast politics. He said he wanted to promote ethnic harmony.” [BUNCH, W., 11-2-98]

Among the critics of the trip was the president of the Philadelphia division of Common Cause, Barry Kaufmann, also Jewish.

But there’s even more Jewish/Zionist politicking in Pennsylvania. In 2000, that state’s governor, Tom Ridge (later the first appointment as U.S. secretary of Homeland Security), was awarded the “Friend of Zion Award” by the fundamentalist Orthodox Jewish organization Aish HaTorah and the city of Jerusalem. As noted by the Jerusalem Fund, Ridge’s honor was based upon his “unbending support for the Jewish state.” Just the year before Governor Ridge had received the Scopus Award from the American Friends of Hebrew University in Philadelphia. [PR NEWSWIRE,-24-2000]

Jewish/Israeli propagandizing influence in the African-American community – from Los Angeles mayor Tom Bradley across the country to Philadelphia mayor John Street – also includes Marion Barry [the African-American mayor of Washington D.C., named when he was busted for cocaine possession in 1990. Barry’s public relations “image maker” was David Abramson. [JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 98] (Max Berry, also Jewish, was prominent African-American D.C. city politician Walter Fauntroy’s finance chairman.[JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 94] John Hechinger, former chairman of the Washington DC City Council after fellow Jew Max Kampleman’s appointment for the position had trouble with the Senate, “became a cornerstone in [Fauntroy’s] organization.” [JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 94, 62] Joseph Danzansky [CEO of the Giant supermarket chain] had links to the African American political community that allegedly spared his stores’ from being burned in Washington DC riots). [JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 79] Barry also had a Jewish “long-time friend and campaign fundraiser”: a wealthy real estate developer, Jeffrey Cohen [LA FRANIERE, S., 1-19-90] In Cohen’s real estate hassles with city departments, note Harry Jaffe and Tom Sherwood (in their book about Washington DC politics), Barry was known to have lobbied in Cohen’s behalf, having, for instance, “stepped in and recommended that the certificate [to build] be okayed ... [JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 158] ... Cohen, the former Boy Banker, had built his real estate empire with Marion Barry’s help. The mayor had given his friend sweet-heart government leases and an $11-million city loan to prop up the grandiose Shaw redevelopment project. Cohen had repaid Barry with a pipeline into Jewish campaign contributions and a secret piece of a real estate deal in Nantucket ...

[CJAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 305-306] Cohen says that he vascillated over the deal but he eventually agreed to make Barry a 10 percent partner in the $1 million building for the sake of Barry’s son Christopher. Cohen then created a dummy corporation to hide Barry’s stake. Four months later, on December 2, 1985, the mayor sent city councilman David Clarke a bill that would float $9 million in tax-exempt bonds for Cohen to use in the renovation of the Manhattan Laundry, a sturdy structure that Cohen wanted to turn into offices for himself. The bond passed, and once again the city picked up Jeffrey Cohen’s tab.” [JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 179-180]

(In a broader political sense, “Cohen’s key to Republican power came through his association with E. Bob Wallach, a San Francisco lawyer who was an old friend of Ronald Reagan official [Ed] Meese’s. Wallach would eventually be indicted in the Wedtech military contracting scandal and smear Meese in the process, but in 1985 he was Cohen’s conduit to raw power. In a complex web that developed during the early 1980s, Wallach invested in Cohen’s Washington real estate deals; Cohen helped get bank loans for Meese; and Meese gave Cohen and Barry entree into the White House.”) [JAFFE/SHERWOOD, 1994, p. 161-162]

Jewish/Israeli influence in the Black community was also noted by the Jerusalem Post in 1996, in a piece headlined “The Israeli “Secret” Diplomacy Inside the Afro-American Community.” As the Post observes:

“There are 100 Black colleges and universities in this country but only 41 are members of the United Negro College Fund presided over by William H. Gray, III, the ex-congressman. And he is the ‘secret weapon’ of Israel ... Black scholars, intellectuals and students are the new Israeli target group.”

Softening African-Americans to Israeli propaganda is expedited by “Israel Cultural Days” at Black American colleges, visits by Ethiopian Jews (who, never stated, face, as Blacks, omnipresent racism in Israel: see Israel chapter, p. 1725), and vacations to Israel for seven presidents of African-American colleges to build “a new bridge between the academic community in Israel and the black academic community in this country.” [NAHSHON, G., 3-96] In March 2002, a controversy arose about African-American politician H. Carl McCall’s visit to Israel. As the New York Times reported:

“When H. Carl McCall, the [New York] state comptroller and a Democratic candidate for governor of New York, visited Israel for three days last week, he insisted that it was an official state visit to allow him to inspect Israeli investments financed with the New York State pension fund. Even though Mr. McCall acknowledged that the trip could benefit his bid for governor, he said it would be paid for mostly by the state penation fund, rather than by his campaign. Yesterday, Mr. McCall’s campaign acknowledged the existence of a photograph from that trip taken of the comptroller with a cocked M-16 held to his shoulder, conducting shooting practice at what his aides said was an antiterrorist camp at an undisclosed location in Israel.” [NAGOURNEY, A., 3-12-02]
GOVERNMENT (PT. 1)

In 2001, after the September 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington DC, even Al Sharpton, the controversial African-American religious leader who had long been at odds with Jewish organizations, visited Israel. As Rabbi Shmuley Boteach explained, Sharpton was known as “someone who was antagonistic to the Jewish community. But I think anyone who knew him privately, Rabbi Schneier, myself, [knew] that was clearly not the case ... After September 11 ... he said to me that he wanted to make a bold gesture of reconciliation to the Jewish community ... I hope that all my Jewish brothers and sisters will extend not just an olive branch, but a warm hand of familial friendship, seeing Rev. Sharpton as a friend of the Jewish community, as a friend of the State of Israel.” [FORWARD, 10-26-01] The Village Voice also notes that Sharpton has also been courted by Jewish New York mayoral candidate Mark Green who “took Sharpton and his wife to the opening of a performance of Judgment at Nuremberg, a Broadway play about the Holocaust. At the same time Green was trying to kosher Sharpton, he was riding his coattails to popularity in the African American community.” [NOEL, P. 10-22-01]

With expanding Hispanic populations in Los Angeles, New York, and Florda (areas heavily populated with Jews), and rising Hispanic political power, Jewish attention in recent years has been shifting towards “coalition building” also with Hispanics. This is despite the fact that Jews and Hispanics have little in common: Hispanics tend to be ardently Catholic and many are impoverished. Jews are the most affluent ethnic group in America, and dominant in the California garment factories that tend to hire Hispanic workers at low wages.

But, as the (Jewish) Forward noted in 2001:

“In the current Los Angeles mayor’s race, Jews and Hispanics appear to be backing the same candidate, Antonio Villaraigosa, a former speaker of the state assembly, over his white opponent, former City Attorney James Hahn ... ‘I’ve always chided the pro-Israel leadership for not taking Hispanic leaders to Israel the way they do with blacks,” said Linda Chavez, a conservative political thinker who was President Bush’s first nominee for secretary of labor. Such trips have in fact begun. Mr. Villeraigosa, the L. A. mayoral contender, visited Israel in 1999 with other Latino leaders on an ADL-sponsored trip. ‘On Israel Independence Day he talked about how that impacted him,” said the ADL’s Mr. Lehrer.”
[DONADIO, R., 5-11-01]

(Linda Chavez is married to Chris Gersten, former Executive Director of the Republican Jewish Coalition). [BESSER, J., 1-5-01]

On May 31, 2001, during the last Los Angeles mayoral debate, KNX radio reporter Frank Mottek challenged Villaraigosa about his former secessionist ideology. The candidate did not respond directly to the question, however, but shielded himself with platitudes and his strong Jewish connections:

MOTTEK: “It has been reported Mr. Villaraigosa that when you were at UCLA you were active in a Latino rights group which among other things says in its constitution that it is in favor of forming a separate republic in the South-west United States. Do you hold the beliefs of that organization as your own and do you still support the group and what do you tell kids that see this kind of stuff on the Internet?”

VILLARAIGOSA: “I say that we have to do everything to combat hate and ignorance. I say that we need to do what the [Simon Wiesenthal] Museum of Tolerance has done. I know, because later in June I’m going to be honored by the Museum of Tolerance. I put together over the last six years more than 18 million dollars for this museum. I put money for this museum. That amount of money is unprecedented in the history of this state. I put money together for this museum because I agree with the Rabbis who work here. Rabbi May, Rabbi Cooper. I supported this museum because they have the tools for tolerance program in our schools and in our police department. I’d like to get the person that worked on that Website in one of those programs so that we can teach them the need to come together and not vilify one another. I’m proud of the fact that this is a great country. This is a country of opportunity and this is also a country of free speech. So I honor his right to free speech, I just hope that he works on the tolerance.” [MOTTEK, F., 5-31-01]

In March 2002, New York politician David Weprin made the news when he – ardent activist for Jewish causes (his mother is a Jew from Cuba) – decided to spread his influence and seek membership in the the New York City Council’s Black and Hispanic Caucus. Some of the members of this minority coalition rebuffed him. “The Weprin name is synonymous with Jewish affairs as it is with Queen politics ... Even if the Hollis Democrat [Weprin] has not identified as much with Hispanic causes,” editorialized Newsday in support of his admission, “he is emblematic of a city in which many people claim multiple heritage.” [NEWSDAY, 3-4-02]

Incredibly, Weprin, Jewish activist reinvented politically as Hispanic, had made the news on behalf of far-right Zionist causes just a few weeks earlier. As the Jewish Forward reported

“A freshman New York City councilman is winning some powerful endorsements for his proposal to name a street in his native Queens after slain Israeli Tourism Minister Rehavim ‘Gandhi’ Ze’evi, who had urged the expulsion of Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The proposal by Democrat David Weprin, who chairs the City Council’s powerful finance committee, has won the endorsement of [Jewish] State Assemblyman Dov Hikind of Brooklyn, as well as Rabbi Avi Weiss of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in the Bronx ... The enthusiasm of some mainstream Jewish organizations for the street-naming proposal may be the latest sign of what communal leaders say is a new era in which it is no longer verboten for American Jews to discuss, or in some cases prokmote Ze’evi’s platform of ‘transfer.’ The term ‘transfer’ has come to refer to the mass removal of Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza to other Arab countries by means that Ze’evi himself was often vague about. Most mainstream Jewish groups, from left to right, historically have rejected the doctrine as immoral.” [CATTAN, N., 1-25-02]

The Jewish lobbying of American politicians towards Zionism and Israel is broad. In 2001, for example, mayor Ralph Appezzato of Alameda (near San Francisco) was one of 46 mayors from 25 countries to attend a special conference for mayors in Jerusalem sponsored by the American Jewish Congress. Wined and dined in Israel, upon returning, noted the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California, Appezzato now “wears the Lion of Judah pinned on his lapel. He also has a mezuzah [the traditional Jewish religious artifact on doorframes], (“slanted correctly – my Jewish friends told me”). “Because of the intifada [the Palestinian uprising against Israeli rule which had so far taken hundreds of lives],” Mayor Appezzato told reporters, “tourism is down. It’s absolutely wonderful to go to all the sites and not have to fight the crowds.” [GOLDSMITH, A., 5-5-01]

In 2001, Jewish mogul Michael Bloomberg was elected to be the new mayor of New York City. The New York Times noted that mayor-elect Bloomberg, current mayor Rudy Giuliani, and New York governor George Pataki were planning a visit to Israel together on Bloomberg’s private jet. “Their schedule,” noted the Times, “would include visiting the sites in Israel that were recently attacked by suicide bombers, laying wreaths and meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and other officials.” “It is an appropriate time to show the people of Israel that our prayers are with them,” said Bloomberg. “It is an important trip, it is a brief trip, but when you really care you fit things in.” “Events this week require that I be in Israel,” said Governor Pataki. [STEINHAUER, J., 12-5-01] In February 2002, New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani was awarded the “Friend of Israel Humanitarian Award” by the Greater Miami Jewish Federation. “There is a very strong connection between Israel and the United States that’s even deeper than the blood lines,” he told the Jewish dinner crowd, “The actual strength and depth of our connection is very simple: We’re democracies.” [DE VALLE, E., 2-11-02]

In 2002, the Jewish-dominated New York City City Council decided it was an international body when it drafted a proposal “for the removal of the PLO from New York” (the United Nations offices are located in that city) but the State Department intervened to complain that “its passage could complicate cease-fire efforts in the Middle East.” [RADLER, M., 4-25-02]

What about Jewish political purse strings in Massachusetts? In 1998, the Jewish Advocate noted that “How well three local businessmen each raise funds – while putting aside their friendship – could have a major impact upon the governor’s race in Massachusetts. Boston lawyer Richard Glovsky of Newton is chairing the finance committee of [state] Attorney General Scott Harshbarger’s campaign, while nursing home magnate Alan Solomont and private investor Paul Egerman, both of Weston, are sharing these responsibilities in former state senator Patricia McGovern’s camp. Both gubernatorial candidates are Democrats ... Egerman’s wife, Joanne, and Glovsky are members of the board of directors of the Anti-Defamation League of B’nai B’rith’s New England chapter.” [GELBWASSER, M., 2-5-98, p. 1]

How about Jewish political prominence in San Francisco? Jewish scholar Seymour Lipset notes that, despite popular Jewish convictions of rampant anti-Semitism around them,

“San Francisco provides an example of how some Jews can totally ignore reality. Polls taken among contributors to the San Francisco Jewish Community Federation have found that one-third believe that a Jew cannot be elected to Congress from San Francisco. A poll reported such results in 1985 when all three members of Congress from contiguous districts in or adjacent to the city were Jewish, as were two state senators, the mayor and a considerable part of the city council.” [LIPSET, p. 156]

If modern San Francisco is so wonderful for Jews, where does Jewish anti-Semitic paranoia there come from, San Francisco’s anti-Semitic past? Hardly. Earl Raab, an assistant director of the San Francisco Jewish Relations Council wrote in 1950 that

“The Jewish community in San Francisco has been called, with reason, the wealthiest, per capita, in the country. There is, at the same time, a startling poverty of anti-Semitic tradition. San Francisco, for cities of its size, is the nation’s ‘white spot’ of anti-Jewish prejudice ... At times Jewish citizens have concurrently held the presidencies of the Chamber of Commerce, the Community Chest, the Board of Education, Art, Fire, and Harbor Commissions, and many other appointive and elective posts; it is a situation that cannot be duplicated in any other city with a six percent Jewish concentration.” [p. 230]

Not far from San Francisco, in 1998, in a celebration of Israel’s 50th anniversary, a San Francisco Jewish ethnic newspaper noted that “costumed volunteers from Congregation Beth David in Saratoga, representing great 20th century Israeli leaders, will greet the crowd. Mayors Judy Nadler of Santa Clara, Donald Wolf of Saratoga and Ralph Faravelli of Mountain View, plus Santa Clara County Supervisor Joseph Simitian and Mountain View Councilmember Joseph Kleitman will head a ceremony introduced by Jewish community leader Dr. Steve Green.” [JEWISH BULLETIN, 6-5-98]

What about Jewish influence in New Jersey, beside Jewish-dominated New York? “Key campaign strategists for the Democrats’ U.S. Senate primary races,” noted the New Jersey Jewish News in 2000, “are Jewish.” Steven Goldstein was co-campaign manager for one candidate (the later primary winner), and Jim Lanard the director of strategic planning and spokesman for another. “Goldstein believes that his Jewish identity ‘intensely’ informs his career.” Lanard studied Hebrew while living for a year in Israel. [FRIEDLAND, E., 6-1-2000, p. 13] Yet another Jewish behind-the-scenes New Jersey politico, Ira Cohen, was chair of the “pro-Israel” Draft Bob Grant Committee. Cohen noted that he has “no allegiance to anybody exclusive of my people – the Jewish people, my family, my children and grandchildren, and how this country goes.” [FRIEDLAND, E., 6-1-2000, p. 14]

What about Jewish influence in, of all places, South Carolina? Are there Jews close to the reins of power there, in a state where there are few Jews? In 2000, Sam Tenenbaum chaired Governor Jim Hodge’s inaugural committee. Sam’s wife, Inez, is the South Carolina Superintendent of Education. [GRESOCK, S., 8-3-2000] (Even in Utah, Joe Waldhoutz, husband of non-Jewish Congressman Enid Greene, effectively destroyed his wife’s political career after he committed a variety of crimes worth 21 months in prison. [DILLON, L., 5-29-99, p. A1] In Georgia, Dianne Harnell Cohen is the governor’s deputy chief of staff). [ATLANTA JEWISH TIMES, 6-18-99]

How about non-Jewish, arch-conservative Republican senator Jesse Helms, from North Carolina? How was he conquered for the Zionist cause? Zionist journalist Sidney Zion tells the story of (infamous Jewish attorney, friend of mobsters, and political activist) Roy Cohn’s dragging of Helms onto the Zionist bandwagon:

“Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina was the premier target of the Jewish lobby in his bid for re-election in 1984. It wasn’t just that his voting record on Israel was terrible; the big thing was that Helms was in line to head up the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Jewish money was flowing into the coffers of his opponent, the incumbent Governor James B. Hunt, and the election was attracting nationwide media coverage, particularly in New York. It looked like a toss-up, and Helms was very nervous indeed. What to do? Call Roy Cohn.

Roy held a party for Helms, with a guest list made up of some of the richest Jews in New York plus a few wealthy goyim, who were either pro-Israel out of conviction or out of friendship with Cohn. That anybody in the city would show up at a bash for Helms was an act of friendship for Roy. Helms was being portrayed as practically the reincarnation of the Third Reich. When I got word about this party, I was appalled. I couldn’t believe Roy Cohn would get this far. He was pro-Israel, whatever else his madness, he was consistently pro-Israel. How the hell could he allow his right-wing bullshit to bring him to this?

But I’d never act moralistic with Roy Cohn. All I said was: ‘How’d that Jesse Helms fund-raiser go?’

‘It wasn’t a fund-raiser.’

‘Roy,’ I said, ‘I know you held a fucking fund-raiser for Jesse Helms.’

‘It wasn’t that at all,’ he said. ‘It was interferon.’

‘What?’

‘Interferon. To stop the flow of pro-Israeli money to Hunt. That’s what it what it was about. We didn’t ask anybody for a dime. We told them we didn’t want their money. And we didn’t Jesse didn’t need money. He only needed to cut off the other guy’s money. Anyway it would have been stupid to ask these people for campaign contributions. Let’s face it, they couldn’t be caught dead backing Jesse Helms. So the cancer cure. Interferon.’

‘Did it work?’

‘Sure. Jesse will win the election.’

‘But why do you want that? You’ve always been for Israel.’

‘Jesse Helms isn’t anti-Israel,’ Cohn said.

‘How’d he manage to fool the world?’

‘He voted against some Israeli appropriations. He votes against appropriation bills all the time. He votes against the Arabs. He’s an old-line Republican. Tha’ts all there is to it. I know him forever, he’s not pro-Arab, he’s not anti-Israel. He’s for Israel.’ Several months after Helms won re-election, he went to Israel with Roy Cohn. Within a week he was a total Israeli hawk, to the right of General Arik Sharon.

When I next saw Roy, I said, ‘Well, you’re the only guy I know who cashed in markers for Israel.’

He didn’t even smile. He said, ‘I told you, Jesse Helms was pro-Israel.’

‘But Roy, nobody knew it until you took him over there.’

‘I knew it,’ Roy said.

‘Did he know it?’

‘He knows it now.’ And now Roy Cohn smiled.” [ZION, S., 1988, p. 264-265]

Atlanta, Georgia? In 2001, the Atlanta Jewish Times noted the Jewish dimensions of the race for mayor:

“The vast majority of Atlanta’s 86,000 Jews will not vote for mayor, since they live outside the city limits. But they will give money, and for good reason. Many work within the city boundaries ... The Jewish supporters who have decided [who to vote for] are primarily aligning themselves with Pitts and Franklin [the mayoral frontrunners]. Each has several Jews on his or her finance committee ... Dr. Larry Cooper ... [a major Jewish supporter] is chairing Franklin’s finance committee.” [POLLAK, S., 5-11-01]

In Miami, Florida, Elaine Bloom “has been a radio talk-show host, regional president of the National Council of Jewish Women and a top UJA activist. She recently stepped down as chief Florida fund-raiser for Israel’s Bar-Ilan University.” Ms. Bloom, notes J. J. Goldberg, “is one of the most powerful and longest serving Democrats in the Florida state legislature.” [GOLDBERG, J. J., 1-28-2000, p. 12] In 1999, Donald Warshaw, Miami’s powerful city manager, was fired after nearly two years in the position. He was accused of “spending $86,563 in pension and charity funds on trips, designer clothes, $21,276 in hockey tickets and other things from 1993 to 1995 while serving as police commissioner.” [WILSON, C., 10-11-2000] Earlier, in 1993, Dade County Commissioner (Miami, Florida) Joe Gersten, also Jewish, was accused of smoking cocaine with a prostitute in a Miami drug den and subsequently fled to Australia. [DE FEDE, J., 3-16-94]
Also in Florida, in 1999, State Senator Al Gutman was sentenced to two years in prison for “conspiracy in a Medicare fraud case.” Gutman and his wife Marci “secretly owned companies that billed Medicare for health care services that were not performed.” He “collected at least $2 million from fraudulent billings while he served in the Legislature.” [FIELDS, T., 10-20-99; FIELDS, T., 10-26-99] In 2002, Edward Mezvinsky, a former Congressman from Iowa, “was indicted on 66 counts of fraud and related charges for allegedly bilking more than $10 million.” Those signing letters to the court trying to get him off easy were Edward Shils (a University of Pennsylvania professor, Jonathan Yarowsky, a former general counsel to the U.S. House Judiciary Committee, and Rabbi Gerald Wolpe. [MOORE, T., 1-9-02] In 2002, the Nashville (Tennessee) Vice Mayor, Ronnie Steine, “withdrew from the 5th District Congressional race ... after admitting he shoplifted from a Target Store ... and [he] says he has been cited one other time for stealing from the same store.” [KNOXNEWS, 4-28-02]

Jewish interest in political activity is not always, of course, expressly linked to Israel and other Jewish causes. The Las Vegas Review noted the case of Arthur Goldberg in 1999. Goldberg heads Park Place Entertainment, the largest casino/hotel conglomerate in America (Cesar’s Palace, Bally’s, et al). “The New Jersey Casino Control Commission,” noted the paper, “criticized Goldberg and faulted his judgements for allowing his company to pay the Speaker of the Florida House of Representatives $240,000 during a 1994 campaign to legalize casinos ... Goldberg wasn’t here to hear the decision [of the Casino Control Commission] ... [He] was hosting President Clinton at a $10,000 per plate Democratic fund-raiser at the company’s Paris Las Vegas hotel-casino.” [WEINERT, J., p. 2D]

Elsewhere, intensive Jewish lobbying and Jewish money to secure special treatment for fellow Jews around the world has long been a tradition. A 1999 article in the Boston Globe noted the special treatment Jews get in trying to get refugee status to America from Russia (nearly three-quarters of a special refugee program for Russian cases, mostly claiming anti-Semitism, are Jews):

“In other troubled parts of the world, would-be refugees must show they are being persecuted or have a “well-founded fear” of persecution ... But applicants from the former Soviet Union need only show ‘credible basis’ for concern that they might face persecution. Such vague standards left INS employees uncertain what assertions were acceptable to win refugee status. But they said they soon learned from their superiors that a claim of a minor act of discrimination, such as being denied a promotion or a raise, was acceptable, without any need for verification. The majority of the 275,000 who emigrated here through the program were men, women, and children of Jewish heritage ... An attempt to end the program now could prove costly to Democratic candidates, especially to Hilary Rodham Clinton, who has taken steps to court Jewish voters in New York state.” [KURKJIAN, p. A1]

tion of American Immigration Reform testified to Congress that “This program has been documented to be so loosely administered that it has served as a conduit for the settlement of a strong refugee mafia to take root in the United States.” [See the chapter on Jewish dominance in the “Russian Mafia”, p. 1055]. “Added one INS interviewer,” says the Globe, “who asked for anonymity: ‘The prevailing attitude was that Congress had passed the … amendment loosening the restriction for Jews to enter as refugees and we weren’t to stand in the way of putting up numbers’ … Refugee status is an immigrant’s dream. Refugees are entitled to special benefits, including welfare of eight months, health insurance, employment services, and instruction in English as a second language for 18 months, that are not available to foreign visitors with work visas. And it allows for them to petition for U.S. citizenship after five years.” [KURKJIAN, p. A1]

Jews across the world have long been a crucial issue for American Jewry, and the Jews of Russia have been of paramount concern to them since the late 19th century. In the early years of the twentieth century, says J. Bruce Nichols, “the American Jewish Committee brought Jewish concern [about Russian Jews] into the political and economic mainstream by forcing Congress to terminate the eighty year-old treaty regulating U.S. commercial ties with Russia … The [Congressional] vote [on ending the treaty in support of Jewish interests] firmly established the AJC as a force in the conduct of the nation’s foreign affairs.” When Turkey in 1914 expelled over a thousand Russian Jews from Palestine, “several U.S. Navy ships were used to transport them to safety in Alexandria, Egypt. In March 1915 the U.S. Navy shipped 900 tons of [American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee] relief supplies to Palestine; a second shipment courtesy of the government followed the next year … According to a report filed in July 1916 by the U.S. Consul in Jerusalem, only 18,000 of the 82,000 Jews in Palestine were self-supporting; the rest depended on American charity.” [NICHOLS, p. 33-34]

American immigration policy towards Soviet Jews parallels that of guilt-ridden Germany where a 1991 law “gives preferential treatment to Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union … Once in Germany … they enjoy a wide range of government benefits intended to aid their absorption, including employee retraining, German language programs, subsidized housing, free health care and generous welfare payments. After a seven-year residency period, they may apply for German citizenship.” [FISHKOFF, 8-8-97] In 1990, there were 29,000 Jews in Germany; within seven years Russian immigrants pushed the number to 90,000. “Given the prevailing pro-Israel atmosphere in reunited Germany,” notes Sue Fishkoff, “where Holocaust education is being introduced in the five new [German] states and where Israel and the German Jewish community’s affairs feature prominently in the daily news, it would be political death for any [German] community leader or business mogul to come out against giving money to a Jewish cause.” [FISHKOFF, 8-8-97]

After World War II, Jewish organizations discretely lobbied to get 100,000 European Jews to American shores. As Peter Novick describes the efforts:

“Two thirds of the million-dollar budget of the lobbying operation was underwritten by the family of Lessing Rosenwald, the most promi-ponent American anti-Zionist. The goal of the campaign’s initiators was to bring in 100,000 Jewish survivors. But since it was impolitic and contrary to American tradition for legislation to specify the religion of immigrants, and since Jews were estimated to comprise 25% of all DPs [displaced persons], they pressed for a law that would bring in a total of 400,000 DPs over four years. To this end, the Citizens’ Committee on Displaced Persons was established – ostensibly nondenominational, but in fact largely funded and staffed by Jews … The CCDP … systematically downplayed the presence of Jews among the DPs … [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 81-82] … In late 1948 a Jewish journalist charged in the New York Post that a high proportion of non-Jewish DPs were Nazi collaborators. The allegation was denounced in the Jesuit magazine America as ‘anti-Christianism’ quite comparable to … anti-Semitism.’ An open breach between Jewish and Christian groups was only narrowly averted.” [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 89]

In the U.S. in the 1970s, concerted Jewish pressure on Congress to force the Soviet Union to allow Jews to emigrate to Israel, and America, resulted in an attachment to a trade bill that afforded “most favored nation status to the Soviet Union on the condition that it lifted its emigration restrictions … When emigration … swell[ed] to an annual high of 51,000 in 1979, Congress also expanded its financial assistance with the relocation of Soviet émigrés in Israel. In 1976 it appropriated more than $100 million for that purpose … [The American Congress began funding Israeli refugee-absorption programs as early as 1951] [NICHOLES, JB, p. 110] … In contemporary refugee work there is no parallel to U.S./Israeli cooperation in the modern aliyah [immigration to Israel]. Since the founding of Israel the United States has played a critical role in financing the immigration.” [NICHOLES, JB, p. 145]

And what has this Jewish protectionism, and special U.S. governmental favoritism, to Jewish immigrants from Russia provided the United States, and the world? As Robert Friedman, author of a book on the “Russian Mafia,” notes,

“Most of [the first wave of Jewish Russian immigrants, beginning in 1975] settled in Brighton Beach, Brooklyn, which became a ground zero for the Russian mob. And then over the course of the next 15 years, they expanded from a neighborhood extortion group to a multi-billion dollar international crime cartel … [They], along with corrupt oligarchs of the former Soviet Union, had looted Russia, had stolen everything that wasn’t nailed down … [Thousands of Jewish criminals] all pretended they were [Jewish Russian Zionist activist Natan] Sharansky … [They] came [to America] under the guises, under the banner of Jewish refuseniks who were fighting for freedom, for religious freedom.” [PENKA-VA, M., 5-3-2000]

As Martha Birsch, an assistant attorney for the U.S. Organized Crime and Racketeering Strike Force, notes, “We view Russian organized crime as definitely a growing and potentially very serious threat in the United States … Russian organized crime is fairly unique in that it is ... truly international in scope.” [PENKAVA, M., 5-3-2000]

The Jewish American lobby demands special concessions for fellow Jews all over the world. During the politically delicate Israeli airlifts of Jews from Ethiopia to the Jewish state too, “the [U.S.] government had few options but to allow minority interests within the Jewish community to determine its policy.” [NICHOLS, JB, p. 145] In the case of Ethiopian Jewish refugees in Sudan, “at Israel’s request,” notes Jacob Abadi, “Washington promised [Sudan] an increase of $200 million in economic aid in return for a commitment to allow the Falashas to fly out of Sudan.” [ABADI, 1999] Even during the 1979 Iranian revolution, notes J. J. Goldberg, “the INS [Immigration and Naturalization Services] was ordered to exempt Jews and Bahais from the harsh treatment being meted out to Iranians at the border.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 184]

But Russian Jews have long been especially dear to the American Jewish heart (millions of American Jews trace their roots to that country) and again and again American foreign policy bends to Jewish will. A 1986 press report noted that “the status of Soviet Jews has emerged in advance as a central topic at the Reagan-Gorbachev meeting … This development made an arms control-human rights/Jewish emigration linkage a fact of life in superpower negotiations.” “Rarely,” noted New York Times reporter David Shipler in 1987, “has there been as much harmony between an administration and an interest group as there is now between the Reagan administration and the organizations campaigning on behalf of Soviet Jewry.” [BEKER, A., p. 448]

In 1999 intensive Jewish lobbying efforts were still calling the shots in American-Russian foreign policy. “President Clinton,” noted the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “has rejected an appeal by Russian President Boris Yeltsin to repeal a law that conditioned U.S.-Russian trade relations [the Jackson-Vanik Amendment] on the freedom of Jews and others to leave the country … [Yeltsin spoke to Clinton] as the American Jewish Committee reprinted in full-page ads in the New York Times and Los Angeles Times a letter to Yeltsin from all but one of the 100 members of the U.S. Senate threatening to end economic and political support for Russia unless Yeltsin confronted the rise in anti-Semitic rhetoric.” [DORF, M., 6-23-99, p. 7]

Among President Bill Clinton’s other extraordinary favors for the Jewish lobby was the one that concerned America’s new 1996 spy satellite. “Israel has demanded special treatment,” noted the (London) Daily Telegraph, “deploying America’s influential Jewish lobby to head off what it viewed as a major threat to its national security.” Clinton administration policy ultimately decided that the spy satellite would not be used to view Israeli territory – the only nation on earth afforded such treatment. [WARREN, M., 9-9-96, p. 28]

In 1988, the Palestinians declared themselves an independent nation. Palestinian leader Yassar Arafat requested a visa to visit the United States to speak to the United Nations (whose formal home, of course, is in New York City). Anti-Palestinian Jewish/Zionist influence was so strong in American government that Arafat’s request was refused. In response, notes Israeli Amnon
Rubenstein, “in an unprecedented action, the United Nations then moved the entire General Assembly to Geneva, Switzerland, so that Arafat could speak during a special session on the question of Palestine. A total of 154 countries supported the resolution, with only the United States and Israel voting against it.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 141] Ten years later, in 1998, always following Israeli dictates as United States Middle East foreign policy, the U.S. resisted popular world opinion again. By a United Nations vote of 124 to 4, Palestinians were provided “the right to take part in the [UN] General Assembly and reply to … speeches; to co-sponsor resolutions on Middle East issues” as part of its newly afforded “super-observer” status. “In Washington,” noted the New York Times, “the State Department condemned the vote in strong terms. The department spokesman, James P. Rubin, said the Clinton Administration considered the vote an unnecessary and untimely mistake.” [CROSSETTE, B., 7-8-98]

Under continuous Jewish pressure, in 1995, Congress finally passed an act with profound political implications in the Middle East, requiring that the United States embassy in Tel Aviv be moved to Jerusalem (an action that is widely viewed in the Middle East as an American sanctioning of Jewish claims to all of Jerusalem as its capitol. The move is so detrimental to the Israeli-Arab “peace process” that the actual change has yet to be carried out). [GERSHKOFF, 1999]

For years the Jewish/Israeli lobby has fought to get the United Nations to rescind its November 1975 resolution that formally declared: “Zionism is racism.” One of the avenues to this accomplishment was the United Nations purse strings (in conjunction with the collapse of the Soviet Union and the communist bloc), of which United States contributions by the 1980s amounted to about 50% of the U.N.'s economic base. [Mrejen, p. 67] In August 1985 the United States Congress approved the “Kassebaum Amendment” which substantially cut U.S. subsidies to the world body, precipitating for it a financial crisis. In a 1998 article in Israeli Affairs, Jewish author Emmanuel Mrejen complained about the injustice of “unbridled majoritarianism” (i.e., the system of one nation, one vote) of the UN, a voting design that usually functioned negatively for the powerful western nations. And Israel. “Israel,” wrote Mrejen, “should support [U.N.] reforms aimed at limiting the disastrous effects of majoritarianism [i.e., democratic voting], which both permitted the success of the anti-Israel propaganda at the UN and deeply discredited the UN itself … As explained by [Israeli] professor Yehuda Blum, the charter of the United Nations ‘has been eroded over the years under the deleterious effects of the dictatorship of the majority.’” [MREJEN, p. 81] By the 1990s, thanks primarily to Jewish and American pressures upon the world community, the UN resolution equating Zionism with racism was rescinded.

(A refreshingly uncommon approach to the “Zionism is racism” issue was that of Jewish-born poet Allen Ginsberg. “He told me in our 1992 interview,” says Roger Kamenetz, “that he agreed with the former United Nations resolution stating that Zionism is racism. ‘And the fact that everybody is so screamingly angry that Zionism can’t be called that is even worse.’”) [KAMENETZ, R., 1994, p. 151]
In 2002, Iraq’s deputy prime minister, Tariq Aziz, publicly complained about the U.N.’s handling of its planned investigation of an alleged Israeli massacre of Palestinians in the West Bank town of Jenin. Israel refused to cooperate. As London’s Guardian observed:

“[Iraq] accused the United Nations of double standards yesterday for imposing sanctions on Baghdad for 11 years, but failing to take any action against Israel for blocking a fact-finding inquiry into military action at the Jenin refugee camp ... [Iraqi official] Aziz said [the U.N.’s] handling of the Jenin fact-finding issue was proof of double standards, arguing that while the UN stood firm [under U.S. pressure] on its resolutions on Iraq, it had done little in the face of Israel’s resistance to security council resolutions, even those supported by the U.S.”

[MACASKILL, E., 5-2-02]

Jewish and Zionist interests are also increasingly molded into the U.S. government via the Anti-Defamation League. The ADL – founded in the early 20th century to diffuse hostility towards Jews and, later, to also promote Israeli interests – today functions as a kind of private ethnic police agency. The ADL, accused by some critics as having links to Israeli’s Mossad spy agency, has for decades morphed into various U.S. police and security organizations, providing spy information about what it defines as “hate” groups (those deemed “anti-Semitic” are of course the most important to them). [The ADL was caught spying, on the full political spectrum of political organizations – many critical of Israel – in the early 1990s – See the Anti-Semitism chapter p. 557]. With a yearly budget of nearly $50 million, it also provides indoctrination to its own interpretations of ethnic, religious, and racial “tolerance” (Any of the many, many racist and chauvinistic expressions of Jewish and Israeli intolerance are NEVER part of the curriculum).

In February 2002 the Los Angeles Times reported that the ADL had “announced a new partnership with law enforcement agencies to help deal with hate crimes and extremists ... For much of its history, officials said, the Anti-Defamation League has worked with law enforcement to combat bias and hate crimes, but the creation of the committee formalizes this relationship and brings more agencies together ... Law enforcement groups [involved in the ADL closure] include the Los Angeles County Sheriff’s Department, the Los Angeles police, the Highway Patrol, the FBI, the state attorney general’s office and agencies from Bakersfield, Palm Springs, Pasadena, Riverside, San Bernardino and Santa Barbara.” Also, that same month, the Jewish Bulletin noted that “the [San Francisco-based] Anti-Defamation League has been working with local and federal law enforcement in Salt Lake City to monitor extremist activity at the Winter Olympics.” [GOLDSMITH, A., ADL WORKING, 2-2002] In other words, a private Judeo-centric, pro-Israel propaganda organization has become institutionalized as an active, formalized part of the American law and security system.

Ironically, the ADL’s record with the U.S. government has not necessarily been stellar. Jewish Hollywood mogul Dore Schary – national chairman of the ADL from 1963–69 – was, for example, noted in FBI reports as a “strong communist sympathizer.” [WILCOX, L., 1999, p. 61, 62] “Ironically,” notes Laird Wilcox, “FBI records reveal that Dore Schary was not the only ADL operative whose alleged communist ‘links and ties’ caught the FBI’s attention. Other references are made in FBI internal documents to David Edelsburg, director of the ADL’s Washington office, as a member of the National Lawyers Guild. A reference to Gilbert J. Balkin, director of the Florida Regional Office of the ADL, and his wife Revy, alluded to ‘links and ties’ with the Council for American-Soviet Friendship and the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and noted that they are ‘alleged communist front organizations.’ It also noted that Revy Balkin was editor of a monthly newspaper called the Miami Beacon that ‘was always in accord with the Communist Party line.’” [WILCOX, L., 1999, p. 63]

(As Wilcox underscores, even if such alleged ADL communist links were circumstantial, this is the methodology used very often by the great Jewish organization itself against those it singles out as having associated with “racists,” “Nazis,” “anti-Semites,” etc.)

Jewish money talks in many ways in American political life; some of the committed rich can even take on less overtly Jewish issues – virtually alone – that are dear to them. In 1998 Jewish multi-millionaire Ron Unz, for instance, embarked on what may be a new trend; by “will and wealth,” noted the New York Times, he was the founding – and central – force in successfully lobbying the public to wipe out bilingual education in California. The head of a voter’s initiative that he instigated, its advertising costs totaled $1.2 million, of which he personally contributed $700,000. [BRUNI, p. 1, 30]

In 1999, William Pfaff, a commentator in the Los Angeles Times, noted with profound pessimism that:

“As the United States approaches the 2000 presidential race in which more money will be spent than ever, the fact must be faced that America has become a plutocracy. Money rules government. The transformation is probably irreversible … Many Americans undoubtedly do not realize that other nations do not run their politics in this way … The unrecognized but crucial reality, however, is that even if Americans should come to recognize what has happened, and should wish to restore the democratic foundations of their republican form of government, they could change nothing. Established constitutional interpretation and legal precedent, and the power of money in the legislative process, now can prevent any fundamental change.” [PFAFF, p. 9]

Although crucial and overwhelmingly dominant, money is not absolutely everything in the American political system, of course. There are other political dimensions within which Jews are omnipresent also. “The benefits Jews demand for access to government becomes especially evident when we see the extent to which Jews have relied upon the state and the public economy to achieve positions of influence and status in American society,” says Benjamin Ginsberg, “… Protestants tend to derive their positions mainly from activities in the private sector and Catholics from trade union leadership. Jews, on the other hand, have depended primarily on the media, foundations, and public interest groups, and appointed government posts to achieve positions in the American political and social elite.” [GINSBERG, p. 103]

Jews – as 2.5% of the American population and 6% of its electorate – have proven to be twice as likely to vote in political elections as other Americans. Almost half of all Jews live in the most populated states – New York and California, states that account for 166 electoral votes in Presidential elections. These factors – their clustering in important states, their disproportionate proclivity to vote, their profound financial influence, and their deep sense of Jewish/Israel “causes” – make Jews potentially pivotal in any Presidential election. Whitfield notes that

“About a quarter of the voters in New York state … are Jewish. In 1976 they went about 80% for Carter over Gerald Ford, enabling the Democrats to carry the state and with it the Presidency. Had Carter and the incumbent evenly split the Jewish vote of New York, Carter would have lost the state and with it the White House. Thus, the influence of a tiny minority is magnified in an incorrigibly anti-majoritarian, winner-take-all system; and that is why their attitudes and impulses have counted ever since the political alignment that began in 1932.” [WHITFIELD, Am Space, p. 93]

In Bill Clinton’s successful bid for the American presidency, and reelection, he also garnered 80% of the national Jewish vote. [ROTH, B., 10–11–99] As conservative Rabbi Daniel Lapin disdainfully observed, “More than 80 percent of Jews voted for the man whom nearly 60 percent of American voters rejected.” [LAPIN, D., 1999, p. 293]

In 2001 the Jewish Forward also has noted the implications of Jewish voting power:

“The available evidence on Jewish voting patterns, when examined closely, shows that the Jewish community is in fact an extremely potent political force in the United States and will remain so for years to come … Jews are strategically located in the places that make the most difference on Election Day … Jews are concentrated and communally active in all [the “swing states”], especially Florida, Pennsylvania and California. This has been true for decades, even if it did not get national attention until November 2000, when Mr. Bush, by some interpretations, won his presidency thanks to thousands of Florida Jews who unwittingly cast their votes for Pat Buchanan … True, a majority of Jews vote Democratic. However, a study of Jewish voting habits during the past century shows that enough Jewish voters – some 30% – will switch parties to punish a candidate who takes positions they dislike. In states such as Florida and California, in which Jews number 4% to 6% of the electorate, a 30% swing can tip the scales in a close election … In 1972, for example, when Jewish support for the Democrats was at record highs, the party’s candidate was the liberal isolationist George McGovern. So controversial was Mr. McGovern’s stand on the Middle East that Israel’s ambassador in Washington at the time, Yitzhak Rabin, went public with his preference for Richard Nixon. In that election, 16% of the Jewish vote shifted away from the Democrats. An even greater Jewish exodus accompanied the 1980 re-election bid of President Carter, just months after his administration voted for an anti-Israel resolution in the United Nations Security Council. In both case, the defecting Jewish votes made up a significant portion of the Republican victory margin … What all this means is that the Jewish vote counts. While most Jews will not base their votes on the issue of Israel alone, if at all, a large portion apparently will switch parties when a candidate seems threatening to the Jewish state … Thus, Jewish communal identity remains politically potent. If the strident pro-Israel stances taken in the most recent presidential election are any indication, the politicians if not the rabbis – have already figured this out.” [HELMREICH, J., 4-6-01]

As early as 1947, the year before Israel proclaimed its nationhood, a political advisor to President Harry Truman – in discussing upcoming elections – noted that “Jews hold the key to New York and the key to the Jewish voters is what the Administration does about Palestine [Israel].” [GROSE, p. 218] “Zionist influence increased exponentially during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations,” notes J. J. Goldberg, “because the affluence and influence of Jews in American society had increased. Jews had become vital donors to the Democratic Party; they were key figures in the organization’s labor movement, which was essentially the Democratic Party.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 158]

In 1961, in a meeting with David Ben-Gurion at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City, President John F. Kennedy told the Israeli Prime Minister, “I know I was elected because of American Jews. I owe them my election. Tell me, is there something that I can do for the Jewish people?” [TIVNAN, p. 56] Among favors for Jewish lobbyists were the facts that Kennedy “was the first president to provide arms (the Hawk missile) to Israel. In the months prior to his assassination, he was preparing for conferences on Soviet treatment of Jews.” [WEINSTEIN, L., 1985, p. 5] (The “third man” in Jacqueline Kennedy’s life – after the president and Aristotle Onassis – was Maurice Templeton, a Jewish diamond merchant who became Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis’s financial adviser after her second husband’s death in 1975. Templeton “is said to have turned her $26 million inheritance into $100 million.” Templeton moved in with Ms. Kennedy Onassis in 1982, and lived with her until her death in 1994. [O’Clery, p. 8] Jacqueline’s daughter by JFK, Caroline, married Edwin Schlossberg – also Jewish. For that matter, even the wife of President F. D. Roosevelt, Eleanor, in later years had a similar Jewish “close friend and frequent traveling companion” – David Gurewitsch, her physician. There are even existent FBI documents alleging, based in part on a tape recording, that she had an affair with a Jewish American socialist leader, Joseph Lash, in 1943. President Roosevelt was informed of these items. At the time of the alleged affair, Lash was the Executive Secretary of the American Student Union; he had met the president’s wife while testifying at a Senate investigation of left-wing political activities in the United States. In 1972 Lash wrote a Dorothy Kearns Goodwin’s book about the Roosevelts notes the intensity of the Eleanor Roosevelt-Joe Lash (under investigation for communist activity) relationship like this:

“Although public concerns dominated the thoughts and activities of the president and the first lady in the early months of 1942 ... Eleanor seemed obsessed by her relationship with Joe Lash; and the president, as always, seemed to be removed from everybody, in spite of his ever-tolerant, ever-cheerful manner.” [GOODWIN, D.K., 1995, p. 334] ... On the third floor of the White House, Eleanor set aside a room for Lash to use whenever he was on leave [from the army]. On her desk she placed an enlarged photo of Lash. ‘I want to be able to look at you all the time,’ she explained. In addition, Eleanor told Joe to call her collect at the White House whenever the president was away at Hyde Park, and to ‘know that her love was there for him always. No other engagement can’t be given up, if there is a chance to see you!’ ... In the White House, Eleanor waited anxiously for his letters and calls. ‘Your telegram came,’ he happily noted. ‘I could have kissed the telegram. I was so glad to have word from you.’ [GOODWIN, D.K., 1995, p. 337] Eleanor was not the central person in Joe’s life that spring, however. For more than a year, he had been involved with a fellow worker at the International Student Center. Trude Pratt. The situation was complicated, since Trude was still married to Eliot Pratt, a wealthy man who was threatening to keep the children if she divorced him ... Eleanor had promised Lash before he went into the army that she would give up any other engagement if she had a chance to see him. Despite the pressure of an almost inhuman schedule, she kept her promise. No sooner was Lash transferred to weather-forecasting school at Chanute Field than Eleanor journeyed to Urbana, Illinois, to see him ... Three weeks later, Eleanor joined Joe Lash again, this time at the Hotel Blackstone in Chicago. Here, too, they stayed in Eleanor’s room most of the day. In the afternoon, they went out for a walk; in the evening, Lash was so drowsy that he fell asleep on the bed while Eleanor stroked his forehead. ‘I loved just sitting near you while you slept ...’ Eleanor later wrote. But the pleasures Eleanor derived from her time with Lash were quickly dispelled when she was told by a hotel employee that her room had been bugged. For weeks, it turned out, Lash had been under surveillance by the army’s Counter-Intelligence Corps. Mistakingly convinced that he was part a communist conspiracy, the CIC had been reading his mail and trailing him wherever he went. When the first lady’s telegram arrived, inviting him to join her at the Hotel Blackstone, the CIC bugged her room. Apparently unconcerned about the impropriety of spending two weekends in adjoining rooms with a young serviceman, Eleanor went to see Hopkins as soon as she returned and pleaded with him to find out what was going on. Hopkins took the matter to General Marshall, who confirmed that Mrs. Roosevelt’s room had indeed been bugged. When the president learned that army agents had put his wife under surveillance without presidential authorization, he was furious. Moving quickly to take action against everyone responsible, he ordered an immediate shake-up of the army’s intelligence operations, including the disbanding of the CIC. In addition, military orders were drawn up to send Lash overseas, along with his entire group of weather forecasters.” [GOODWIN, D. K., 1995, p. 420]

After JFK, the presidential successor was Lyndon Johnson whose treasurer for his first Senate campaign was a member of a prominent Texas Jewish family, James Novy (he was also the regional chairman of the Zionist Organization of America). Other Jewish appointees when Johnson became President included Abe Fortas as a Supreme Court Justice (he ultimately resigned in 1969, after controversy over his “extrajudicial” activities, including financial links to convicted Jewish financier Louis Wolfson), [MURPHY, B., 1983, p. 4-5] Wilbur Cohen (Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare), Arthur Goldberg (Kennedy’s Secretary of Labor) as the ambassador to the United Nations, Walter Rostow as the National Security Adviser, Walter’s brother Eugene as third in power at the State Department, the “intellectual in residence” John Roche, and Abe Feinberg as a close personal aide. Arthur Krim, the head of United Artists was notable as an important Democratic Party fundraiser. (He also had an Israeli wife). Such men, notes Edward Tivnan, “were avid supporters of Israel.” [TIVNAN, p. 59; PLESUR, M., 1982, p. 143]

During Lyndon Johnson’s presidency, notes Steven Spiegel, “the administration was filled with people sympathetic to Israel,” including “John Roche and Ben Wattenberg, two speechwriters on the White House staff… Sheldon Cohen, Chief of the Internal Revenue Service … Arthur Goldberg as Ambassador to the United Nations and Eugene Rostow as Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs.” [SPIEGEL, S., p. 128] Other pro-Israel, influential Jews in President Johnson’s circle included lawyers Ed Weisel and David Ginsberg – Ginsberg even counted the Israeli embassy itself as a client. Johnson also reportedly developed a close personal friendship with Israeli ambassador Ephraim Evron; he was often invited to Johnson’s home. [SPIEGEL, p. 129] Two of Johnson’s “closest advisers” were also Jewish, Abe Fortas and Edwin Weisel, Sr., both of whom “felt deeply about the security of Israel.” [HERSH, S., p. 126] In evaluating President Johnson’s political career, his wife, Lady Bird, once noted that “Jews have been woven into the warp and woof of all his years.” [HERSH, S., p. 128]

As Jewish author James Yaffe noted in 1968, “Many Jews go to work for the government. Though it is impossible to determine to what extent they are actually making policy, they do have key positions in all the departments of the cabinet, even the formerly sacrosanct State Department.” [YAFFE, J. 1968, p. 224]

Johnson’s Republican nemesis for the presidential election in 1964 was Arizona senator Barry Goldwater (ancestor’s name: Goldwasser), whose father was Jewish. Goldwater never foregrounded a Jewish identity and was known as an Episcopalian:

“The Senator had gotten his start in Arizona politics in 1949 when Harry Rosenzweig, son of a pioneer Phoenix jeweler, persuaded him to run for the Phoenix City Council on a better government ticket. Both were elected. The Senator readily admits that he learned his politics at the knee of his uncle Morris [Goldwater]. Morris, Mayor of Prescott [Arizona] for twenty-two years, was a Democrat … After Barry Goldwater’s [non-Jewish] wife Peggy died, the Senator remarried in 1992. Harry Rosenzweig, Barry’s life-long personal and political friend, remarked with a smile, “Susan Wechsler is a very nice Jewish woman.” ” [SOUTH-WEST JEWISH ARCHIVES, Spring 1993]

In June 1967, during Johnson’s presidency, one of the most infamous (and much-hushed up) incidents in Israeli-American relations occurred off the coast of Israel: a United States spy ship, the USS Liberty, alone and unprotected in international waters, was repeatedly strafed, bombed, napalmed, and torpedoed by Israeli jets and ships. 34 Americans were killed and over 130 others were wounded. The Israeli government provided a formal apology, claiming that it was a case of mistaken identity. The United States government officially agreed. Most of those who were on the ship believed this to be a blatant lie: the attack upon Americans was deliberate.

In 1979, James M. Ennes, Jr., a surviving officer of the destroyed ship, wrote a book-length expose (published by Random House) about what he, and others involved with the poorly-armed ship, felt was a massive “cover-up” in the American government about the incident. After watching the close and careful inspection of the ship by circling Israeli planes, and researching government and CIA documents, Ennes explains the reason for the subsequent Israeli attack, (six bombing and strafing passes from jets overhead and three torpedoes from a nearby Israeli ship). Ennes spotted the Israeli exploitation of an old, old Jewish theme: the insistence of categorical innocence. In the context of Arab-Israeli hostilities, and the Six Day War of 1967:

“The Israeli government was acutely aware of President Johnson’s warning: the American president had told [Israeli] Foreign Minister Eban that he would support Israel only in self-defense, not attacks against her neighbors. It was important, then, for Israel to be seen as an innocent victim fighting off hoards of wild-eyed Arabs. Not surprisingly, Israel claimed that nearly everything she did was in self-defense … Now, with the war virtually over and with the world crying for peace, could Israel put troops in Syria without being seen as an aggressor? Probably not. Not with the USS Liberty so close to shore and presumably listening. Liberty would have to go … The invasion of Syria just a few hours after the attack on Liberty came as a surprise to most of the world. There seemed to be no connection between the two events, and writers who claimed to see a connection had no facts to back up their speculative stories. They had no facts because the facts were kept from them.” [ENNES, p. 212-213]

Eventually, frustrated at an enforced censorship upon all ship crewman to keep them from speaking freely to the press about what had occurred, the Liberty’s engineer officer, George Golden, among others, secretly leaked their feelings to an Associated Press reporter, charging that both their experience and all evidence pointed to a deliberate, and planned, Israeli attack upon the ship, fully realizing that it was American. In response, the (Jewish) American ambassador to Malta, George Feldman, notes Ennes, “berated Golden by telephone for the unauthorized news leak (still assumed to have originated with some undisciplined seaman), and then dispatched a Navy lieutenant to follow up in person … Feldman held key positions in the Democratic National Convention and in 1965 was appointed to an ambassadorship by President Johnson.” [ENNES, p. 167-168] The USS Liberty story soon was dropped from attention by the nation’s media.

One of the ship’s officers, Jim McGonagle, was eventually awarded a Congressional Medal of Honor for his actions during Israeli attack. But Ennes observes that it was done with as little publicity as possible:

“Why was the presentation made by the Secretary of Navy? And why in the Navy Yard? Medals of honor are ordinarily presented in the White House by the President with great fanfare and elaborate ceremony. McGonagle’s medal should have been awarded with no less pomp. A naval officer with the medals and awards told me the story: ‘The government is pretty jumpy about Israel,’ he said. ‘The State Department even asked the Israeli ambassador if his government had any objection to McGonagle getting the medal.’ ‘Certainly not!’ Israel said. But to avoid any possible offense McGonagle’s citation does not mention Israel at all, and the award ceremony kept the lowest possible profile.” [ENNES, p. 194]

And the consequences of the Jewish nation’s deliberate attack upon the American ship? Ennes notes with disdain that “a few days after the war, the government of France reneged on a contract for delivery to Israel of fifty Mirage fighters. The United States, in turn, began negotiations with Israel for delivery of fifty Phantom F-4 fighters.” Less than two years after the destruction of the Liberty, 120 Israeli pilots were being trained in the United States about their new American-built war planes. [ENNES, p. 196-197]

In a 1974 volume on Jews in the American political process, Stephen Isaacs noted that “the most respected political reporter of the day (David Broder),” “the best known political media expert (David Garth),” “the top political filmmaker” (Charles Guggenheim), [who noted in later years that “the broadcasting industry is dictating how the political process in the United States is to be carried out,” ROWE] “two of the three principal national public opinion surveyors (Louis Harris and David Yankelovitch),” “the most successful popular political historian (Theodore White),” “the leading authority on campaign financing (Herbert E. Alexander),” “the pre-eminent producer of political radio commentary (Tony Schwartz),” and “the best known political satirist (Art Buchwald)” were Jews. So also were “many of the most prominent political fund raisers, leading political speechwriters, and the Chairman of the Democratic National Convention.” Four of the top Presidential candidates in 1972 had Jews as part of their “top managerial entourage.” [ISAACS, p. 7-8]

In 2001, the New Jersey Jewish News reviewed a biography (entitled “Wild Man: The Life and Times of Daniel Ellsberg”) about Daniel Ellsberg (the man who leaked the infamous “Pentagon Papers” about the Vietnam War during the President Richard Nixon administration). Ellsberg’s parents were both Jewish. “Richard Nixon roundly cursed Ellsberg,” notes the News,

“But Nixon on this occasion didn’t invoke any anti-Semitic slurs. Ellsberg, it seems, just wasn’t Jewish enough to provoke that sort of name-calling. Yet the un-Jewish character of the Ellsberg affair is all the more remarkable for the extraordinary number of Jews involved in the case. How often have so many disparate American Jews taken center stage in a national event? To name just a few, we have Leslie Gelb, the chief author of the Pentagon Papers; Henry Kissinger, Nixon’s national security adviser and Ellsberg’s former Harvard colleague; Leonard Weinglass and William Kunstler, two of Ellsberg’s attorneys; Max Frankel and Arthur O. Sulzberger of the New York Times, which first published the secret papers; Sidney Zion, the maverick reporter who named Ellsberg as the leaker; Seymour Hirsh, the investigative journalist and one of Ellsberg’s close friends; Barbara Streisand, who sang to raise money for Ellsberg’s legal defense front; Louis Marx, the toy tycoon and Ellsberg’s father-in-law; Bernard Barker, the Washington burglar; Noam Chomsky, an outspoken Ellsberg defender; and Ellsberg’s countless Jewish colleagues and acquaintances at Harvard, at the RAND corporation, in the government, and in the anti-Vietnam War movement ... Before, during, and after the Pentagon Papers episode, Ellsberg was an egomaniac, a narcissist, a braggart, a liar and compulsive fantasist, a drug abuser, a negligent husband and father, indeed a serial adulterer [and] pornography collector.” [NESVISKY, M., 9/6/2001]

Jews also of course make the important social rounds. In 1976, notes Lenni Brenner, “Israel Bonds put on a fashion show in Washington. Among the models were Mrs. David Brinkley, Mrs. Martin Agronsky, and Mrs. Dan Rather. It is also revealing that some of the other models were Mrs. Henry Jackson, wife of the pro-Israel ‘Senator from Boeing,’ Mrs. Joseph Sisco, wife of the ex-Under Secretary of State. Present were the wives of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, and the Head of the Federal Reserve Board. Obviously some leading TV news people are too close to the Zionists.” [BRENNER, p. 326]

“Selling has become the most important aspect of politics,” adds Isaacs, “and selling is what many Jews have had to do for centuries. Their major role in merchandizing and advertising, for instance, represents a natural extension of history and tradition ... Since promoting is a sophisticated concomitant of selling, it is unsurprising to see the descendants of Europe’s mercantile class appearing now as political advertising consultants, media specialists, speech writers, campaign managers, [and] mail-order fund raisers.” [ISAACS, p. 29]
“Jews not only staff domestic service agencies,” notes Benjamin Ginsberg, “but are … extremely active in the public interest groups, think tanks, consulting firms, and universities that develop the domestic state’s policies and are funded by its grants.” [GINSBERG, p. 152]

The fulcrum of the massive and continuous Israeli lobbying effort in Washington DC is the American Israel Public Action Committee (AIPAC). (Its original title was the American Zionist Committee for Public Affairs.) [KENEN, I., 1981, p. 107] AIPAC was founded in 1953, notes Steven Siegel, when “the tension between the [Eisenhower] administration and Israeli supporters was so acute that there were rumors (unfounded as it turned out) that the administration would investigate the American Zionist Council. Therefore, an independent lobbying committee was formed (which years later was renamed [AIPAC]).” [SPIEGEL, p. 52]

50,000 dues-paying members strong, AIPAC has an annual budget of $15 million and offices in eight cities. “It’s endorsement,” says Paul Findley, “usually results in contributions from the nearly 100 pro-Israel political action committees around the country.” [FINDLEY, DEL, p. 95] In 1987 the New York Times wrote that AIPAC “has become a major force in shaping United States policy in the Middle East … [t]he organization has gained power to influence a presidential candidate’s choice of staff, to block practically any arms sale to an Arab country and to serve as a catalyst for intimate military relations between the Pentagon and the Israeli army. Its leading officials are consulted by State Department and White House policy makers, by senators and generals.” [FINDLEY, DEL, p. 96] AIPAC’s Israel lobby, notes Richard Curtiss, has “the power to pump up to a million dollars into the campaign coffers of any friendly member of Congress, or into the campaign of the opponents of an unfriendly member.” [CURTISS, p. 12]

“A lobby is a night flower,” says AIPAC research director Steve Rosen, “– it thrives in the dark and dies in the sun.” [RAVIV, p. 326] (Another version of this strategy of behind-the-scenes intrigue is past World Zionist Organization president Nahum Goldmann’s comment about Zionism itself: “With us, the watchword is confidentiality.” [GOLDMANN, N., 1978, p. 47]) “I believe in political loyalty,” said the AIPAC president in 1992, “If someone has been good for Israel, no matter who – if my brother would run against them – I would support them because they’d been good to Israel.” [FINDLEY, p. 105]

“So great is the perceived power of AIPAC to mobilize financial support for pro-Israel candidates – or to challenge those perceived as hostile,” notes Martin Sieff, “that this year [1999], as is usually the case, around half the members of the Senate and one-third of the House of Representatives were expected to attend the policy banquet at [AIPAC’s annual] conference.” [SIEFF, 1999]

Hedrick Smith noted in the New York Times that AIPAC had become a “superlobby … [It] gained so much political muscle that by 1985 AIPAC and its allies could force President Reagan to renege on an arms deal he had promised to [Jordan’s] King Hussein. By 1986, the pro-Israel lobby could stop Reagan from making another jet fighter deal with Saudi Arabia; and Secretary of State
George Shultz had to sit down with AIPAC’s executive director – not Congressional leaders – to find out what level of arms sales to the Saudis AIPAC would tolerate.” [FINDLEY, Del, p. 97] If things go as planned, said AIPAC director Thomas A. Dine, “if there is a Secretary of State who is not positive about Israel, he will not be able to overcome the bureaucratic relationship between Israel and the United States that we have established.” [FINDLEY, Del, p. 98]

As Michael Massing noted in the Los Angeles Times in 2002, during the bloody Palestinian revolt against oppressive Israeli rule and the American government’s reluctance to restrain Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon’s vicious’ reprisals upon the Palestinian people:

“The American Israel Public Affairs Committee focuses on Congress. Long regarded as one of the most effective foreign-policy lobbies in Washington, AIPAC has an annual budget of $19.5 million, a staff of 130, and some 60,000 members. From its office near Capitol Hill, it researches issues, tracks legislation and lobbies Congress. Most of all, it gives money—lots of it. Between 1997 and 2001, the 46 members on AIPAC’s board together gave political candidates and parties well in excess of $3 million, or an average of more than $70,000 apiece. Many of its members give money as well. Much of this money is distributed through a network of pro-Israel political action committees. Recipients include many key members of Congress on both sides of the aisle, from Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer, Charles E. Schumer and Paul Wellstone to GOP Sens. Christopher S. Bond, J. Dennis Hastert and Trent Lott. It is not surprising, then, that Congress tends to go along with whatever AIPAC wants. What AIPAC wants, meanwhile, is determined by its wealthy and powerful board of directors, which is united in its commitment to a strong Israel and to securing unwavering U.S. support for it. Since Sharon became prime minister, AIPAC has steadfastly backed him. With the United States coming under strong international pressure to rein in both Israelis and Palestinians, AIPAC has pressed the Bush administration to crack down on Arafat—and leave Sharon alone. Thus, last fall, when U.S. Secretary of State Colin L. Powell was preparing a new peace initiative with Zinni serving as a special envoy, AIPAC sent a memo to its members in the field, urging them to meet with their congressional representatives and press them to keep the administration off Israel’s back. The memo, notes a former AIPAC official, was part of ‘an aggressive campaign to get AIPAC members to call on their congressmen to put pressure on the administration not to send Zinni to the region. Their emphasis was clearly to try to minimize any effort by the administration to say Israel must exercise restraint.’ That effort has largely succeeded.” [MASSING, M., 3-10-02]

In 1994 Neal Sher was appointed the head of AIPAC. He was formerly the director of the Justice Department’s Office of Special Investigations (OIS), the department that sought to curry Jewish favor by allowing Israel to extradite, and execute, Cleveland factory worker John Demjanjuk on fraudulent charges that he was Nazi mass murderer Ivan the Terrible. Sher replaced Tom Dine who was forced to resign, alas, for classical anti-Semitic comments about Orthodox Jews:

“I don’t think mainstream Jews feel very comfortable with the Ultra-Orthodox. It is a class thing, I suppose. Their image is ‘smelly.’ That’s what I’d say now you’ve got me thinking about it. Hasids and New York diamond dealers.” [FRIEDMAN, p. A10]

A few days later the AIPAC vice president, Harvey Friedman, was also forced to resign for calling Israel’s deputy foreign minister a “little slime ball.” [WEISSKOPF, p. A23] In yet another top AIPAC resignation the year earlier, the St. Louis Dispatch noted that

“AIPAC president David Steiner was forced to resign abruptly after he was secretly tape-recorded bragging about AIPAC’s influence over State Department appointments in Bill Clinton’s administration.” [LIPMAN, p. 5D]

Despite the fact that Steiner confirmed the obvious, Pat Buchanan, a 1996 candidate for the Presidency, attracted massive Jewish accusations of “anti-Semitism” for his widely reported comment that the United States Congress was “Zionist occupied territory.” “On Middle East policy,” says former Undersecretary of State George W. Ball, “Congress behaves like a bunch of trained poodles, jumping through the hoops held by Israel’s lobby.” [FINDLEY, p. xxvii] Former Ambassador to the United Nations Donald McHenry has complained that “because of the [Israeli] lobby’s influence, our government is unable to pursue its own national interests in the Middle East.” [FINDLEY, p. xxvii]

AIPAC supports the Near East Report, a weekly newsletter sent to all Congressmen, and important academic, media, and governmental officials. It has also published Myths and Facts foregrounding its “facts” to favor Israel, and The Campaign to Discredit Israel, a volume that functions as a blacklist against those who have opposed excessive Zionist influence in America. 21 organizations and 39 individuals were listed “who are active in the efforts to weaken the bonds between the United States and Israel, who seek to enhance United States-Arab relations at the expense of Israel, or who perform paid services to Arab governments pursuing these goals.” The Anti-Defamation League’s version of the same defamations is Arab Propaganda in America: Vehicles and Voices. [FINDLEY, p. 102-103] AIPAC also, notes the White House Weekly, “carefully monitors the pro- or anti-Israel voting records of every congressman on Capitol Hill. A word from its publications can unleash Niagaras of financial support for pro-Israel candidates for national office from Maine to New Mexico. Senators and others hostile to the Jewish state, conversely, find immensely well-funded political action campaigns (PACS) springing up overnight to arm their opponents once AIPAC has pointed the way.” [SIEFF, 1999]

Gregory Slabodkin, who was formerly employed at AIPAC, notes that “To date, revelations about AIPAC’s blacklisting and smear tactics have barely scratched the surface of the pro-Israel lobby’s secret activities … AIPAC operates a covert section in its research department that monitors and keeps files on politicians, journalists, academics, Arab-American activists, Jewish liberals and others it labels ‘anti-Jewish.’” [FINDLEY, DEL, p. 103] AIPAC files exist for a variety of people; national politicians or governmental administrators include former Chief of Staff John Sununu, former Reagan Secretaries of Defense Caspar Weinberger and Frank Carlucci, former President Jimmy Carter and former Democratic Presidential candidate George McGovern, Senate Minority Leader Robert Dole, Republican Senator John Chafee, House Majority Whip David Bonior, and Democratic Representatives John Conyers, John Dingell, Mervyn Dymally, Mary Rose Oakar, Nick Joe Rahall, James Traficant, Jr., among others. [FINDLEY, p. 104] Liberal Jews afforded files included Richard Dreyfuss, Barbara Streisand, Peter Yarrow, and Woody Allen. [FRIEDMAN, Israel, p. 26] “The most insidious aspect of the files,” said Murray Potner, former editor of the American Jewish Committee’s magazine Present Tense, “is that it leads to enormous self-censorship in the Jewish community. When they track progressive Jews, they are trying to intimidate.” [FRIEDMAN, Israel, p. 26]

“Although it is Israel’s registered foreign agent,” says Jane Hunter, “AIPAC is also a networking mechanism for national and regional Jewish leaders, many of whom sit on its governing bodies … [HUNTER, p. 188] … Of particular concern to Jews who have never felt that the pro-Israel network represented them, it’s actions only confirm the old shibboleth of the anti-Semites: that Jews control the media, that they conspire to control the government.” [HUNTER, p. 191] AIPAC was even criticized by some Israelis in the context of intra-Israeli politics: “[The] new government in Israel … include officials who have harshly criticized AIPAC for a pro-Likud [right-wing] tilt.” [BESSER, J., 5-21-99, p. 26]

In 1997, a group of former public officials took legal steps all the way to the Supreme Court to break AIPAC’s veil of secrecy and try “to force AIPAC to register as a political action committee and disclose its contributors.” AIPAC’s lawyers included Thomas Olsen, an assistant attorney general under Ronald Reagan, and former California Congressman Mel Levine. As the (Jewish) Forward noted, “Whatever the nine justices decide … AIPAC’s involvement on the edge of political funding is likely to attract continuing scrutiny.” [FORWARD, 10-3-97, p. 1]

In 1986, Israeli Ze’ev Chafets (an immigrant from America) followed Lori Posner, an AIPAC national organizer, to a series of Jewish activism meetings throughout the “boondocks” of America – the likes of Nebraska and Louisiana. “Money is no problem for us,” she told him, “… I’m not out here looking for rich Jews. I’m looking for activists.” “People who can make a difference [in the American political system],” adds Chafets, “become what are known as ‘key contacts.’ Ideally, they have a personal relationship with a member of Congress or a senator, or have political chits they can cash on behalf of Israel. Given the extraordinarily high degree of Jewish involvement in politics, it isn’t too hard to find key contacts – Lori estimates that AIPAC has them for about ninety percent of the members of the House of Representatives, and ninety-eight percent of the Senate.” [CHAFETS, MEMBERS, p. 42-43]

Democratic, Republican, or anything else, so long as they adhere to the single issue of support for Israel, AIPAC is interested in them. “AIPAC,” notes
Chafets, “is an aggressively nonpartisan group, and there is room for everyone.” [CHAFETS, p. 42-43] “Our [Zionist] movement,” declared Cleveland rabbi and Zionist leader Abba Silver in the 1940s, “is not wedded to any one political party. We have strong and warm friends in both.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 58] Or, as Jewish journalist Wolf Blitzer puts it, “those American Jewish political activists who are most successful in supporting AIPAC are those who are Zionists first, Democrats or Republicans second.” [BLITZER, p. 132]

From Israel, the Jerusalem Post ran an article in 2001 about the Jewish Americans who live there – both Democrats and Republicans – who are united on this fundamental pro-Israel issue:

“The local chapters of Democrats Abroad and Republicans Abroad have come together with the Yisrael Ba’aliya Israel Citizen’s Information Council, a project of the immigrant party’s ‘Anglo Department,’ in an effort to impact American policy toward Israel … Democrats Abroad and Republicans Abroad, organizations whose primary role is registering Americans in Israel to vote by absentee, act as vehicles for their members to express political views and try to influence American policy … Yisrael Ba’aliya director-general Eli Kazhdan said … many voters who have moved from America … care deeply about both Israel and America. ‘We don’t see it as interfering with American policy,’ Kazhdan said. ‘It’s not politicians who are doing this. It’s grassroots people who have dual citizenship.’” [HOFFMAN, G., 11-23-01]

In American, AIPAC’s aim is not to let either party, Democratic or Republican, be popularly perceived as a “Jewish” party. As the Jewish Telegraphic Agency noted in 1999:

“Incensed at President Clinton’s plans in March 1998 to pressure Israel with a public blueprint for peace with the Palestinians, Jewish Republicans turned to Capitol Hill. But as Republican senators lined up to voice their opposition to the White House, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee stepped in. The effort could not be partisan, the pro-Israel lobby argued, pushing the National Jewish Coalition aside. It took a two-week, bruising lobbying campaign by AIPAC before 81 senators [of the total 100] would sign a letter to Clinton pledging to oppose United States pressure on Israel.” [DORF, M., 5-12-99, p. 7]

Clinton’s catering to Jewish interests, its money, and its vote was usually a mainstay. During the 1992 presidential campaign, the Washington Post reported on its front page that “Clinton today charged that [Presidential rival George] Bush administration rhetoric has helped create an atmosphere in which ‘overt anti-Semitism is more acceptable.’” [EDSALL, p. A1] “In its new strident rhetoric, public and private, against Israel, against the Jewish community,” Clinton told the Jewish Community Relations Council, “the reference to how the Jewish community will vote in elections … that sort of thing, this [Bush] administration has ever so subtly … broken down the taboo against overt anti-Semitism. And that is very, very dangerous at any time.” [EDSALL, p. A1]
(All politicians must pander to the Jewish lobby. On another occasion Clinton told the Jewish Leadership Council, “If I ever let Israel down, God would never forgive me.” In 1992, Republican Vice President Dan Quayle told the American Israel Political Action Committee, “Fellow Zionists, Israel and the United States need each other. We benefit from each other and our alliance is unshakeable because it rests on two firm pillars – strategic interests and common values.” [HARTUNG, J., 1995])

“AIPAC has placed its supporters into the highest reaches of the Clinton White House,” later noted Village Voice reporter Robert Friedman, echoing the same observation in the Jewish Forward. [FRIEDMAN, p. 26] AIPAC is so entrenched there that in 1992 AIPAC’s legal counsel, David Ifshin, was also legal counsel for the Clinton Presidential campaign. Another overt activist at AIPAC, Richard Schifter, was a senior foreign policy adviser in the Clinton administration. [FRIEDMAN, p. 26] This is an old theme. Bernard Rapoport began membership in the Democratic National Finance Committee in 1976. He was also a member of AIPAC and the Jerusalem Committee. Philip Klutznik, the Secretary of State under President Carter, once even noted that Diaspora Jews were “a creative part of contemporary Zionism … fully legitimate and enduring.” [WALDEN, p. 216]

In the 1980s, prominent Jews in and around the White House who formed an informal AIPAC “advisory group” included John Lehman, eventual secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration; Elliot Abrams, eventual assistant secretary of state for human rights; Max Kampelman, the head U.S. arms control negotiator (for President Carter, Kampelman headed the U.S. delegation to the Committee for Security and Cooperation, and for President Reagan he headed the U.S. delegation for nuclear arms negotiations with the Soviet Union); [STARR, J., 1990, p. 143] Ben Wattenburg at the American Enterprise Institute; and legislative aides to senators, like Jay Berman and Ken Davis. [BLITZER, p. 123] In 1982, referring to the many national Jewish organizations that work together towards influencing American policy, Nathan Perlmutter, then head of the Anti-Defamation League, noted that, “in a sense our organizations have served as a sectarian government (albeit not elected by the popular Jewish vote) within a secular government, that of the popularly elected legislative and executive branches of the American government.” [PERLMUTTER, p. 69]
“The Jews have been through their traumas,” a [Jewish] Democratic politician explained, “Be we have always survived. We are a separate and destined people. I have no illusion that the U.S. is paradise. America is Babylon. We must ask the question, ‘Do we want death by assimilation? Do we want death by intermarriage? Or do we want to preserve our traditions?’” from Jonathan Reider, 1985, p. 47

With all these political factors about Jews – as well as the evidence from the rest of this volume – what hypotheses might we make about the recent configuration of the Clinton Democratic White House? Open discussion about Jewish influence in American politics is forbidden, says Israeli commentator Israel Shahak, “which in my view is due to their great political influence in general and their predominance in the media in particular. The Hebrew press [in Israel] does not have such inhibitions. This is due, among other reasons, also to the fact that the power of the state of Israel depends to a considerable extent on its ability to use the organized American Jews and their power for its own interests.” [SHAHAK, BAR-YOSEF, Jews Who]

As reported in the Israeli magazine (1994), Ma’ariv, by Avinoam Bar-Yosef, and translated from the Hebrew by Shahak, seven of eleven top members of President Clinton’s National Security Council – “Senior Directors and Advisors to the President” – were Jewish. (The NSC’s purpose is to “advise the President on domestic, foreign, and military policy related to national security;” members routinely include the President, Vice-President, Secretaries of State and Defense, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.) [ENCY BRIT, 1993, v.8, p. 550] The Jewish contingent (here included as translated from Bar-Yosef’s article, with misspellings) included:

- Sandy Berger – Deputy Chairman of the National Security Council
- Leon Perth – White House Chief of Staff
- Martin Indyk – Middle East and South Asia
- Dan Schifter – Western Europe
- Don Steinberg – Africa
- Richard Feinberg – Latin America
- Stanley Ross – Asia
Other Jewish members of the President’s Office were:

- Abner Mikva – Presidential Schedule and Programs Manager (new Attorney General). In his first position, Mikva succeeded another Clinton-appointed White House counsel, Bernard Nussbaum
- Ricky Seidman – Deputy Chief of Staff (Communications)
- Phil Leida – Economic Advisor
- Robert Rubin – Media Advisor (later Chairman of the National Economic Council)
- David Heiser – Staff Director
- Alice Rubin and Eli Segal – in charge of volunteers
- Ira Mezina – in charge of health program
- Rehm Emmanuel – Senior Advisor for coordinating White House Special Projects
- Stanley Greenberg is Clinton’s pollster. “Greenberg has been advising Clinton since his 1990 [Arkansas] gubernatorial campaign.” [WOODWARD, p. 25]

Even before Clinton was elected, the National Review noted in 1992 that “Michael H. Steinhardt says he is ‘singularly proud’ of the weighty role played by the upstart Progressive Policy Institute in supplying advice and advisers to Bill Clinton’s presidential campaign.” [NATIONAL REVIEW, 5-9-92]

Steinhardt is also Jewish, and a big financier of the Birthright Israel program, which seeks to pull young American Jews to deeper links to Israel. He was also a “target [in] a government bond manipulation scandal that’s sparked outrage in Congress.” [NATIONAL REVIEW, 5-9-92] The Progressive Policy Institute is a wing of the Democratic Leadership Council, headed by Al From (Jewish too), who is “also a top Clinton adviser.” Vice Chairman of the DLC is David Steiner, former president of AIPAC, who was forced to resign that position when he was secretly tape-recorded bragging about how he manipulated American government on behalf of Israel. “We have a dozen people in his [Clinton’s] headquarters,” the then-president of AIPAC had noted for the tape, “and they are all going to get big jobs.” [MOTHER JONES, 5-3-01] Progressive Policy Institute associate Robert Shapiro was also a staff economist for the Clinton campaign.

More importantly and prominently, by 1996 Jews held the following cabinet-level positions in the Clinton administration:

- Robert Reich – Secretary of Labor.
- Mickey Kantor – Secretary of Commerce. (Kantor has been a member of the national advisory council for AIPAC. In 1994, notes Fred Goodman, Kantor “threatened trade sanctions against China … Although the [Clinton] administration refused to make a trade issue of the Chinese government’s political and human rights abuses, it was ready to play hardball to stop the manufacture of unlicensed compact discs and videos. The commercial piracy, which the entertainment industry estimates cost it as much as $2 billion a year, was the kind of issue that was near and dear to the hearts of [David] Geffen and Time-Warner, who had given the Democratic National Committee a whopping $400,000 in 1992. [GOODMAN, p. 378] Also in 1994, notes Barry Rubin, the world trade agreement “was negotiated by Jews representing both the United States [Mickey Cantor] and Europe [Leon Britton]. [RUBIN, p. xii] France’s Foreign Minister, Dominique Strauss-Kahn is also Jewish (1994); Jean Bernard Levy is France’s Chief of Staff for the Ministry of Industry. In England, an economic counterpart is Peter Mandelson, who resigned in 1998 as that country’s Trade and Industry Secretary after it was discovered “he had failed to declare a large loan from Geoffrey Robinson, who resigned as Paymaster General the next day.” [OTTAWA CITIZEN, p. A7] By 1993, even Palestinian leader Yassar Arafat had a French Jew, Gabriel Banon, as his peoples’ chief economic advisor. Banon was once a “close advisor” to former French prime minister George Pompidou. Banon also claims to have done “favors” for U.S. presidents Gerald Ford, George Bush, and Ronald Reagan. [BERLEY, M., 6-22-96] (Stanley Cohen was even the lawyer in 1995 for “senior Hamas official” Moussa Mohammad Abu Marzook, who was jailed in New York City. “All the Israeli press”, Cohen said, “wants to know how a Jew can represent the head of Hamas. I ask them, ‘How can a Jew NOT represent the head of Hamas?'”) [WALKER, R., 9-11-95] A Jew, Robert Buitkin, can even be found as the state treasurer of Oklahoma. [SCHREINER, B., 8-16-2000] (Even in the 1880s, when a Jew, Simon Wolf, was the American ambassador to Egypt, a Jew, (Julius) Blum Pasha, was Egypt’s Finance Minister!) [PANITZ, D & E, 1957, p. 98]

— Robert Rubin – Secretary of the Treasury. (“Rubin,” noted the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “is known for his pro-Israel stance.” [BATOG, p. 2]

— Dan Glickman – Secretary of Agriculture. (At a second term Clinton inauguration party, Glickman asked “every organization, every Jewish organization to take another step forward and outreach to Jews.” [DORF, BEHIND, p. 1]

In 1996, FBI agent Gary Aldrich, for five years assigned to do background checks on White House personnel, noted that when Glickman was nominated to be the Secretary of Agriculture:

“The FBI had yet to begin its background investigation into Congressman Glickman, but already congressmen from both parties – including the new Republican majority stepped forward to praise him. Again, it seemed as though our investigation would be superfluous … When Glickman’s case wasn’t finished in the usual thirty days because of serious questions that needed answers, the White House pressured the FBI to complete the probe. One of us [FBI agents], not me, threatened to go to the Washington Post if the pressure from the White House didn’t stop … Meanwhile, the media began its own investigation and reported that there were some questions about bad checks Glickman had written on the House Bank and about dependents of Glickman using congressional credit cards. The media unearthed that Glickman, a millionaire whose wife worked for Congress as chairperson of the Arts Subcommittee, was alleged to have misused congressional funds for personal business. There was some talk of ‘traffic tickets.’ More shocking were reports that Glickman’s administrative assistant had committed suicide, but not before accusing him, in writing, of misuse of funds. She left instructions to submit these allegations to the House Ethics Committee in the event of her death. The House Ethics Committee, however, apparently took no action. Nevertheless, the Senate – the Republican Senate – stood by its former congressional colleague and confirmed Glickman the day before April Fool’s Day by a vote of ninety-four to zero. I felt the world had been turned upside down. I was disgusted and disheartened.” [ALDRICH, G., 1996, p. 162-164].

– Charlene Barshevsky – Special Trade Representative
– John Deutch – Director of the CIA. Appointed in 1995, “first,” noted the [Jewish] Forward, “he made a series of personnel changes, appointing David Cohen as deputy director of operations and giving the organization’s executive director, Nora Slatkin, broad, unprecedented authority over the deputy directors.” [FORWARD, p. 9-29-95, p. 7] Deutch’s grandfather, Jean Fischer, was a prominent Zionist and friend of the first Israeli president, Chaim Weizmann. Fischer headed the Zionist Federation in Belgium. A town in Israel, Kefar Yonah, is named in his honor. [STOLL, p. 7] Israel’s Jerusalem Post noted, in a 1996 article, the situation for Jews in the CIA: “Jews fill top positions in the U.S. intelligence community. In the CIA alone, intelligence sources say, Jews fill four of the CIA’s seven directorates and the agency is headed by John Deutch, a director described by one Israeli intelligence source as being ‘so traditional in his Jewish outlook that he practically wears a kippa [traditional Jewish skullcap].’” [RODAN, p. 20] (Also in the intelligence realm, a Jewish senator, Arlen Specter, was by the mid-1990s chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee). By the 1960s, Samuel Halpern was the “executive officer of Task Force W”– the CIA team set up to kill Cuba’s Fidel Castro; Sidney Gottlieb, “who could produce a lethal virus or poison on demand” was a “scientific advisor” to CIA assassination projects; and Arnold Silver was the CIA station chief in Luxembourg, also involved in plans for worldwide political murders. [HERSH, S., 1997, p. 191] Journalist Alexander Cockburn noted Gottlieb as the “US official poisoner” who “for many years, most notably in the 1950s and 1960s … presided over the CIA’s technical services division and supervised preparation of lethal poisons, experiments in mind control and administration of LSD and other psycho-active drugs to unwitting subjects.” [COCKBURN, A; GOTTLIEB] In the FBI, during the J. Edgar Hoover era, there were allegations that there were few Jews allowed in that department. Yet, “over the years [under Hoover] two Jews became Assistant Directors. Jewish employees were given days off to observe religious holidays, and Jews once made up most of the FBI basketball team.” [SUMMERS, A., 1993 p. 57] An earlier Jewish Clinton cabinet nomination, Zoe Baird, for Attorney General, was rejected by Congress when it was discovered that she had employed two illegal Peruvian immigrants in her home.
Other major Clinton administrative appointees include

- William Cohen – Secretary of Defense. (Cohen’s father was Jewish, his mother not; he has not publicly foregrounded a distinctly Jewish identity. “Nevertheless, “noted the [Jewish] Forward, “[Cohen] received a Jewish education and would perhaps have stayed ‘in the fold’ if a rabbi had not rejected him in his early years. Nevertheless, [Cohen] remains a great friend of Israel, where he had traveled on frequent visits. He has many personal friends there, and we are assure, it is possible to chat with him in simple Hebrew. His defense of Israel on various occasions is well known.” [FORWARD, 2-21-97, p. 7]

(An earlier Clinton selection for Secretary of Defense, Robert Inman, was dismissed in Congressional hearings thanks to Jewish influence in the mass media and the Zionist lobby. Michael Saba notes that Jewish journalist William Safire was especially critical of Inman’s “anti-Israel bias,” Inman’s support of the “excessive sentencing of Jonathan Pollard” [the Jewish American spy for Israel] and his reluctance to provide Israel with U.S. spy satellite photographs. [SABA, M., 1994] Another Jewish journalist, Susan Garment, of the Washington Post, wrote that “Inman named five journalists who treated him badly. Safire, Tony Lewis, Ellen Goodman, the cartoonist Herblock, and Rita Braven. All five are Jewish … This did nothing to dispel public impressions of Inman’s anti-Israel bias.” [SABA, M., 1994])

- Madeline Albright – Secretary of State. (Albright’s story is intriguing. She reputedly had no knowledge of her “lost” Jewish heritage until informed about it by the Washington Post while in office in 1997. The state of Israel is alleged to have known about her Jewish ancestry two years before she did). [JEWISH TELAG, p.2] Albright has suddenly, literally, become the “daughter of Holocaust victims … On a deep, even untapped, psychological level,” says the Jewish Week, “Albright may have strong feelings about Israel.” [SCHOFFMAN, p. 23] “When I say I had known that Albright was Jewish,” wrote Barbara Amiel, wife of media mogul Conrad Black, “I mean that one look at her features told me so. Of course, I put it in the back of my mind because I attributed absolutely no significance to it … (Well, perhaps I dissemble. Being Jewish myself, I had a feeling of kinship and admired her achievement a notch more … Albright happens to be the kind of person whose attractive features correspond to that tribal affinity in an almost unmistakable manner.” [AMIEL, p. 26] The Clinton administration has been involved in more military adventures than any other presidency since the Vietnam War, including the bombings of Iraq, Afghanistan, and Serbia. “The Kosovo conflict,” notes Newsweek, “is often referred to by her friends and foes as Madeline’s War … More than anyone else she embodies the foreign policy vision that pushed [other Clinton officials] into this war.” [ISAACSON, W., p. 25] (In 1999, a wealthy Austrian family threatened to sue Albright for the return of fine art masterpieces allegedly stolen from them from Czechoslovakia by her father). [CAMPBELL, M.]

- Alan Greenspan – a holdover from before Clinton took office (appointed during the Reagan administration), is the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. His political career began as an economic advisor to Republican president Richard Nixon in 1968. The (New York) Financial Times noted that Greenspan “has been one of the most powerful men in the world for well over a decade. A single word of expression can be enough to unsettle stock markets around the globe or to send shares soaring.” [FIN TIM, p. 14] Chairman of the powerful Securities Exchange Council (SEC)? Also Jewish: Arthur Levitt. Head of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC)? Also Jewish: Robert Pitofsky, appointed by Clinton in 1994.

In late 1998 the Jewish Week noted that Jewish billionaire George Soros is “often accused of masterminding some world conspiracy … if the [economic] global crisis keeps spreading – as most experts expect – you won’t hear much more talk about blaming Soros and his Jewish cronies. Anger will probably focus increasingly on the leaders of the [International Monetary Fund] and the Washington policy makers who stand behind it. The bad news is that most of them are Jewish too. Israel’s daily Yediot Archronot recently published an unintentionally chilling list of senior economic policymakers known to be attending Kol Nidre services in Washington on the eve of the IMF summit. Among them: Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and his top deputy Lawrence Summers [who has since succeeded Rubin as Treasury Secretary], World Bank Chairman James Wolfenson and his top deputy, Josef Stieglitz; Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, and IMF Director Stanley Fischer. That’s scary. And it’s only a partial list.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, The Sixth, p. 12]

In the White House, all the powerful people in the Clinton administration pale in importance to who the (Jewish) Forward calls “the biggest Jew in the Clinton world right now.” That is Steve Grossman, who was named in 1997 as the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. And what job did he leave to take this position? The chairmanship of AIPAC. “The highlight of Sunday’s lunch for leaders of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee,” reported the Jewish Exponent, “– in addition to kosher food trucked in from Baltimore – was the arrival of Steve Grossman, until last week the chair of the pro-Israel lobby group and now the national chair of the Democratic National Committee.” [BESSER, SCENES, p. 61] President Clinton, declared Grossman, is “committed to Jewish values, principles, and the Jewish agenda more than any other president that I can remember.” [GELBWASSER, p. 13] Sara Ehrman, an old friend of Hillary Clinton is also a Democratic National Committee senior political advisor; she also served as “a former lobbyist for AIPAC.” [LIFTON, p. 52] During Ms. Clinton’s successful run for the New York senate seat, the (Jewish) Forward also noted in 2000 that “in the latest setback to Hillary Rodham Clinton’s effort to reach out to the Jewish voters, a Democratic Party leader and key Jewish adviser to her campaign was arrested this week on corruption charges. Paul Adler, the Democratic leader of Rockland County and a relator with past legal troubles, was charged Monday with public corruption, fraud, extortion and other charges linked to his real estate transactions.” [FORWARD, 9-15-00, p. 15]
Stunningly, as Grossman rose to head the DNC, in the same year Fran Katz, the AIPAC Deputy Political Affairs Director, became the Financial Director of the Democratic Party. This situation, notes Mitchell Kaidy, “contributed to the impression that the foreign lobby and the incumbent party have become one and the same.” [KAIN, M., 9-97, p. 42] Likewise, as AIPAC seeped deeper into the American political structure, in 1999 the (Jewish) Forward announced that a Jewish “Democratic consultant, Mark Mellman, is hiring AIPAC’s political director, Michael Bloomfield.” [GITELL, S., 5-28-99, p. 19] Conversely, prominent Jewish Democrats may seep into AIPAC – in 1999 Robert Bassin, Chief of Staff for Democratic House of Representatives member John Lewis (Georgia) was reported to be considered for one of the chief AIPAC positions. [GITELL, S., 5-28-99] (There are, of course, Jews in positions of power at the side of non-Jewish Congressman throughout America. Josh Shapiro, for example, is Chief of Staff for Pennsylvania’s Congressman Jan Hoeffel). [SALISBURY, G., 3-30-99, p. 65]

The DNC Finance Chairman before Katz was also Jewish, Alan Solomont, also a “friend” of Steve Grossman. [GELBWASSER, M., 12-6-97, p. 3] In 1997 Solomont, “a nursing home tycoon” and former president of the Massachusetts Federation of Nursing Homes, was subpoenaed by the Senate Committee on Government Affairs about his role as “a major contributor [who] successfully lobbied Clinton administration officials to modify regulations for his industry.” [GOLDSCHLAG, 2-3-97; WEISSENSTEIN, E., 8-18-97] In turn, Solomont “took over the DNC’s troubled funding operation from Marvin Rosen, a Miami lawyer who has been blamed for loosening the controls on fundraising and for using his political contacts to bolster his law firm … [The DNC had accepted millions of dollars] from foreigners whose donations are illegal under U.S. law.” [BRODER, J., 4-3-99] (Amy Weiss Tobe also became the Democratic National Press Secretary in 1996; the next year she was the DNC Communications Director). [The National Finance Chair for the Democratic Party in 1990 was Monte Freidkin, later the Chairman of the National Jewish Democratic Council].

In 1999, Beth Dozoretz, yet another Jew, took the reins as “chief fundraiser for the Democratic Party” in her new position as the Financial Chair of the Democratic National Convention. [BRODER, p. 22] (Dozoretz later lobbied Clinton to pardon wealthy Jewish financier, Israeli philanthropist, and fugitive criminal Marc Rich. “Another key player in the effort [to get the pardon],” adds Newsweek, “was [Rich’s ex-wife] Denise Rich’s friend and fellow Democratic fundraiser Beth Dozoretz, who apparently appealed directly to Clinton”). [ENDA/KUHNHENN, 2-15-01, p. A1; ISIKOFF, M., 2-19-01] On the Republican side, Mel Sembler has been for years the Finance Chairman for the Republican National Committee; he is also chairman of Florida real estate company and an active member in the National Jewish Coalition. (He was formerly the U.S. ambassador to Australia. President George Bush Sr. had “named Sembler ambassador to Australia, which got him included in a series of Doonesbury comic strips poking fun at the link between money and patronage.”). [TROXLER, H., 1-22-97]
In 1992, President Clinton named Fred Goldberg to a position in the Treasury Department. He had for the past three years been the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Goldberg was earlier a partner at the law firm of Skadden, Arps, Meagher and Fromm. Another partner at the firm at the time was Kenneth Bialkin, for years the chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, national chairman of the Anti-Defamation League, and, later, chairman of the American-Israel Friendship Committee. (In January 2000, President Clinton even named an Orthodox rabbi, Irving Greenbaum, as the new chairman of the nearby Holocaust Museum in Washington DC). Head of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) through most of the 1990s and into the next millennium? Doris Meissner, “a child of German immigrants.” (Elinor Caplan, head of the Immigration office up North, is Meissner’s mirror in Canada). In 2000, “a three-judge panel ruled … that [Mazer] Al-Najjer, 43, should be freed [from prison], but Immigration and Naturalization Service Commissioner Doris Meissner appealed to [Attorney General Janet] Reno” to keep him imprisoned. Al-Najjer, an Arab, was accused of have links to terrorist acts against Israel and had been “jailed for more than three and a half years on the basis of secret evidence that immigration authorities refused to show him or his lawyers.” [TAYLOR, M., 9-7-00, p. B1:7; LARDNER, JR., G., 12-16-00, p. 2] Reno released him.

In 1993-94 the two individuals President Clinton appointed to the United States Supreme Court, Ruth Bader Ginsberg and Steven Breyer, were also both Jewish. And multi-millionaires. [CANTOR, p. 401] (A 1987 Jewish justice appointee to the Supreme Court, Douglas Ginsberg, was discovered to have smoked marijuana while a Harvard law professor and was passed over for the government post). Of the nine current American Supreme court justices, notes the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “President Clinton’s two Jewish appointees to the Supreme Court are by far the richest.” Depending upon how one plays with papers, Ruth Ginsberg and her husband are worth between $5.9 to $24.1 million; the Breyer’s assets are valued at between $3.3 to $15.9 million. [KURTZMAN, 5-27-98]

The profoundly disproportionate presence (even dominance) of Jews in important governmental positions, as well as their economic influence in the political field (and its disturbing implications), goes entirely unremarked upon by the mass media. As Seymour Lipset and Earl Raab note:

“Neither Ruth Bader Ginsburg, nor Stephen Breyer’s appointment to the Supreme Court called any public comment about them being Jews … [Likewise] during and after the 1992 campaigns in which Californians elected Jews to both United States senatorial vacancies, not a voice was raised publicly to mark the fact. The Republican nominee for one of these seats was also Jewish.” [LIPSET, RAAB]

“One measure of progress that’s been made,” agreed Hyman Bookbinder, a former official of the American Jewish Committee, “is that when Clinton appointed Stephen Breyer to be the second Jew on the Supreme Court, you heard practically nothing about his being Jewish.” [MATUSOW, B., MAY 2000, p. 79]
(This situation is of course quite different from the past. When receiving an award from the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, notes the Washington Post, Justice Ginsburg “noted the fear of anti-Jewish bias that Supreme Court lawyers felt some 50 years ago. The names of four Justice Department lawyers, all Jewish, are missing from a legal brief they wrote in 1948, Ginsburg said at the Feb. 18 award ceremony. The decision was made by Arnold Raum, No. 2 in the office that handles Supreme Court appeals, and himself a Jew, Ginsburg said. ‘It wouldn’t do, he thought, to make it so evident that the position of the United States was ‘put out by a bunch of Jews,’ Ginsburg said, quoting a later account.”) [GEARSON, A., 2-28-02]

In 1999 Supreme Court Justice Breyer gave an address to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations entitled “Zion’s Justice.” He said that “the Zionist ideal is, of course, exactly that – an ideal. It is an objective toward which imperfect reality must struggle. But, whatever the imperfection of reality, this ideal retains its hold upon our imagination and that of the world.” [BREYER, p. 19] His speech, and later article, rhapsodized about former Jewish Supreme Court Justices Louis Brandeis (whose term began in 1916) and Felix Frankfurter (who began in 1939), both avidly activist Zionists, and their emulative roles in serving the Zionist cause in high level American government. But how things have changed. “It is important to remember,” says Breyer,

“that Brandeis was a leader when Zionism was controversial among Jews. Indeed, after Brandeis was confirmed as a member of the Supreme Court in 1916, the New York Times, with support from some Jewish groups, argued that Brandeis should resign from his public position in Zionist organizations. And he did so. This opposition reflected something deeper than simple concern for judicial propriety. It reflected a widely held view that American Jews need not – and perhaps out not – support the Zionist cause because doing so might prove inconsistent with their obligations toward their own country or intervene with their participation in American civic life … [p. 18] … Felix Frankfurter was Brandeis’ pupil, in respect to Zionism and everything else … Brandeis needed an assistant to carry on his Zionist activities, particularly after he was appointed to the Court. He chose Frankfurter. Even when Brandeis was on the Court – in one act now considered highly controversial – Brandeis would deposit between $250 and $3,000 in Frankfurter’s expense account as he traveled throughout the country advocating causes which included Zionism … In 1919 … Brandeis told Frankfurter to prepare for a practical task, writing legal bequest forms ‘adequate in several states,’ to organize an effort ‘to get in touch with all Jewish lawyers in America’ and try to have many Jewish clients remember Zion in their wills. That same year, he had Frankfurter travel to the Paris Peace Conference as a leading representative of American Zionists.” [BREYER, p. 18-19]

Brandeis’ wife, Alice, was even a financial supporter of the Zionist underground terrorist IRGUN organization. She held a membership card in the American League for a Free Palestine, a supportive offshoot of IRGUN. Justice Brandeis himself “met more than once with visiting delegations from the Revisionist Zionist movement to discuss illegal immigration and related issues. At one 1939 session with IRGUN emissary Robert Briscoe, Brandeis reportedly remarked, “If I were a young man like you, I would be with you.” [MEDOFF, 1996] (“Revisionists were heavily fascist and profoundly influenced by Mussolini,” notes Jewish author Edwin Black. [BLACK, E., p. 143])

In 1983 a scholarly work by Bruce Allen Murphy about Jewish Supreme Court justices Brandeis and Frankfurter was published. It was entitled The Brandeis/Frankfurter Connection. The Secret Political Activities of Two Supreme Court Justices. Supreme Court justices, appointed for life terms, are expected to maintain an apolitical, non-partisan bearing as decision-makers of American law. Murphy’s volume studies the two Supreme Court justices’ secret extrajudicial political activities, largely, but not only, of a Zionist/Jewish nature. As Murphy notes, after his exhaustive study of existent document archives:

“Felix Frankfurter learned the art of being an extrajudicially active member of the Supreme Court at the knee of Justice Brandeis. It now appears that in one of the most unique relationships in the Court’s history, Brandeis enlisted Frankfurter, then a professor at Harvard Law School, as his paid political lobbyist and lieutenant. Working together over a period of twenty-five years, they placed a network of disciples in positions of influence, and labored diligently for the enactment of their desired programs. This adroit use of the politically skillful Frankfurter as an intermediary enabled Brandeis to keep his considerable political endeavors hidden from the public. Not surprisingly, after his own appointment to the Court, Frankfurter resorted to some of the same methods to advance governmental goals consonant with his own political philosophy. As a result, history virtually repeated itself, with the student placing his own network of disciples in various agencies and working through this network for the realization of his own goals … So extensive was the extrajudicial behavior of both Brandeis and Frankfurter that one is left puzzled as to how it could have remained secret for so long.” [MURPHY, B., 1983, p. 10, 11]

Under President Lyndon Johnson, Jewish Associate Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg, says early AIPAC chief I. L. Kenen, “accepted my invitation to make a speech to the national AIPAC policy conference and he associated himself with the historic pro-Zionist declaration made by Justice Louis D. Brandeis just fifty years before. Goldberg came under attack because of that speech. [He listened] to a long harangue by Saudi Arabia’s Baroody on Zionism and the influence of American Jews on American political leaders.” [KENEN, I., 1981, p. 228-229]

In 1998, both current Jewish Supreme Court Justices, Breyer and Ginsburg, joined in a 6–3 ruling (a 5-4 loss if non-Jewish Justices in their stead had different views) in favor of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, one that would make “it unlikely the pro-Israel lobby will have to disclose information about its membership or expenditures. Six former politicians and diplomats, all staunch critics of U. S. Policy toward Israel, have been seeking increased government regulation of AIPAC … the plaintiffs have been urging the Federal Election Commission to regulate AIPAC as a political committee … AIPAC … defines itself as membership organization and registered lobby on behalf of legislation affecting U.S.-Israel relations … Justice Stephen Breyer wrote the majority opinion for the court.” [KURTZMAN, D., 6-5-01]

In Bill Clinton’s second Presidential term, other Jews in prominent positions of power included:

– Gene Sperling – Chairman of the National Economic Council
– Evelyn Lieberman – Director of Voice of America
– Janie Gorelick – Assistant Attorney General
– Stuart Eizenstat – Under secretary of State for Economics
– Aaron Miller – Deputy Middle East Coordinator
– Daniel Kurtzer – Ambassador to Egypt
– Marc Grossman – Assistant Secretary for European and Canadian Affairs
– Princeton Lyman – Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations
– Stanley Roth – Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs – Jeffrey Davidow – Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs
– James Rubin – Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs
– Jack Lew – (an Orthodox Jew); Director of the Office of Management and Budget [GROSS, N., p. 30]

This list is just a sampling. “There are uncounted dozens of Jewish White House staffers,” noted the Jewish Exponent in 1997. [BESSER, Celebrating, p. 1] There are so many that Ira Forman, director of the National Jewish Democratic organization, “tells of one Jewish staffer friend who balked at handling the White House Christmas decorations but was told he had to do it ‘because, heck, everyone else here is Jewish too.’” [GROSS, N., p. 30] “We’ve stopped counting the number of Jews in key places in the Clinton administration,” noted Hyman Bookbinder, the former Washington representative of the American Jewish Committee, “there are so many of them.” [MATUSOW, B., MAY 2000, p. 79]

Richard H. Curtiss, a former State Department officer, noted the situation in 1998:

“A large percentage of other top-echelon State Department political appointees and ambassadors are Jewish. A U.S. ambassador who happened to be visiting Washington in October remarked to the writer that during Rosh Hoshana, the Jewish New Year, many State Department offices took on the forlorn, nearly deserted visage that used to characterize the brief interval between Christmas and New Year’s day. The same was true in the White House, where the top two foreign affairs officials, National Security Adviser Samuel Berger and his deputy, John Steinberg, are Jewish, as is Vice President Al Gore’s national security adviser, Leon Furth. So are a lot of other White House policymakers ... Nor is there anything particularly incongruous about the high percentage of top Jewish officials in the Clinton White House and foreign affairs establishment. Ins one other government departments, the situation differs only in the details. Ironically, Secretary Donna Shalala of the Department of Health and Human Services is the only Arab American in the cabinet. But according to HHS insiders, most of her second echelon officials, all White House appointees, are Jewish. So are a remarkably high percentage of top officials in the National Institutes of Health, which supervise hundreds of research grants at home and abroad. At the Department of Commerce the situation is similar, even after the resignation of Secretary of Commerce Mickey Kantor, a long-time pro-Israel activist and Clinton’s 1992 election campaign manager. At the Pentagon and CIA, at political appointee levels (in contrast to career military and CIA officers), things are not that different ... The record of a staff meeting at Secretary Robert Rubin’s Treasury Department early in the second Clinton administration shows that when top echelon leaders were discussing the best times to make announcements the Treasury does not want the American public to notice, one official said, ‘The time to do it is Christmas or Easter, since those are the two biggest holidays.’ The ‘they’ the official was speaking about in the apparently all-Jewish meeting were the 90 to 95 percent of US taxpayers who are of Christian heritage but who, in the Clinton administration, are so dramatically under-represented in top foreign policymaking positions.” [CURTIS, R.H., 2-28-98, p. 28]

“There is also a sizeable contingent of Jewish women,” noted the Jerusalem Report in 1998, “many of whom started out with a Hillary [Clinton] connection, in the most senior echelons of the White House, including Communications Director Ann Lewis, White House Director of Public Policy Maria Echaveste [who married a Jewish lawyer and converted to Judaism], and Lynn Cutler, deputy director of White House inter-governmental affairs.” [GROSS, N., p. 30] Hilary’s own personal staff, notes Netty Gross, “is also heavily Jewish.” [GROSS, N., p. 32] (White House FBI agent Gary Aldrich notes on one occasion what it was like decorating Hillary Clinton’s White House Christmas tree, with ornaments from various artists, featuring “sex toys” and self-mutilation devices”: “I couldn’t believe the disrespect that these ornaments represented. Many of the artists invited to make and send something to hang on the tree must have had nothing but disgust, hatred, and disrespect for the White House and the citizens of this country, a disgust obviously encouraged by the first lady in the name of artistic freedom ... Here was another five golden rings ornament – five gold-wrapped condoms. I threw it in the trash. There were other condom ornaments, some still in the wrapper, some not.”) [ALDRICH, G., 1996, p. 105-106]

In July 26, 2000, during Hillary Clinton’s campaign for Congress from New York, Jewish senator Charles Schumer (“a recognized leader in Jewish issues on Capitol Hill”) was recorded on videotape at a fund raiser for the President’s wife. He responded to questions by Jews present about Israel, saying, “My guess is [Ms. Clinton] will vote exactly as I vote on Jewish issues. She will look to me to see how to vote … Is she going to be a leading voice in the Senate? No. Is she going to have the same feeling about it that I do – born Jewish? No. But she will be good. “Schumer,” noted the Associated Press, “in shirt sleeves, chatted casually with supporters on the tape, seemingly unaware that a camera was rolling.” [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 7-27-2000]

Jews, observed Stuart Eizenstat, eventually the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, “have become much more vocal, not just as an outside interests group, but by integrating into the system.” [BESSER, Escape, p. 38] (Joe Rubin, by the way, is the “chief lobbyist for the US Chamber of Commerce”). [NELSON, S., 11-20-01] Eizenstat, noted the Baltimore Jewish Times,

“said that the Jewish community has reached a kind of critical mass in politics that guarantees that many of the gains of the Clinton years will remain, no matter who occupies the White House. ‘I think the change will last,’ said Eizenstat, ‘people in the middle levels [of national government] will move up in the years ahead; younger people who are being trained at junior levels will, in future administrations, take more senior positions.’” [BESSER, J. p. 38]

(Eizenstat is also notable for his public defense of Rabbi Irving Greenberg – the head of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum – after Greenberg faced condemnation for writing a letter to President Clinton seeking clemency for Jewish American fugitive Marc Rich. Eizenstat praised Greenberg for “embracing … Jewishness from its assimilationist drift.” After hearing Rabbi Greenberg lecture at a Jewish retreat in 1974, “the Holocaust,” writes Eizenstat, something most of us had barely thought about, became central to our lives, our understanding of Judaism and of Jewish ethics.”) [EIZENSTAT, S., 4-3-01]

With so many Jews in the upper echelons of American government, notes the Jerusalem Post, “Arabs have repeatedly complained that the United States has not acted as an honest broker” in Middle East peace negotiations. [GROSS, N., p. 32] Specifically, Israeli commentator Meron Benevenisti described an Israeli newspaper’s depiction of the 4-member Clinton “peace mission” to barter arrangements between Israel and Palestinians in the 1990s as “the mission of four Jews” – the paper “gloated with pride while talking about the Jewish and even Israeli roots of all its members.” “The ‘Israeli roots’ of those US diplomats,” adds Israel Shahak, “comprising what went under the name of a ‘peace mission’ included the fact that a son of one of them was said to be studying in a Hesder Yeshiva, to receive military training there. He was also said to be a sympathizer of Gush Emunim and was awaiting the opportunity to serve in the Israeli army in the Territories.” [SHAHAK, I.]

In the international field, Jewish “current or immediate past” [1997] ambassadors to other countries included those to Egypt, Israel, Poland, Switzerland, Brazil (Melvin Levitsky), Nepal (Ralph Frank), Romania, Spain, Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, France, Morocco (Marc Ginsberg), Venezuela (Jeffrey Davidow), Turkey (Marc Grossman), Bahamas (Arthur Schechter: 1998-2001) and Malaysia, among others. Matthew Dorf notes that “Indeed, an article in the October [1997] issue of the professional journal of the American Foreign Service Association, Foreign Service – headlined ‘Where’ve All the Arabists Gone?’ – laments the changes taking place. ‘If any other group had taken over, there would have been a big storm, but with the Jewish-American takeover, nobody has the courage to speak,’ William Rugh, a former ambassador to Yemen, was quoted as saying.” [DORF, Focus, p. 3]

In 1972, Evan M. Wilson, the United States Minister-Consul General in Jerusalem till 1967, reflected a view about American foreign policy in that area that has long since been erased by Zionist expansion in the U.S. government:

“In retrospect, it seems clear that our support of the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine, against the wishes of the [Arab] population of that country, was a mistake. It had a catastrophic effect upon our relations the Arab world and our important interests in the Middle East. It has caused us to be associated in the minds of the Arabs with Israel, which they regard as an alien, hostile element in their midst and which they identify with the forces of imperialism and colonialism against which they have been struggling since the First World War.” [WILSON, E., 1972, p. 72-73]

In 1997, when David Hermelin was named to be the U.S. ambassador to Norway, a friend, Jay Alix, was quoted as saying:

“He’s probably one of the world’s great philanthropist leaders. He’s raised more money for Jewish causes than anyone else.” [FRENCH, p. B1]

Hermelin died in office in 2000. He was noted in the New York Times as having been “a devoted supporter of Israel and the Jewish people,” serving as Chairman of Israel’s 50th Anniversary Committee, Vice Chairman of the United Jewish Appeal, and International Chairman of the State of Israel Bonds.” [NEW YORK TIMES, 11-23-00, sec. 11, p. 11]

Also in 1998, Steven Green, the former head of the Samsonite luggage company, and others, packed his bags for his post as Ambassador to Singapore. In the same year the Jewish Forward noted that Richard Holbrooke, the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, “surprised the audience [at the Center for Jewish History’s Inaugural Dinner] with the revelation that, like his wife, Kati Marton, he too is Jewish.” [LEON, 9-25-99, p. 15] (Daniel L. Spiegel was Ambassador to U.N. from 1994-96).

Martin Indyk, formerly on Clinton’s National Security Council, is the first Jewish United States Ambassador to Israel in history. All other Presidents recognized the obvious dangers and avoided the intrinsic pro-Israel bias problem in such an appointment. (Canada’s 2000 ambassador to Israel? Also Jewish: David Berger). Indyk’s story is especially disturbing. In 1973 Indyk was a student in Israel. In 1982 he began work for Near East Research, Inc., the research unit of AIPAC. He later founded the pro-Israel Washington Institute for Near East Policy: “many of the Institute’s financial backers were Jews who were members of the American Public Affairs Committee.” [FORWARD, 9-5-97] Co-founder of the Washington Institute was Barbi Weinberg, “wife of AIPAC Chairman Emeritus Lawrence Weinberg.” [HALSELL, G., MARCH 1993, p. 9] (Such think tanks, notes former U.S. Ambassador to Saudi Arabia Jame E. Akins, “basically provide spokesmen for Israel. And if they would identify themselves as that, fine. What’s pernicious is passing themselves off as an independent think tank. They are not, just as any Arab group would not be.”) [HALSELL, G., MARCH 1993, p. 9] Indyk was even once “an international media and communications adviser to former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir in Israel.” [HALSELL, G., MARCH 1993, p. 9] Indyk, born in Australia, about to become intimately involved with American national security secrets, became an American citizen only days before starting his job on Clinton’s National Security Council! [FORWARD, 9-5-97, p. 1] Facing Congress for confirmation of his (ultimately successful) appointment to the NSC, the (Jewish) Forward noted in 1994 that “[Indyk] is expected to face a grilling from Senate Republicans over his decision to become an American citizen only last year, just days before he was tapped for the NSC slot. GOP members will also quiz the London-born, Australian-reared Mr. Indyk about a top position he held in an Australian intelligence service for a former prime minister.” [FEIDEN, p. 1]

Eventually working as the American ambassador to Israel, two Jewish authors understand that as always his final goal, noting that “with the recognition that Indyk has made ‘aliyah’ [immigrated] to America specifically so he could work in Israel, one sees the formation of a new American Jewish myth.” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 41] This Jewish-centeredness to Israel “myth” has a jarringly transworld flavor. Although Connecticut-born Dore Gold decided to move to Israel, he became that country’s Ambassador to the United Nations, and acted in that country’s interests in his office near the U.N. building in New York City. Intending no sarcasm, Jesse Sage and Franklin Zaromb also note that “One might ask who is more American: [Israeli prime minister Benjamin] Netanyahu, who spent his entire adolescence in America as well as several years after the [Israeli] army, or Indyk, the newly approved U.S. citizen?” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 44] Or as one former U.S. Ambassador to the Middle East remarked, “Culturally, when you run into somebody like Benjamin Netanyahu or Moshe Arens [the Israeli Foreign Minister, from America] or guys who speak American-accented English and know your cultural background as well as or better than you do, it is very hard to remind yourself that you are dealing with a foreign country.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 96] “So many Israelis have studied in the United States that attending an American university,” says Joyce Starr, “at least at the master’s and doctoral levels, has become almost a rite of passage for Israel’s elite.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 101]

As American-born Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Arens notes,

“We’ve had a Prime Minister from the United States, Mrs. [Golda] Meir, and a Deputy Foreign Minister, Yehuda Ben-Meir. There are many Americans in Israel in key positions.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 232]

In 1998 the Iraqi foreign minister accused Martin Indyk of being “a known Jew and Zionist.” The U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations responded by calling “it ‘deplorable’ to drag in Indyk’s ethnic background,” and demanded that the Iraqi “apologize for this dramatically offensive slur.” Iraq, of course, is easily dismissed these days, and its foreign ministry is given credence by virtually no one. The very next day, however, the U.S. State Department “sat down to discuss the latest foreign tirade against Jewish influence in Washington.” This second, especially uncomfortable attack, was far more difficult to categorically dismiss as an ethnic slur or an expression of irrational anti-Semitism. The new attack came from Nathan Sharansky, a minister in the Israeli government, who complained, noted the Jewish Week, that “Israel was suffering because there were too many liberal Jews in the Clinton administration.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, Too Many Jews?, 7-17-98, p. 4] (The Jewish Week article did not try to dismiss the Jewish influence angle of the complaint, but rather than they were not necessarily “liberal.”)

The blurring of the American government into a Zionist/Israeli one is also poignantly illustrated by New Jersey governor McGreevey’s selection in 2002 of an Israeli citizen, Golan Cipel, to be his “special counsel to the governor on homeland security” for $110,000 a year. Cipel, noted a New Jersey newspaper, had “limited experience in U.S. Domestic security as [the governor’s] closest adviser on terrorism ... He was appointed to the newly created position without an official announcement or the extensive background checks that are routine for most top state officials ... Cipel is a former Israeli sailor” and was once “spokesman for the Israeli Consulate in Manhattan” which was “one of the Israeli government’s top spokesmen in the United States.” [PILLETS/RILEY, 2-2002]

In 1997 Jewish American journalist J. J. Goldberg lectured the Labor Zionist Alliance of Canada. The Canadian Jewish News reported on the talk, noting that Goldberg proclaimed that Jews were the “players” in the modern world, not “victims:”

“[Goldberg] went on to give many examples of American Jewry’s influential role in American politics. He noted that in addition to the Secretary of State Madeline Albright, who was born Jewish, the key Americans shaping Middle East policy are all Jews … A new kosher kitchen was recently installed at the American embassy in Cairo because Dan Kurtzer, the American ambassador to Egypt, is an Orthodox Jew. ‘We Jews run American Middle East policy,’ however most Americans are not concerned that Jews hold such key positions of power, he said. U.S. politicians consult with leadership of the Jewish community on foreign policy matters as well evidenced by the recent state visit of Israeli president Ezer Weizman earlier this month, Goldberg said. Jewish community leaders and chiefs of Middle East policy were all invited to the White House for lunch with the United States and Israeli president, he said. The only non-Jews in the room were Bill and Hilary Clinton … [Goldberg] said by comparison; Canadian Jewry has less political clout – ‘Jews don’t run Ottawa [the center of Canadian government]’ – than American Jews who are able to exert pressure on Congress.” [SILVERSTEIN, B., 10-30-97, p. 5]

Another Jewish journalist, Jonathan Broder, noted the situation for Jews looking for top level positions in the State Department in 1997:
“All [Secretary of State Madeleine Albright’s] top candidates for a slew of senior positions in the State Department are Jewish and male … Albright has already promoted two Jewish appointees to senior positions [Dennis Ross and Stuart Eizenstadt] … Jews lead the list for the six regional assistant secretary posts. According to well informed sources, they are: Mark Grossman, currently U.S. ambassador to Turkey …, Princeton Lyman, currently the assistant secretary of state for international organizations, and former Rep. Howard Wolpe of Michigan …; Stanley Roth, an aide to former Rep. Steven Solarz of New York and a former staffer on the National Security Council; Karl Indefurth, a former ABC News correspondent who served as Albright’s deputy at the United Nations …; Jeff Davidow, assistant secretary of state for Latin American affairs …; Martin Indyk, currently U.S. ambassador to Israel.” [BRODER, J., 2-13-97]

Albright’s “top candidate” for assistant Interior secretary for policy and management? Bonnie Caplan. [BRODER, J., 2-13-97]

Worried about publicity about the presence of so many Jews in the upper echelons of the American government, one “senior official” in the State Department refused to be interviewed for an article about the subject by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, saying, “No good can come from this. Especially because there are so many of us.” [DORE, FOCUS, p. 3] “Although many current Jewish State Department officials dismiss discussion about the Jewish character of the State Department as fodder for anti-Semites and anti-Israel activities,” says JTA reporter Matthew Dorf, “some have privately acknowledged that one’s upbringing can influence policy decisions.” [DORF, p. 3] “Stigmatization by overt anti-Semites,” observes the Jewish magazine Mosaic, “magnifies the extent to which discussions surrounding the American Jewish diplomats can easily descend into nose-counting and age-old racial slurs. Conversely, it is extremely difficult for the American Jewish community to discuss such matters in a comfortable, open, and critical manner … Mindful of this concern, one would hardly want to spur public awareness and inadvertently damage Jewish interests.” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 36] The effect of this upon those who seek to work in the State Department who do not have a pro-Israel slant? David Whalen notes that “concerned legislators and interest groups delayed Strobe Talbott’s appointment as Deputy Secretary of State because of some seemingly anti-Israel opinions he expressed fifteen years ago in Time magazine.” [WHALEN, p. 75]

(How times have changed. World Zionist Organization president Nahum Goldmann wrote that, during the Franklin D. Roosevelt presidency, “a majority of the State Department was anti-Zionist.” [GOLDMANN, N. 1978, p. 31])

Want to work in the United States Foreign Service – a division of the U.S. State Department – at an American embassy somewhere in the world? In our American society that is founded on clear principles separating “church” and state (emphatically enforced by Jewish lobbying organizations at every opportunity) the registration booklet for the 1999 Foreign Service Officer Examination (a test for entry into foreign service) noted that the exam would be held, worldwide, on a Saturday. However, notes the booklet, “applicants whose religious beliefs preclude them from taking the examination on a Saturday may apply to take the test on Sunday.” A letter may simply be sent in writing “as self-certification” that attests to the applicant’s “affiliation with a recognized body that observes its Sabbath throughout the year on Saturday.” [REGISTRATION, p. 21] Although the government document never says the word “Jew” or “Jewish,” this policy of preferential treatment (exceptionality) refers only to them. The government document states this special privilege explicitly: “Alternative dates for the examination will not be authorized for any other reason than for Saturday Sabbath.” [REGISTRATION, p. 22] To the superficial glance, avoiding discrimination against religious Jews is the reason for Jewish exceptionality here. But there is deeper dimension to this governmental policy. Being Jewish is the only acceptable reason for missing the Saturday test. Anybody else’s religious reason or, more importantly, secular reason on the face of the earth is (however incongruent for a secular government) summarily rejected, a paradox that fulfills traditional Jewry’s religiously-based “unique” self-conception of itself, a status dictated even in the context of an areligious civil system. (Want to donate money to Israel’s army? You can and the American government will let you take a tax write-off for it.) [LIBI, 2001]

In 1998 the London Independent noted that “the State Department line on the Middle East, always skewed towards Israel, has been followed obsequiously by most American reporters. Only weeks after United States diplomats were instructed to refer to the Israeli-occupied West Bank as ‘disputed’ – rather than ‘occupied’ territory, American journalists began using precisely the same word.” [FISK, p. 14]

In March 1997 the Washington Times came under attack from Jews for an article stating that “several sources said [Clinton’s State Department] appointments are partly blocked because there are too many ‘white Jewish males’ in senior State Department positions to fulfill the concept of balance the administration seeks, especially with several top women leaving.” [FORWARD, 3-7-97, p. 5] In response, the Chairman of the House International Relations Committee, Jewish Congressman Benjamin Gilman, saw such commentary – that Jews already were way beyond their reasonable share of power in the State Department alone – as outrageously “discriminatory”:

“For such a statement to appear, even anonymously, in this day and age, is outrageous. It goes without saying that religious discrimination in personnel decision-making is totally inappropriate and against the spirit of all anti-discrimination laws.” [FORWARD, 3-7-97, p. 5]

(Among Gilman’s other curious testimonials is that in behalf of Shabtai Kalmanovich, a known “Russian/Israeli gangster,” [BLOCK, A., 1996, p. 166] who was charged with a bank fraud in North Carolina. Gilman, at the time the majority leader of the House Banking Commission, “wrote to the court in North Carolina lauding Kalmanovich’s character.”) [BLOCK, A., 1996, p. 166-167]

While Gilman wailed about the horrible discrimination against Jews, the Jewish Exponent also noted in the same year that “you can’t blame the Aipacers [members of the AIPAC] for feeling smug these days. In addition to [Steve Grossman’s new role [as head of the Democratic National Committee], a former employee (Martin Indyk) is ambassador to Israel, a former executive director (Tom Dine) is a top official in the Agency for International Development and the former top AIPAC lobbyist (Anne Christianson) is chief of staff to House Speaker Newt Gingrich. And dozens of Capitol Hill staffers cut their teeth in AIPAC’s offices.” [BESSER, SCENES, p. 61] These people are probably often interviewed by Wolf Blitzer, CNN’s White House reporter. Such an expression of “objective news” is stunningly incestuous. Even Blitzer has deep links to AIPAC: he’s a former editor of AIPAC’s newsletter, the Near East Report. [HADER, p. 27]

When a Jewish employee sought to sue the CIA for anti-Semitism in 1999, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency noted that “one former foreign service officer wondered how one can claim rampant anti-Semitism when Dennis Ross, the U.S. Chief Middle East negotiator, and his deputy, Aaron Miller, who have both lived in Israel, received [highest level] security clearances without trouble. In addition, President Clinton’s national security adviser, Sandy Berger, and State Department spokesman, James Rubin, maintain the highest level clearance.” [DORF, M., 4-14-99, p. 13]

Completely unrestrained, the American Jewish link to Israel enjoys more and more profound closures and configurations. As Jews move up en masse in American government, they increasingly find themselves even negotiating with fellow American Jews (who have emigrated to Israel) in parallel positions in the Israeli government. Such American-Israelis include Dore Gold (Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, who has a PhD from Columbia University and was born and raised in West Hartford, Connecticut), Bobby Brown (Israel’s minister of Diaspora Affairs), and Ari Weiss (adviser to Israeli minister Natan Sharansky). “Unparalleled diplomatic opportunities,” noted the Jewish magazine Mosaic in 1998,

“… have recently opened for American Jews – not just in the United States. Imagine, for instance, that when U.S. Ambassador Ross and Israeli Ambassador (to the United Nations) Dore Gold sit down to negotiate in the context of the Oslo peace process, they converse in their native English, representing the West and East coasts of America, respectively. Belying the ostensible meeting of emissaries from two nations, this thoroughly American ambiance is cross-cultural, transnational, and essentially familiar. The two men are archetypes of unprecedented American Jewish possibility. Ross is himself emblematic of a coterie of Jews who in the last decade have broken the glass ceiling in the State Department.” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 35]

At a Harvard’s Kennedy School of Government, a questioner asked Israeli ambassador Gold if “the preponderance of Jews on the American [peace] team posed a problem for Israel?” Gold, noted Mosaic magazine, “stared down the questioner with a twinkle in his eye and stated in superb diplomatic double-speak: ‘It is the policy of the Israeli government to handle representatives of the United States as Americans and nothing more.’” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 35]

For American-Israeli Ari Weiss’s part, he was “one of the most influential personalities in Washington in the 1980s, when he served as senior aide to House Speaker Tip O’Neill.” Weiss (also the former secretary of the Democratic Party’s Steering and Policy Committee) years later met American Vice President Al Gore in Israel. “While Weiss was wondering whether Gore would remember him, [Gore] stood up, embraced him warmly, and said, “Ari, how could I possibly forget you. It’s thanks to you that I was appointed to the House Intelligence Committee.” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 43]

In 1998, Mosaic’s Jewish authors Jesse Sage and Franklin Zaromb suggested that because the many Jews in the American government had not permanently emigrated to Israel (as declared desirable by traditional Zionist thinking) they were “anti-Zionist Zionists,” a genre of Jewry that was of enormous value to Israel:

“The [U.S.] State Department crew directly shapes the parameters under which Israel operates … These [Jewish] employees of the State Department officially act as model American representatives and public Jews. But most importantly, they enjoy free trips to Israel all the time. This meeting between fantasy and reality reflects a form of non-Zionist Zionism wherein American Jews demonstrate how they can do more for the political Zionist cause as Americans than as Israelis … Representatives of the American government thus evince support for Israel while distancing themselves from the Zionist cause … Non-Zionism argues for the value of a diaspora Jewish politics that can secure responsibility for the Jewish state when Zionism falls short: ironically, non-Zionism believes it can do Israel as a nation-state a better service than the Zionist position itself.” [SAGE/ZAROMB, p. 39-40]

Even when Clinton appointees were not Jewish, the Jewish lobby usually had much to celebrate anyway. Early in Clinton’s first term, in 1993 the MetroWest Jewish News noted that

“The new [Clinton] administration will also have the added strength of two very strong [non-Jewish] supporters of Israel as Secretary of Defense U.S. Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis, and Central Intelligence Agency director James Woolsey. Aspin, as Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has been an architect of – and key figure in – U.S.-Israel strategic relations. Both men are members of the board of advisors of JINSA, the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs.” [BLOOMFIELD, p. 27]

“At the pinnacle of American government,” proclaimed the Jewish Week at the beginning of Clinton’s second Presidential term, “[there is a] raft of Jews (Rubin, Reich, Kantor, Ginsburg, Breyer, Deutch, Berger, Ross, Indyk, et al) who have graced the stunningly philo-semitic Clinton administration, inspiring no small degree of comment among Jew baiters – you can check it out on the Internet – and dinner-table discussion among Jews, but causing very little to-do in the mainstream media.” [SCHOFFMAN, p. 23] “Much of the Bush administration’s and almost all of the Clinton foreign policy team ... were Jews,” notes Barry Rubin, “No one complained.” [RUBIN, p. 240]

Some Jewish scholars seem amazed that the massive Jewish and/or Zionist presence at the upper echelons of the American government is never mentioned. “When California’s Barbara Boxer and Diane Feinstein got elected to the United States Senate in 1992,” says Stephen Whitfield, “what mattered was their gender, not their ethnicity; and it seemed almost parochial to tout their membership in Hadassah [the women’s Zionist organization].” [WHITFIELD, p. 9] Incredibly, comparatively, in 1998, California state treasurer Matt Fong’s successful struggle to oppose Boxer for the U.S. Senate revealed another of the many unconscionable American double standards and mass media hypocrisy about Jews in this country. While Feinstein and Boxer are completely screened from critical inquiry about them as Jews and Zionists (with the foreign entity of Israel always hiding in the wings), the Copley News Service noted that:

“Speaking here [in Los Angeles] to a group of Asian-Americans, the treasurer said ‘it hurts’ that reporters and editors have treated him as an outsider with questions that focus only on his ethnicity. [They ask about the recent Clinton] Asian-American fund-raising scandal and whether his loyalties lie with China.” [WILKIE, p. A3]

In the context of this chapter, and this volume, it is mind-boggling that press attention was also focused upon Barbara Boxer who “said yesterday that she was warned by the FBI last year that Chinese citizens or government officials might try to contact her office ‘in an effort to influence U.S. foreign policy.’” [FREEDBERG, p. A1] That such double standard material can be published without ironic intent is a blazing indictment of the American mass media and current political system.

Both of California’s senators, Feinstein and Boxer, are, not surprisingly, also Jewish multi–millionaires. With assets of at least $20 million, Feinstein and her Jewish husband, Richard Blum (who runs a $400 million investment management firm and became part owner of Northwest Airlines in 1989) noted the Los Angeles Times, “are so rich that her [public disclosure statement] form runs 82 pages.” [WILGOREN, p. A1] For her part, in 1998 Barbara Boxer reported a “$1-million to $5-million blind trust.” [WILGOREN, p. A1] “Senator Dianne Feinstein remains one of the richest members of Congress,” noted the Sacramento Bee, “while Senator Barbara Boxer and her husband may be among the most active investors.” [GANNETT, SACRAMENTO, p. A6] In 1993 alone the Boxers traded in 102 different stocks.

In 1992, Feinstein was fined $190,000 for violating state campaign laws. “I think it is the biggest case involving misreporting or improperly reporting in the history of the agency,” FFPC (Fair Political Practices Commission) chairman Ben Davidian remarked. “By failing to report such a huge amount of money, Feinstein kept the voters from knowing the true sources and uses of her campaign funds. This was no simple act of forgetfulness.” [ELLIS, p. A3] For her part, Senator Boxer, judged to be one of the top ten Congressional “publicity hounds” by an East Coast magazine (George), [LACEY, p. A3] in 1996 asked fellow Jew, John Deutch, then the head of the CIA, to investigate reports of a CIA role in the movement of cocaine into America, especially poisoning African-American communities. [KNIGHT RIDDER, SACRAMENTO, p. A3] Curiously, Boxer is – and has always remained – completely silent on the bigger issue of Israeli, “Russian” mafia, and Orthodox Jewish involvement in exactly the same thing. [See earlier details]

Boxer, in a crowded Jewish field, even defeated a Jewish Republican opponent for her Congressional seat. The MetroWest Jewish News guessed that her next Republican challenger would also be Jewish, the mayor of San Diego, Susan Golding [KLEIN, D, p. 5] whose husband (also Jewish) went to prison for drug money laundering. [See earlier details] “Presently [1998],” notes George Goodwin, “a senator from Connecticut is an Orthodox Jew. Both of Wisconsin’s and California’s senators are Jews.” [GOODMAN, p. 50]

In 1999, among those – Jews and non-Jews – presented Israel’s Friend of Zion Award was Sam Gejdenson, a House of Representatives Congressman from Connecticut. (In 2001, outgoing president Bill Clinton pardoned Gejdenson’s brother-in-law, Stuart Harris Cohn, guilty in 1979 of a commodity trading violation. “Cohn, a lifelong Democrat, said he asked family members, included Gejdenson, to writes letters on his behalf.”) [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 1-23-01] “Though seldom discussed in public,” notes the Jewish Week, “the Jewish delegation on Capitol Hill [i.e., Jewish Congressmen] is one of the nation’s most important Jewish institutions. Jewish lawmakers, working through an informal network of relationships, do most of the hard, behind-the-scenes work that wins aid to Israel, secures visas for Jewish refugees, ensures church-state separation, UJA tax deductibility, and a host of other crucial needs.” [GOLDBERG, Bagels, p. 13]

The predominance of high-level appointed Jewish government officials in American government, said Israeli journalist Bar-Yosef in his 1994 article in Israel, “are joined by a long list of senior Jewish officials in the [Clinton] State Department, headed by the Middle East Peace Team, Dennis Ross, and followed by many deputy secretaries and even more minor senior secretaries’ chief of staff.” [BAR-YOSEF, p. 108-109] Ross has been a mainstay in Washington government, also in the State Department under presidents Carter, Reagan, and Bush. He was even an adviser to Republican Bush’s 1992 presidential campaign.

“[My family] opened the first pharmacies in Tel Aviv,” Rehm Emmanual, White House Special Projects Director, told his Israeli interviewer, “… My uncle … was killed in Israel’s War of Independence. My father was then a member of Etzel (IRGUN) commanded by Begin. [IRGUN was a terrorist unit fighting British rule in Palestine] … My first visit to Israel was three days after the Six Day War. My father said that we had to go to Israel …” [BAR-YOSEF, p. 108-109]

Incredibly, Emmanual, whose office is next door to the White House Oval Office, during the 1991 Persian Gulf War “volunteered for one month service in the Israeli army through the ‘Overseas Volunteer Unit.'” (A 1992 Baltimore Jewish Times article even identified Emmanuel as an “Israeli.” Dual citizenship? [LIFTON, p. 52])
In 2002, stirring old ethnic politics, Emanuel decided to run to run for Congress from Chicago. Emmanuel, whose fundraising till of $1.5 million doubled that of his challenger, Polish-American Nancy Kaszak, was once “an accomplished fund-raiser for [Chicago] mayor Richard Daley before joining Clinton’s campaign in a similar role ... He returned to Chicago in 1998, where he made millions as an investment banker.” [BUCHANAN, A., 2-26-02] Emanuel’s canidacy was assailed by the president of the Polish American Congress, Edward Moskal, who called him a “millionaire carpetbagger” with too strong an allegiance to Israel. “While the country’s certain elements, to which he gave his allegiance,” said Moskal, “defiles the Polish homeland and continues to hurl insults at the Polish people.” For such true statements Moskal was decried as a bigot by local media and “Mr. Emmanuel’s campaign trotted out a rainbow of religious leaders to attack what they called the infusion of bigotry and hatred into the race.” Emanuel bent Moskal’s complaints into the usual charge of anti-Semitism. “[Moskal’s] weren’t criticisms of Rahm Emanuel as an individual,” Emanuel declared, “Those statements, the meaning behind those statements, were criticisms of me as a Jewish American.” [WILGOREN, J., 3-6-02]

Meanwhile, while Jews can go overseas, join the Israeli army, come back, and head a section in the White House, in 1995 Vice President Al Gore fired his speech-maker, 62-year old Richard Marius for having written a book review three years earlier in Harvard Magazine. Marius’ offense was to write that “Many Israelis, the Holocaust fresh in their memory, believe that horror gives them the right to inflict horror on others. Winternitz’s account of the brutality of Shin Bet, the Israeli secret police, is eerily similar to the stories of the Gestapo, the Geheimstaatpolitzei in Nazi-occupied territory in World War II.” [DORF, INTERNET]

The book, published by the Atlantic Monthly Press and written by Helen Winternitz, included testimony like this:

“The [Israeli] interrogators [of Palestinian detainees] at Dahiriya were notorious for their painful methods of extracting information and confessions, including beating, humiliations, freezing showers and confinements in coffin-like boxes … There were by now almost nine thousand Palestinians in Israeli prisons or detention camps. The vast majority were not common criminals … The general section was reported to be bad, and the interrogation section a black hole that was the Shin Bet’s province, off-limits even to the army officer in charge of the prison. According to the common wisdom, only a few prisoners stood up to the Shin Bet and refused to cooperate … Neta Goldman, an Israeli lawyer and member of the Association for Civil Rights, visited Dahiriya with a group of colleagues. She was shocked by what she saw when she looked into a cell. ‘When they opened the door of the cell, it was like a deep, dark hole,’ she said. ‘It was so stinky we could hardly breathe. The smell was horrible.’ Fourteen prisoners were confined in the cell, which she estimated was not more than fifteen square yards of space lighted by a single light bulb…” [WINTERNITZ]
Gore was reportedly alerted to the old Marius review of this by Martin Peretz, owner of the New Republic who “also writes for the Vice-President and is a staunch supporter of Israel.” [DORF, JEWISH TELAG] (In earlier years, Peetz was a far-left, anti-establishment radical. He “helped bankroll SDS, Ram-parts, and other radical causes.” [ROTHMAN,/LIICHTER, 1982, p. 106] Peretz had fired New Republic editor Mike Kelly in 1997 “for what, Kelly says, was his harsh criticism of Clinton and Gore.” [KURTZ, H., 8-20, 2000, p. A12] (Ironically, Marius had earlier written an important 1993 Vice-Presidential speech for the occasion of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Marius’s firing recalls the one in 1977, when President Jimmy Carter fired his Ambassador to the United Nations, Andrew Young, a Black man, for meeting with representatives of the Palestinian Liberation Organization; information on this meeting is believed to have been provided by Israeli surveillance.)

Marius died in 1999. As James Wall, former Illinois State chairman for the Jimmy Carter presidential campaigns, observes:

Another recent case of similar Jewish-inspired censorship was that of Salam Al-Marayati, head of the Los Angeles-based Muslim Public Affairs Council. In 1999 Democratic Congressman Richard Gephardt, the House Minority Leader, nominated Al-Marayati to serve on a newly created National Commission on Terrorism (an advisory group to Congress). A week later Gephardt withdrew the nomination. Why? “The Al-Marayati affair,” noted the Los Angeles Times, “marked the third campaign against American Arab or Muslim appointments this year by the Zionist Organization of America and other Jewish groups. The incidents have highlighted community concerns that American Arabs and Muslims are targets of character assassination campaigns aimed at excluding them from U.S. policy-making positions.” [WATANABE, p. 1]

Co-complainants to Al-Marayati’s nomination included also the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the Anti-Defamation League, and the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations. Jewish professor Norman Birnbaum noted that “a distinguished Congressman has succumbed to ideological blackmail … [Do] Americans of Arab descent have the rights of other citizens or are [they] to be treated as guilty unless proved innocent, with the Israel lobby as prosecutor, judge and jury?” [BIRNBAUM, p. M5]

Jewish groups argued that Al-Marayati, in his published writings, condoned Muslim terrorism. In an editorial, the Atlanta Journal and Constitution expressed outrage at the successful Jewish efforts to oust Al-Marayati and the disingenuous manner they did it:

“To bolster its case, the Jewish group [the American Jewish Committee] compiled five statements by Al-Marayati and four other statements attributed to members of his organization. Those statements – the worst the Committee could find going back 10 years – do not come close to justifying Al-Marayati’s removal. For example, here’s the first statement cited by the Committee:

’Most Islamic movements have been branded as terrorists as a result of the rising extremism from a handful of militants.’ Al-Marayati wrote in 1996, ‘American freedom fighters hundreds of years ago were also regarded as terrorists by the British.’ And that’s as inflammatory as he gets.” [AT J & C]

The Washington Post, in an editorial, noted that “Americans should not ignore the Muslim community in discussing terrorism. Many Arabs feel their community bears the brunt of aspects of American terrorism policy. It is important for American counter-terrorism measures not to be seen reflexively by Muslims as illegitimate. People like Mr. Al-Marayati should be at the table.” [WASHINGTON POST, 7-18-99]

The Los Angeles Times noted that “There’s nothing unusual about politicians caving in to organized pressures. But in this case the pressure was unwarranted and Gephardt should have found the courage to resist it. Those who know Al-Marayati know that he is not an apologist for Arab terrorism or a public defender of radical causes.” [LA TIMES, A Loss, p. B4] Others publicly testifying in Al-Marayati’s behalf were James Hilvert, the Executive Director of the National Conference for Community in Justice in Los Angeles, Joe R. Hicks, Executive Director of the Human Relations Commission in Los Angeles, Rabbi Emeritus Leonard Beerman of Leo Baeck Temple, and prominent Jewish Democratic fundraiser Stanley Sheinbaum. Even the editor of the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles, Gene Lichtenstein, joined in the fray, accusing the Zionist Organization of being a “Jewish Thought Police.” [TUGEND, Liberal, p. 5]

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch noted in an editorial that Congressman Gephardt “appeared to be caving in to the vociferous criticism from Jewish groups … [He] responded as would almost any politician hoping for a future. He found an escape hatch.” [i.e., attributing the nomination withdrawal to a “security clearance” problem.] Al-Marayati (also a member of the Los Angeles Human Relations Commission) responded to the attacks upon him, saying, “There are threats to our democracy, and one of these threats is the exclusion and discrimination that was exposed to us by these developments.” [GOODSTEIN, p. A5] Elsewhere, he noted “that you must toe the line of unconditional, blind support for Israel to be even considered to give advice to Congress.” [MURPHY, p. 6]

Even before the withdrawal of Al-Marayati’s nomination, noted the New York Times, “seven members of Congress sent a letter to Director Louis E. Freed of the FBI last week requesting his ‘personal involvement’ in conducting a background check on Mr. Al-Marayati.” [GOODSTEIN, L., p. A5] (In 2001, Raeed Tayeh, a Muslim staff member for Georgia Congresswoman Cynthia McKinney, was forced to resign after writing a letter to the editor of The Hill, a Washington DC paper. Tayeh accused some Jewish senators of having dual loyalties (between Israel and America) and was bold enough to mention that he worked for Senator McKinney. [DOADIO, R., 12-7-01].
While Muslim Americans are subjected to a background shakedown of disturbing proportions (and then even before the initiation of a check, dumped), in May 1997 the Washington Post ran a front page story reporting that “the FBI has opened an investigation to determine whether a senior U.S. government official has been passing highly sensitive information to the Israeli government.” [BOUSTANY, p. 1] The four month-old investigation originated because of a conversation intercepted by the National Security Agency, between a Washington-based Israeli intelligence officer and a superior in Tel Aviv. Code named by the Israelis as “Mega,” the Post noted that the intercepted conversation led U.S. government officials “to believe that Mega may be someone in the U.S. government who has provided information to Israelis in the past.” [BOUSTANY, p. 1]

Israel’s Ambassador to the United States, Eliahu Ben-Elissor, complained that “apparently there is someone [who leaked the story to the press] who not only wants to besmirch the name of Israel, but also perhaps to cause damage to the relations between Israel and America.” [GELLMAN, B, p. A20] Gerald Steinberg, a foreign policies professor at Bar Elan University in Israel, noted the tension at the time between President Clinton and Israeli prime minister Benyamin Netanyahu over Israeli reluctance to concessions in the Clinton-brokered Arab-Israeli peace process. “When American-Israeli relations already seem tense,” noted Steinberg, “over a whole series of other issues, this is a killer issue.” [BOUSTANY, p. 1]

The Metro West Jewish News noted that “because the Mega story appeared the same day the administration’s top peace process diplomat, Dennis Ross, was meeting with Benjamin Netanyahu in Jerusalem, it is hard to escape the conclusion that the leak was intended to transmit a message to the [Israeli] prime minister: Never mind the pro-Israel/reluctant-to-take-on-the-Jews Clinton White House—we can still get you.” [METRO-JEWISH NEWS, 5-15-97, p. 4] The Baltimore Jewish News complained that the Washington Post printed, with the “Mega” story, a side article about Israeli Ambassador Ben-Elissar, who spent ten years working for Israel’s CIA (the Mossad). [BESSER, J, SPYING, p. 34] Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations told reporters that he was confident the Mega story “will blow over.” [MANN, C, p. 1] “There’s something almost sinister about the way this was reported,” suggested Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, “with so little real information. And there’s something disturbing about the link the Post made to the Pollard case.” [BESSER, J, Spy Charges, p. 1]

The “Mega” story was reported by no other major American newspaper other than the Washington Post. And it suddenly evaporated from the Post pages with no further exploration, or explanation, of the story.

British journalist Gordon Thomas, author of a 1999 volume on the Mossad (based on over 100 hours of interviews with Mossad officials and agents), observed that Mega “may be more than one person. What’s incredible is not so much that they have an American mole at the highest level of the United States government, but how this small [Israeli] intelligence community of about 1,200 people is able to mobilize sayanim [American Jewish agents for the Mossad], and control the American media and the publishing worlds, and get people like Barbara Streisand to spout ‘Israel-first, America-second’ propaganda to the president of the United States over the dinner table at the White House.” [HOWE, R., 6-99, p. 47]

Jewish spies for Israel in the White House is an old, albeit hidden, theme. In 1988, for instance, there was suggestion in some newspapers that a complicated spy-prisoner deal was being worked out with Israel which would “involve the U.S. halting further investigations in the Jonathan Pollard case.” “Pollard,” note Jewish authors Ian Black and Benny Morris, “was already serving a life sentence, but Israeli officials were apparently worried that further inquiries might unearth more spies in the heart of the United States administration.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 443] “Many in the United States intelligence community,” says Seymour Hersh, “… were convinced that [Pollard] had one and perhaps many more accomplices inside the [U.S.] government – men or women who were supplying Israel with the identification of highly classified documents that Pollard could then be assigned to retrieve.” [HERSH, S., p. 307] Interestingly, by 1996, “both the Israeli ambassador to the U.S. and the Israeli ambassador to Canada were former Mossad officers.” [OSTROVSKY, 1997, p. 37] (When George Bush assumed the presidency in 2001, Jewish Congressman Anthony Weiner “immediately beseeched” the new president “on his first workday as president” to “grant Pollard clemency.”) [JORDAN, M., 1-26-01]

In May 2000, a Washington DC paper, Insight on the News, after interviewing over two dozen government officials about the problem, described the results of its year long investigation into Israeli spying in the American government:

“The FBI is probing an explosive foreign espionage operation that could dwarf the other spy scandals plaguing the U.S. government. Insight has learned that FBI counterintelligence is tracing a daring operation to spy on high-level U.S. officials by hacking into supposedly secure telephone networks. The espionage was facilitated, federal officials say, by lax telephone-security procedures at the White House, State Department and other high-level government offices and by Justice Department unwillingness to seek an indictment against a suspect. The espionage operation may have serious ramifications because the FBI has identified Israel as the culprit.” [WALLER/RODRIGUEZ, 2000]

As always, a “senior government official” remarked that “It is a politically sensitive matter. I can’t comment on it beyond telling you that anything involving Israel on this particular matter is off-limits. It’s that hot.” “When it has anything to do with Israel,” said a former U.S. intelligence officer, “it’s something you just never want to poke your nose into.” “What price should Israel pay for this?” David Major, former director of counterintelligence programs as the National Security Council said to the paper, “My predictions are that there will be no impact whatsoever. Do we put our heads in the sand or do we take it as a wake-up call?” [WALLER/RODRIGUEZ, 2000]

In December 2001, a series of Fox News TV programs noted the omnipresence of Israeli “ears” and Jewish power in shielding them from scrutiny:

“Most directory assistance calls, and virtually all call records and billing in the U.S. are done for the phone companies by Amdocs Ltd., an Israeli-based private telecommunications company. Amdocs has contracts with the 25 biggest phone companies in America, and more worldwide. The White House and other secure government phone lines are protected, but it is virtually impossible to make a call on normal phones without generating an Amdocs record of it. In recent years, the FBI and other government agencies have investigated Amdocs more than once. The firm has repeatedly and adamantly denied any security breaches or wrongdoing. But sources tell Fox News that in 1999, the super secret national security agency, headquartered in northern Maryland, issued what’s called a Top Secret sensitive compartmentalized information report, TS/SCI, warning that records of calls in the United States were getting into foreign hands – in Israel, in particular.” [CAMERON, C., pt. 2, 12-14-01]

A second Fox News report notes:

“An Israeli-based company called Amdocs Ltd. … generates the computerized records and billing data for nearly every phone call made in America … [A second Israeli company, Comverse Infosys] provides wiretapping for law enforcement … Adding to the suspicions is the fact that in Israel, Converse works closely with the Israeli government, and under special programs, gets reimbursed up to 50 percent of its research and development costs by the Israeli Ministry of Industry and Trade. But investigators within the DEA, INS, and FBI have all told Fox News that to pursue or even suggest Israeli spying through Converse is considered career suicide.” [CAMERON, C., pt. 3, 12-14-01]

Cameron’s reports about Israeli spying amounted to four in total. He was the first representative of a news organization to also report that scores of Israeli nationals had been rounded up after the September 11 terrorist attack.

In fact, after the 2001 attack on the World Trade Center, a vast swirl of disturbing clues about Israeli spying in America began to appear – however delicately – in small sections of the mass media. (Most media sources – overwhelmingly Jewish in control – censored or ignored the stories. The Fox News articles cited above, for example, were withdrawn, with no explanation, from the company’s web site within a week. Fox is owned by non-Jewish, but ardently pro-Israel, Rupert Murdoch). The well-known French magazine Le Monde, the French Online Intelligence Letter, and antiwar.com were among the very, very few in the vanguard of inquiry about Israeli spying in America. However guarded about the implications of the widening Israeli spy story, the Associated Press noted that “Authorities have arrested and deported since early last year dozens of young Israelis who represented themselves as art students in efforts to gain access to restricted buildings and homes, U.S. officials said. The Israelis tried to get inside sensitive federal office buildings and the homes of government employees, officials said. A draft report from the Drug Enforcement Administration – which first characterized the activities as suspicious – said the youths’ actions ‘may well be an organized intelligence-gathering activity ... The arrests, made in an unspecified number of major U.S. cities from California to Florida, came amid public warnings from U.S. intelligence agencies about suspicious behavior by people posing as Israeli art students and ‘attempting to bypass facility security and enter federal buildings ... A Justice Department official, who also asked not to be identified, and investigators have been aware of some ‘alleged linkage’ between the students and alleged espionage activities in the United States since early 2001, and said authorities have made arrests in Dallas, Chicago, San Diego and in South Florida.” [BRIDIS, T., 3-6-02, LOS ANGELES TIMES]

These “art students” supposedly had links to the Universal Art Inc. at 10873 NW 52nd St in Sunrise, Florida. Soon after their busts the Sun-Sentinal noted that “there was no sign of a company called Universal Art Inc ... No one answered the door, and several occupants had not heard of the company. The company’s officers, Yitzchak Shish and Chava Sagi, are not listed. The were not among those deported ...” [RAIMONDO, J., 3-8-2002]

Le Monde outlined the entire Israel spy story as it then appeared, connecting the Israeli phone companies and the vast spy network to suggest that the Israelis obviously knew of the imminent attack on the World Trade Center and Pentagon but did not warn the U.S. government. (This ruthless Machiavellian attitude of course would guarantee a greater American receptivity to Israeli views and needs if America suffered a major terrorist blow). Le Monde, citing Online Intelligence Letter evidence, estimates that about 120 Israeli spies were rounded up in America, echoing on a much larger scale the results of an earlier “secret” investigation “by division 5 of the FBI regarding Israeli phone-tapping targeting the White House, the State Department and the National Security Council.” Le Monde contacted Fox News three times asking for a “tape of the broadcast” by Carl Cameron but “it was never done. On February 26, Fox told our correspondent in New York that sending it posed ‘a problem,’ without being specific.” [CYPEL, S., 3-5-02] [online at: http://www.antiwar.com/rep/lemonde1.html]

Le Monde’s own investigation further revealed that “six of the intercepted ‘students’ had a cellular phone bought by an Israeli ex-vice-consul in the United States ... Five at least were intercepted in Hollywood [Florida], and two in Fort Lauderdale. Hollywood is a town of 25,000 inhabitants north of Miami, close to Fort Lauderdale. At least 10 of the 19 terrorists of 9/11 were residing in Florida ... Four of the five members of the group that diverted American Airlines flight number 11 ... resided all at various times in Hollywood Florida ... This convergence is, inter alia, the origin of the American conviction that one of the tasks of the Israeli ‘students’ would have been to track the Al-Qaida terrorists on their territory, without informing the federal authorities of the existence of the plot.” [CYPEL, S., 3-5-02]

Citing a classified U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) report they had somehow acquired, the Online Intelligence web site names some of the captured Israeli spies: Peer Segalovitz (“military registration number 5087989”), Aran Ofek (“son of a renowned two-star general in the Israeli army”), Michael Calmanovic (“headed up the team in Irving, Texas), Hanan Serfaty (headed the Israeli team in Florida), Legum Yochai (headed the Miami) operation. Spies intercepted a year ago included Yaron Ohana, Ronen Kalfon, Zeev Cohen and Naor Topaz. “The network,” wrote Online Intelligence, “targeted some of the most sensitive sites in the U.S., such as Tanker Air Force Base near Oklahoma City.” [RAIMONDO, J., 3-8-02] [http://www.anti-war.com/justin/justincol.html]

As Justin Raimondo notes, citing Online Intelligence material:

“It seems these ‘art students’ ‘cultivated contacts with Israeli information technology companies based in the US and serving as regular suppliers to various U.S. federal agencies, such as Amdocs and others. The Fox News is cited, by Online Intelligence and Le Monde, and the former even provides a convenient map of the Texas chapter of the ‘art students’ underground apparatus, complete with not only names, but arrival dates, corporate connections, when and where they were arrested, and their specific functions in the Israeli military-intelligence apparatus. How much more evidence do we need before the editorialists and the pundits start calling government officials on their lies – and Congress begins an investigation?” [RAIMONDO, J., 3-8-02]

Amidst the many resultant US and Israeli government denials and cover-up about this gigantic Israeli spy story, the Intelligence Online organization’s spokesman Guillaume Dasquie announced that

“It seems irresponsible for us to publish it, but if the denials go on, we could put the report on our Internet site and in so doing possibly blacken the names of the people most exposed ... The document we have [the DEA report] we details not only the identities of the members of this network, but also their activities in the Israeli army, and even their serial numbers in the intelligence services, their passport numbers and their validity, and their visas and their validity.” [RAIMONDO, J., 3-8-02]

Among those under suspicion as an Israeli spy in the heart of American government in earlier years was Howard Teicher, a (Jewish) National Security Council adviser. “Middle East experts in the State Department,” noted John Walcott of the Wall Street Journal, “the NSC staff and some Washington think tanks conducted a tireless whispering campaign against him, intimating that he was an Israeli agent.” “Teicher’s life resembled that of tens of thousands of other young American Jews,” says the Jerusalem Post with no sense of irony in the implications of that statement, “… [He] had a bar mitzva, went to Camp Ramah, spent a summer in Israel at age 17, learned Hebrew in high school and then in college worked in the fish pond at kibbutz Neveh Or [in Israel].” [RODAN, 1994, p. 18]

Then, in 2001, there is the mysterious three paragraph article from the Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz about Robert Philip Hanssen, an American FBI agent turned Russian spy who represented “one of the worst cases of espionage in the history of the United States.” The Ha’aretz headline proclaimed Israeli Angle in U.S. Spy Case Causes Worry in Jerusalem, and then noted that “the recent confrontation between the United States and Russia over the serious espionage case involving FBI agent Robert Philip Hanssen has an Israel angle. This has been the subject of concern at the highest political and security echelons in Jerusalem in the past few days.” [BENN, A., 4-4-01] The article explains nothing else at all about the dimensions of this “Israeli angle,” nor has any other media source ever taken up the story.

Fox News addressed the subject of Israeli spies in America after the September 11 terrorist attacks:

“Since September 11, more than 60 Israelis have been arrested or detained, either under the new patriot anti-terrorist law, or for immigration violations. A handful of active Israeli military were among those detained, according to investigators, who say some of the detainees also failed polygraph questions when asked about alleged surveillance activities against and in the United States. There is no indication that the Israelis were involved in the 9/11 attacks, but investigators suspect that the Israelis may have gathered intelligence about the attacks in advance, and not shared it. A highly placed investigator said there are ‘tie-ins’ … Numerous classified documents obtained by Fox News indicate that even prior to September 11, as many as 140 other Israelis had been detained or arrested in a secretive and sprawling investigation into suspected espionage by Israelis in the United States.” [CAMERON, C., pt. 1, 12-14-01]

What about the aforementioned CIA head John Deutch (and perhaps others in his circle) as a very strong candidate for the Jewish-Israeli “Mega” club? In 2000, a troubling story about him began to hit the newsstands, revolving around an incident that happened as he was leaving his CIA post in 1996. Deutch, who became Director of the CIA after leaving his position as Deputy Secretary of Defense, was caught with 1,700 pages of CIA documents – many secret, and classified – on his home computer, one that had also been a visitor to “high-risk” Internet pornography sites. Members in Congress were not informed of Deutch’s security lapses until 1998 and not until the year 2000 did all this come under public scrutiny. And he was afforded top-level Pentagon security clearance until late 1999.

Deutch was known to be a problem earlier in his career when it came to secret information. “According to a knowledgeable official who asked not be identified,” noted the (New Jersey) Record, “while Deutch was serving as a senior Defense Department official [the number two in command] in the early 1990s, he failed a polygraph test about his handling of classified materials. The official said Pentagon security officers were concerned because Deutch took highly classified material home with him, but his security clearances were not revoked or downgraded.” [THE RECORD, 2-5-2000, p. A6]

An investigation of Deutch’s information cache was undertaken by the CIA Inspector General. The IG report, noted the New York Times, “disclosed that just three days after Mr. Deutch learned that his computer practices were under review, he deleted more than 1,000 classified files from his personal computers. The report also says that Mr. Deutch declined to be interviewed by the CIA’s security officials.” [RISEN, J., 2-12-2000] Deutch had been taking secret CIA information home for years. As the Times notes, “according to the IG report, “Mr. Deutch used unclassified Macintosh computers for classified work through his tenure as director. He chose not to conduct sensitive work on the classified computer system at the CIA because he said he was afraid the other CIA officials would see what he was writing, according to the report.” [RISEN, J., 2-12-2000]

“This is strange behavior, very suspicious,” remarked the chair of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Richard Shelby, about Deutch’s actions, “It’s unprecedented, to my knowledge.” [THE RECORD, 2-5-2000]

The CIA investigators, noted a European paper, “became so frustrated at the limits imposed on them that they concluded senior [CIA] officials were protecting Mr. Deutch and wanted to wash their hands of the case.” [BRANSON, L., 2-2-2000, p. 12] “Mr. Deutch,” said the New York Times, “refused to be interviewed by the security staff and senior CIA officials allowed him to avoid being questioned.” [RISEN, J.] A number of media members began calling Deutch’s case a “cover-up.” The CIA didn’t report Deutch’s misdeeds to the Justice Department for over a year. The CIA’s Inspector General only did so in 1998 “after an agency employee complained to the Inspector General’s office that the inquiry had not been properly handled.” [RISEN, J., 2-12-2000] The Justice Department declined to prosecute the former Director of the CIA.

The Deutch revelation, remarked a Scottish paper, “is particularly embarrassing in the light of the high profile case of Los Alamos scientist Wen Ho Lee, who is being held in jail without bail. He is suspected of transferring secrets from the nuclear research base to the Chinese. The charges against him so far are for exactly what Mr. Deutch did: transferring files from work to his home computer.” [BRANSON, L., 2-2-2000, p. 12] Like Deutch, there was no hard evidence that Lee passed along information to a foreign government, but Lee languished in solitary confinement 23 hours a day as a suspected spy (imprisoned for taken classified work home), while Deutch merely had his clearances to enter CIA and Pentagon databases taken away.

It was even discovered that Deutch had helped a CIA official, Nora Slatkin, get a job as a vice-president at CITIBANK while she was working on the investigation of his breach of security case. [RISEN, J., 2-12-2000, p. A10] In recent years Deutch has been a professor at MIT and an adviser to weapons companies. He was paid over $240,000, for example, in 1998-99 as a non-employee director at Raytheon and member of that company’s board of governors. [MCLAUGHLIN, T., 3-30-2000, p. 25] As Bill Clinton left the White House in 2001, Clinton granted Deutch a full pardon, surprising the CIA even as it continued its investigation.

Another curious – and controversial – pardon made by Clinton as he left the White House was that of Marc Rich, a Jewish American citizen, prominent philanthropist to Israel, and “fugitive commodities trader” who fled America in the 1980s. As MSNBC (Microsoft/NBC online news) noted: “The U.S. government is aware that Rich has acted as an intermediary in negotiating the return of captured Israeli soldiers and Jewish dissidents. Several Israeli officials wrote Clinton in support of his pardon.” Clinton admitted publicly that Israel had influenced him “profoundly” in the issuance of a pardon. (Rich has given between $70-80 million to Israeli charities, including $5 million to Birthright Israel, the program that seeks to strengthen Zionist ties among Jewish Americans to the Jewish state. The former head of Israel’s Mossad spy agency, Avner Azulay, heads Rich’s charitable foundation in the Jewish state). [MSNBC, 2-15-01] Rich’s ex-wife Denise has also contributed over $1 million to the Democratic Party. [MSNBC, 2-2-2001] As the Denver Post noted about the Rich controversy:

“President Clinton granted his controversial pardon to fugitive financier Marc Rich in part because Israel’s prime minister repeatedly pressed him to do so as a reward for Rich’s clandestine services to Israeli intelligence … On its face, Israeli support for Rich might seem curious, since Rich did extensive business with Iran and Iraq, two of Israel’s mortal enemies, in apparent violation of U.S. law. But it turns out that Rich used his business contacts in the Arab world to pass intelligence to Israel’s foreign intelligence service, the Mossad, and to top Israeli officials.”

“The Marc Rich story,” laments Jewish author Walter Reich, “disproves the adage that all politics is local. Here, the machinations of Jewish politics have gone national with a vengeance. The cast of characters in this squalid miniseries is – let’s face it – overwhelmingly Jewish.” [REICH, W., 2-25-01, part M, p. 5] (Reich also alludes to the many, many Jewish officials (see http://jewishtribalreview.org/rich.htm) – discussed in this work elsewhere – who chose corruption and disgrace in lobbying Clinton for a pardon of Rich, the international fugitive).

(Clinton pardoned 140 criminals. In a review of the 32 who had their sentences commuted, at least 7 were Jewish (see http://jewishtribalreview.org/commut.htm) – 22% of the 32 – overrepresented here by nearly 1,000 per cent per their American population presence, and an even higher percentage per their representation in American prisons.)

Sure enough too, in 2000, concurrently with Deutch’s escapades, the aforementioned Martin Indyk, Ambassador to Israel, active Zionist, and a former National Security Advisor, had his security clearance suspended by the State Department for “suspected violations” of security norms, ostensibly for, “over a long period of time,” “sloppy handling of classified information.” The Washington Post also noted that “Three sources familiar with the investigation said that one part of the inquiry [into Indyk] also involves questions about Indyk’s former deputy Ronald Neumann [also Jewish] and his possible involvement in the alleged composition of a classified memo on an unclassified laptop while traveling in the Middle East.” [MUFSON, S., 9-23-2000]

And what are we to make of the following newswire item in 1998? Focusing on the fact that the Israeli premiere’s public Internet web site had been sabotaged by a computer hacker with pornography, the article also noted that only weeks earlier

“the FBI launched a hunt for the Israeli cyber-intruder who managed to steal into some of the Pentagon’s most closely guarded secrets.” [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 3-11-98]

As Jewish author Joseph Aaron, in an extraordinarily unusual public admission, observed in 2000, focusing on the case of Jewish CIA employee Adam Ciralsky:

“Earlier this month, ‘60 Minutes’ featured the case of Adam Ciralsky, an observant Jew fired by the CIA. During the segment, a CIA official said the agency believes the Israeli government has a program that recruits American Jews to spy on the United States … Let’s face it. If there is suspicion about Jews working at the CIA, it’s understandable. If Jews, especially religious Jews, are feared to be working for Israel, we deserve it. For we have done so much to make the suspicions seem justified.” [AARON, J., 2-26-2000, p. 21]

(In 2001, a Jewish reserve officer, Shawn Pine, charged the U. S. Army (as did Ciralsky of the CIA) with anti-Semitism. Why? Raised in America, he emigrated to Israel in the 1970s, returned to the U.S., joined the American army, and in 1995 returned to study in a Jerusalem university, working part-time again in the Israel Defense Forces. Stripped of his high-level army security clearance and his command of an intelligence unit in 2001, Pine charged that anti-Semitism was ‘endemic’ to the U.S. Army.) [SAMBER, S., 10-29-01]

Meanwhile, international Zionist intrigue operates with impunity. In July 1999, for example, the New York Times noted the extraordinary privileges provided to an Israeli spy in Switzerland. The unidentified man was caught by Swiss police during a wiretapping mission. “In an unheard of concession,” said the Times, “Swiss justice officials allowed him to use an assumed name for trial on grounds that disclosing his real one would endanger his life.” The spy, whose real name his lawyers didn’t even know, was convicted on three counts of lawbreaking, but was released with a “one-year suspended sentence.” “There was speculation,” added the Times, “that the Swiss and Israeli authorities had cut a deal for a light sentence to avoid further diplomatic strains.” (Switzerland has been involved in negotiations with Jewish Holocaust survivors over billions of dollars of Jewish World War II-era claims). [OLSON, E., 2000, p. A6]

asked the Japanese government to refrain from approving their third loan installment of $820 million to Iran until the 13 [Jewish] prisoners are freed.” [SPENCE] These 13 Iranian Jews, arrested and accused by Iran of spying for Israel (7 non-Jews arrested in the alleged ring are rarely mentioned in the Western press), had not even been yet been brought to trial to prove their guilt or innocence, yet the American president was an active lobbyist for Jewish/Israeli interests to ignore Iranian sovereignty and demand, pre-trial, all the suspects’ categorical freedom. Jewish American National Security Adviser Sandy Berger wrote a formal letter to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations assuring them that the President planned to “seek international assistance” in freeing the 13. The Jerusalem Post noted the dimensions of international Jewish activism about the issue, noting that an Israeli “Foreign Ministry spokeswoman said Israel had approached practically every country with which it had diplomatic relations and asked help for seeking the release of the Iranian Jews.” [KUTTLER, 6-18-99]

Iranian officials even revealed that some of the accused Jewish prisoners had confessed that they spied for Israel. Nonetheless, U.S. Secretary or State Madeline Albright announced that “We have made this very clear that this is an unacceptable trial. There is absolutely no reason for them to brought up on espionage charges.” A prominent Iranian religious leader, Mohammed Emami Kashani, responded to Albright, saying, “You are a political leader, not a judicial official … There are international laws. Relations between the countries are based on laws … Woman, you who are Secretary of State, on what logic have you based your remarks? On what basis?” [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 10-22-99]

Years earlier, as context for understanding such an international Jewish pressure campaign, we may look to Morocco. In 1960 an Israeli-sponsored “underground military cell” (as two Jewish scholars describe it), consisting of about 600 people, was exposed among Jews in that Arab land. Many were arrested. Israel then “foreswore secret diplomacy,” notes Ian Black and Benny Morris, “and launched a widespread public campaign on behalf of Moroccan Jewry. U.S. President John Kennedy sent a personal message to King Muhammad; a group of American Congressmen threatened to table a bill to stop U.S. aid to Morocco unless the “persecution” stopped. French President Charles de Gaulle was also mobilized to exert pressure on [Morocco’s capital] Rabat.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 179] The imprisoned Jews were eventually released. The head of Israel’s Mossad, Isser Harel, wrote at the time that “there is no doubt that the [Moroccan] King’s and the interior minister’s latest steps are a result of our actions and our information campaign around the world.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 179]

In the context of this chapter, this book, and the issues they raise, what are we to make of the curiously timed January 1998 Clinton sex scandal? While Israel’s newspapers “warned darkly of a new wave of anti-Semitism as a result of a scandal that has been called ‘Monica-gate,’” [BESSER, ERIC, p. 22] the mainstream American mass media, of course, systematically neglected to even note the fact that the White House intern, Monica Lewinsky – who had sexual relations with the President – was Jewish. Of the 1,317 articles mentioning Monica Lewinsky in the America’s major newspapers (as cited in Newspaper Abstracts) to March 10, 1998, one – in the context of Lewinsky’s lawyer’s comments about Israel – mentioned the word “Jew” or “Jewish.”

The Jewish press (i.e., those media outlets that expressly address concerns of the intra-Jewish community), of course, very much noted the fact of Lewinsky’s heritage and the Jewish complexion of the sex scandal. The Jewish Week reported that “Jewish leaders generally do not expect a backlash stemming from the fact that so many of the actors in the steamy melodrama are Jewish, including Lewinsky, [her lawyer] Ginsburg, and Walter Kaye, a retired New York insurance executive and a major donor to Jewish democratic causes who reportedly introduced the former intern to the First Family.” [BESSER, p. 22] Kaye “was a great friend of Debra Schiff, a receptionist in the White House's West Wing lobby.” [MORTON, A., 1999, p. 113] Karin Joyce Abramson was the Director of the White House Intern Program (Lewinsky started out as an intern there) and it was Evelyn Lieberman who saw Lewinsky as a growing problem in the White House and transferred her to a job in the Pentagon. [STARR, p. 104] Presidential assistant Sidney Blumenthal was also one of those accused of lying about the Lewinsky scandal. [HOROWITZ, D., 1999, p. 240]

“During Ms. Lewinsky’s first Oval Office encounter with Mr. Clinton,” notes the (Jewish) Forward in a review of her own book, “he asks what her name is. She replies, ‘Jewish.’” Lewinsky also compared her problems in the limelight of the Presidential sex scandal to Holocaust victims, Ann Frank, and Hannah Senesh, a Jewish heroine who parachuted into Nazi-held territory. [GITELL, S., 3-12-99, p. 1]

“As Monicagate has morphed from a sex scandal to a national fixation to a constitutional crisis,” noted the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “Jews have been there at every major turn – whether as Clinton’s confidants, steadfast defenders, repairers of the breach, or other bit players.” [KURTZMAN, p. 3] Originally, Clinton “denied the affair, acting on the advice of his political adviser, Dick Morris, a Jew to whom Clinton has turned for guidance at some of the most trying moments of his political career. Morris, who took his own flogging in the media for a sex scandal with a prostitute, advised Clinton to acknowledge nothing, citing a poll that found the public would forgive him for adultery, but not perjury or obstruction of justice.” [KURTZMAN, p. 3] Jewish senator Joseph Lieberman, the only Orthodox Jew in Congress, was the first to attack Clinton in Congress for the scandal. (Lieberman had raised $2 million for Clinton’s election in 1992). [BESSER, J., 11-13-92, p. 34] Another, Robert Wexler, was Clinton’s “staunchest defender in Congress.” Other Jews on the House Judiciary Committee who “played a key role in trying to paint the proceedings as a partisan witch hunt,” included Howard Berman, Jerrold Nadler, Steve Rothman, and Charles Schumer, and Barney Frank. Even the prosecutor of the Clinton sex scandal investigation, Kenneth Starr, has a Jewish wife. [KLAIDMAN, D., 1998, p. 35]

The aforementioned Dick Morris, was billed on the cover of his own 1997 book about himself as “President Clinton’s chief strategist,” a careerist behind-the-scenes propagandist and chameleon who writes that “sometimes I vote Democrat and sometimes Republican.” White House insider, he has voted throughout his life with the political conviction of a ping-pong ball – for Democratic presidential candidates Hubert Humphrey, George McGovern, and Jimmy Carter, then to Republicans Ronald Reagan and George Bush, and then back to Democrat Clinton. [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. 19] “I had no agenda,” he notes about deciding to work at Clinton’s side, “other than victory.” [MORRIS, R., 1997, p. 22] In 1996 an editor at Time magazine, Walter Isaacson (also Jewish) told Morris that he was going to be featured on the journal’s cover, with the heading “THE MAN INSIDE THE PRESIDENT’S MIND.” Time, says Morris, was also considering a “caricature of Clinton with a hinge in his head and an opening, with a cartoon on me standing in his brain – actually in his brain … [Isaacson called later and] told me that the final cover would show me sitting on Clinton’s shoulder, not in his head and that the heading would be THE MAN WHO HAS THE PRESIDENT’S EAR … While I was talking to Time and to the president, the prostitute whom I’d been seeing for a year was on the balcony outside my door.” [MORRIS, R., 1997, p. 322-323]

Early in Morris’s career, he was an adviser to Jewish senator Howard Metzenbaum, a victor in Ohio in 1976. “Metzenbaum,” says Morris, “had taken such extensive deductions on his tax returns that in 1969 he paid no taxes at all despite an income of $241,000. Ruthless and determined to buy the Senate seat with his personal fortune, he made quite a contrast to the honorable but reserved incumbent, the grandson of President William Howard Taft. Our basic campaign was that Taft was too nice to be a senator, that you needed to send a tough, mean guy to Washington to deal with the big oil companies and government bureaucrats.” [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. 45-46]

Morris wrote Clinton’s speech at the Democratic National Convention in 1996. [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. 330] “The President’s chief strategist” notes that his own six-member “media team” consisted of “Squier, Knapp, Schoen, Steinberg, and Freedman [and Penn]” – at least half of these are Jewish names. Of these, Tom Friedman was Morris’s “chief of staff.” “Team member” Doug Schoen was also a political consultant to Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and “when Shimon Peres took office [after Rabin’s assassination],” notes Morris, “he kept Schoen’s services, without, I gather, understanding at first the pivotal role Schoen was playing in the Clinton presidency. [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. 332, 103, 256]

Here are some other Morris comments, a man who always had the ear of America’s President:

“Everything else I have written [before this book] was a speech, an ad, a memo, a tract – all text with a mission to convert, a goal to persuade.” [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. xiii]

“I did not let [the prostitute] eavesdrop on my conversations with the president on an extension phone. What I did, when I let my inflated ego get the better of me, was to put my phone to her ear for a moment or two so she could hear his voice. I had behaved in a similarly immature way with my brother-in-law and my uncle. It was just a stupid thing to do.” [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. xvii]

“[Considering popular preacher Billy Graham as a speaker at the Democratic National Convention] I worried about how Jews and others would react.” [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. 325]

“[President Clinton] increasingly saw me not as a political medicine man but as an adviser who could develop programmatic ideas to express concretely his idea of where he wanted to lead America.” [MORRIS, D., 1997, p. 324]

The aforementioned Congressman Barney Frank, brother of White House Communications Director Ann Lewis, was likewise no surprise at Clinton’s side in the direction that the President “wanted to lead America.” Frank, elected from the tolerant blue-collar, largely Catholic Massachusetts town of Fall River, had survived his own sensational sex expose in 1989. Frank, noted Newsweek then, “came under fire for his relationship with a male prostitute. The case raises new questions about the private conduct of public officials.” Frank, “darling of the Democratic Party’s left wing,” met hooker Stephen L. Gobie by answering a gay newspaper “personal” ad which read “hot bottom plus large endowment equals a good time.” [WINNEKER, 1998] “His real difficulty,” observed Newsweek, “is explaining how he came to hire Gobie as a chauffeur and personal assistant, why he wrote supportive letters to Gobie’s parole officer, and how Gobie wound up using Frank’s home for commercial sex.” [MORGENTHAU, 1989, p. 14] Gobie was also a “convicted child pornographer and drug dealer.” Especially troubling too, noted Newsweek, was Frank’s long-term pattern of behavior: “Until recently, Frank was often seen in public with young hustlers described by more responsible gays as ‘Provincetown trash.’” [MORGENTHAU, 1989, p. 14] “Frank,” noted Washington’s Capitol Style magazine, “was confronting charges that he not only solicited a male prostitute, but knowingly permitted a brothel to be operated from his Capitol Hill apartment and improperly intervened with probation officers on behalf of a convicted felon. The allegations were so salacious that few politicians could have survived them.” [WINNEKER, 1998] Frank survived; confessing many of the charges against him, he was merely reprimanded by Congress and elected by Fall River voters to a sixth term.

While under public siege during the President’s own embarrassment, Clinton’s “most extensive confessional” was at a national prayer breakfast in which he “turned to the Yom Kippur liturgy. He opened up Gates of Repentance … and read a passage about the challenge of penitence and changing one’s ways … In December, just days before he was impeached, Clinton again turned to Israel, this time traveling to the Jewish state for a three-day visit. Some were baffled when he didn’t cut the trip short and fly home to fight for his political survival.” [KURTZMAN, p. 3]

Wall Street Journal reporter Tom King, in a biography of Jewish media mogul David Geffen, even “credits Geffen as the scriptwriter of Clinton’s ‘inappropriate sexual relations’ speech to the nation during the Lewinsky affair.” And Geffen’s moral credentials for such work? “When [Yoko] Ono rang him shortly after [Beatle John] Lennon was shot, Geffen had to prise himself away from male prostitute in his bedroom to get to the hospital – a story he delighted in retelling over the years.” [BOYD, B., 3-4-2000] (On the other end of the political spectrum, Frank Luntz “helped write Newt Gingrich’s Contract with America speech” and Lisa Schiffen “wrote Vice President [Dan] Quayle’s famous ‘Murphy Brown family values’ speech.” Both of these people too are Jewish. [FRIEDMAN, M., June/Sept 1999, p. 110]

Tom King, in his biography of Geffen, also notes:

“Geffen eagerly answered the call when President Clinton asked him for feedback on his proposal to end the ban on homosexuals in the military … Geffen … put the art department at Geffen Records on the job of creating newspaper ads advocating the overturning of the ban … Geffen, whom had escaped military service in Vietnam by meekly admitting he was homosexual, could not understand why anyone would want to serve in the military.” [KING, T., 2000, p. 492-493]

(Clinton’s wife, Hillary, also embarked upon her own political career in 1999, looking to garner a few more Jewish votes in her run for the Senate from New York – her campaign spokesman was Howard Wolfson – by letting it be known that she had a Jewish “step-grandfather” named Max Rosenberg. For that matter, the 1988 Democratic presidential candidate, Michael Dukakis, had a Jewish wife, Kitty. Ms. Dukakis, appointed to the United States Holocaust Memorial Council, writes that she had a “preoccupation with Israel. By 1979, I’d been to the Holy Land three times.” [DUKAKIS, K., 1990, p. 143] She eventually changed her mind about a planned trip to Cuba because “in a United Nations vote against Israel equating Zionism with racism, Cuba had cast its vote with the majority; I felt I could not in all good conscience go to a country that censured Israel.” [DUKAKIS, K., p. 158] One of current Vice-President Al Gore’s daughter’s also has a Jewish husband. Jewish New Age feminist Naomi Wolf was also brought into the 2000 Gore presidential campaign, earning $15,000 a month to advise on his image. Media jokes emphasized her efforts to remodel the presidential hopeful into an “Alpha Male,” emerging from Clinton’s shadow.) [ORIN, D., 7-6-2000, p. 21]

Born to a rich Jewish family in Beverly Hills, Monica Lewinsky and her lawyer Ginsburg have been to Israel “many times.” [GREENBERG, p. 23] Lewinsky’s mother, Marcia, has written a column for the Hollywood Reporter and, using the pseudonym Marcia Lewis, wrote a “saucy celebrity biography” about the private lives of male opera stars. Divorced from Monica’s father, at the time of her daughter’s scandal Marcia was engaged to R. Peter Strauss (also Jewish), a New York media executive who owns radio stations and newspapers in the upstate Hudson valley. [STONE, A, USA, 1-28-98, p. A6] His family owned Macy’s department store and his late wife was a member of the New York Times-owning Sulzberger family. While Monica landed her intern post with the help of Walter Kaye, before the scandal story broke Lewinsky was provided another job in public relations at Revlon, a company controlled by Jewish billionaire and chum of Michael Milken, Ronald Perelman. [NEWSWEEK, ISIKOFF, p. 31-42] (In 1995 President Clinton and his wife spent a vacation at the Perelman ranch in Wyoming, the same hosts who had earlier held a fundraising party for the President at the Perelman’s Palm Beach home. [WECHSLER, p. 11])

While the mainstream American press completely ignored the Jewish dimensions of the scandal, the ethnic media that expressly served the Jewish community consistently highlighted not only the fact that Lewinsky was Jewish, but also the fortuitous timing of the sex expose, just when Clinton was preparing to forcibly intercede in the stalled and embittered Israeli-Palestinian peace process, in opposition to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu’s reneging on early agreements of land withdrawals from Palestinian areas.

The Jewish Forward (New York), the Jewish Week (New York), the Jerusalem Report (Israel), and the Jewish Chronicle (England) all immediately noted Lewinsky’s status in the world Jewish community as a “Queen Esther” (Queen Esther, in Biblical tradition, saved the Jewish people from destruction from their nemesis, Haman). (Both the Jewish Chronicle and the Jewish Week published photographs of a billboard campaign in Israel featuring an image of President Clinton and a caption saying, “We support you, friend.”)

A Jerusalem Report headline beamed “Monica Lewinsky: Bibi’s Queen Esther?” (Bibi was former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu’s nickname. In 1993 he faced his own sex scandal in the Jewish state.) [HIRSCHBERG, P., 4-22-93] Leonard Fein in the Forward noted that:

“Even if some observers from within our own community hadn’t compared Monica Lewinsky to Queen Esther, the idea is that just as the President was preparing to dump on Israel, she whispered sweet Zionist phrases in his ear, or maybe the idea is simply that by pushing him into scandal, she rendered him politically impotent – the Jewish threads of the story would have been intriguing. The sturdiest thread has been provided by Bill Ginsburg, Ms. Lewinsky’s lawyer who, in an interview with Israel’s Yediot Ahronot, allowed that neither he nor his client, devoted Jews, had any interest in bringing down a President who had been ‘so good to Israel.’ The reporter: Should Monica go to Israel and escape the pressures she’s under now? Ginsburg: Not while the proceedings are still under way. But if, when it’s all over, she wants to live in Israel, that might be a wonderful idea.” [FEIN, MONICA, p. 7]

The Jewish Chronicle noted:

“A nationally prominent Orthodox spokesman calls Monica Lewinsky … ‘a modern day Queen Esther,’ and he is only half-kidding. A Northeastern Chabad rabbi says, straight-faced, that Ms. Lewinsky has, as far as they are concerned, removed the White House as a deciding factor in Mideast Peace, at least for now. Because President Clinton’s personal involvement was the one thing keeping the moribund peace talks moving, hopes for a near-term breakthrough are now near zero. Hello [Israeli] land, goodbye peace. Last week was, according to many a pundit, supposed to be a watershed in the troubled tenure of Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu. He came to Washington a wounded leader, expecting intense pressure from a determined Bill Clinton. Enter Ms. Lewinsky and ‘Zippergate,’ and the Middle East abruptly vanished from our screens. The pressure was off.” [J CHRON, p. 2]

A third editorial, this one in the Jewish Week, entitled, “Monica, a Modern Queen Esther?,” began:

“Did you know that Monica Lewinsky is an agent for Mossad, the Israeli equivalent of the CIA? That’s the charge in some of the Arab press, which asserts that the alleged affair between the former White House intern and President Clinton was a Zionist plot to distract attention from the Mideast and take the pressure off the Netanyahu government. ‘Why did it come at the end of Clinton’s meetings with Netanyahu and before his meetings with Arafat?’ wondered a columnist for the Palestinian daily, Al-Ayyam. And Sheikh Ahmad Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas who was released from an Israeli prison last year, reasoned that ‘the Zionist lobby and world Zionism creates disasters for anyone who may cause it problems.’ So much for any lessening of Arab paranoia about Jewish clout. On the other hand, some supporters of Netanyahu were referring to Lewinsky as a modern-day Queen Esther – a beautiful young Jewish woman who, through her sexual appeal to the nation’s leader, helped save her people. More than a bit far-fetched, of course, but the description was reflective of the feeling among some Israelis that the sex scandal involving Clinton has taken Netanyahu off the hot seat in terms of complying with U.S. requests from withdrawing from additional West Bank land. There was also speculation in Israel that Clinton may resign, elevating Al Gore to the presidency. Gore is considered even more supportive of Israel than Clinton.” [JEWISH WEEK, 1-30-98]

“Gore,” noted the Jerusalem Report, “engaged a reputation as one of Israel’s best supporters during his 14 years in the House and Senate.” He once told a Jewish gathering that included Israeli Prime Minister Benyamin Netanyahu that “the United States will never pressure Israel to do what it doesn’t want to do.” [BRODER, J., 2-19-98, p. 36] In 2000, Gore during his campaign for president, named an Orthodox Jew, Joseph Lieberman, former head of the Democratic Leadership Council, as his vice-presidential running mate. Lieberman has been a prominent lobbyist to move the U.S. embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem a move American foreign policy makers have resisted for the past half century. [KURTZMAN, D., 6-2-99, p. 3] Upon Lieberman’s selection, Rabbi Steven Dworken, Executive President of the Orthodox Council of America, declared that anti-Semitism “doesn’t show up in the polls, but it shows in the voting booth. It will force Americans to look themselves in the mirror and say, ‘I am not an anti-Semite,’ or to admit to themselves, ‘Yes, I am a bigot.’” [LATTIN, D., 8-8-2000, p. A13] Among those quickly lambasted as an anti-Semite was Wilbert Tatum, the publisher of New York City’s African-American newspaper, the Amsterdam News. Blunting noting the Jewish context of American politics, Tatum editorialized that “America is being sold to the highest bidder.” [PR NEWSWIRE, 8-16-2000] One news report also noted that “not only was his active Harvard pupil and friend of 35 years [Al Gore] for president, but the fiercely pro-Israel publisher [Martin Peretz, of the New Republic] got to watch his Jewish buddy of two decades, Lieberman, take the number two spot.” [KURTZ, H., 8-20-2000, p. A12]

The selection of Lieberman as an Orthodox Jew on the traditionally liberal Democratic ticket highlights the usual double standard of evaluation whenever, and wherever, Jews are concerned. What one wonders, would the many homosexual rights, women’s rights, and other organizations say if they had access to open public discourse about the world view of Orthodox Judaism? Lieberman’s conservative religious views in many ways parallel Christians Pat Robertson or Jerry Falwell. But as Jewish journalist Paul Greenberg, “Pulitzer-prize winning editorial page editor of the Arkansas Democrat Gazette,” observed:

“One suspects that, if Senator Lieberman were an equally committed Baptist or Mormon, many of those now, hailing his nomination would be murmuring darkly about the dangers of the Religious Right. It’ll be interesting to see if the ACLU objects to a fundamentalist on the ticket when he’s a Jewish one.” [GREENBERG, P., 8-9-2000, p. B10]

Jewish professor Deborah Lipstadt notes the Jewish response to Gore’s selection:

“The announcement of the Lieberman selection as Al Gore’s running mate unleashed torrents of joy. When the news first broke, American Jews breathlessly called one another to share the news … We caught our breath and let out a collective whoop. Lieberman is not just any Jew. The prism through which his view of the world is refracted is a Jewish prism.” [LIPSTADT, D., 8-20-2000, p. B3]

What about this “Jewish prism?” Soon after the selection of Lieberman as Al Gore’s running mate, an embarrassing relationship came to light between Lieberman and his uncle, Bernard Manger. As the Houston Chronicle noted,

“When Bernard Manger died in 1995, he left behind a will that disinherited two of his four children from his $48 million estate. The reason: they had married people who weren’t born Jewish. He counted on his nephew to enforce his wishes. His nephew is Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the Democratic vice presidential candidate … As he grew older, Manger became more and more concerned that intermarriage was threatening the existence of the Jewish people.” [KUNTZ, P., 8-27-2000, p. 3]

Both of the spouses of the disinherited children had long converted to Judaism, but “not in the Orthodox fashion Manger would have liked.” Lieberman eventually figured out a way to get the disinherited individuals their cuts of the estate (one of the disinherited children found an “unsigned” document that allegedly claimed that Manger had changed his mind). But, after all, Lieberman is a politician; how could he have politically survived among non-Jews if he fulfilled his uncle’s nakedly racist and anti-Gentile wishes? More troubling, one wonders, why is it that Manger so much trusted Lieberman to fulfill his will? He must have known his nephew’s honest position on Jewish identity issues.
Lieberman has been awarded $75,000 to execute the estate, and is entitled to another $50,000 a year to oversee it. Lieberman’s wife, Hadassah, likewise gets $40,000 a year to manage Manger’s wife’s will. [KUNTZ, P. 8-27-2000, p. 3] Manger’s chauvinist and racist views, as we have witnessed throughout this volume, are not an anomaly; they represent a current in the thinking of large numbers of modern Jewry.

Lieberman also found it necessary to dissimulate Orthodox belief in a related area, publicly saying that it didn’t matter to him as an Orthodox Jew if Jews married non-Jews. This, of course, is merely a politician talking. Rabbi Avi Shafran, of the Agudah Israel of America Orthodox organization, quickly responded, emphasizing that, as any Orthodox Jew knows, there is a “clear and irrevocable Torah prohibition” against Jews marrying non-Jews. Even a Conservative rabbi, Jerome Epstein, noted that “I do believe our tradition is quite clear that Jews are expected to marry Jews.” [JOLKOVSKY, B., 9-20-2000]

During a two hour trip to Baltimore, Lieberman absorbed nearly a million dollars for Democratic campaign coffers. “Organizers estimate that between 60 and 80 percent of the money given tonight will come from the Jewish community,” noted the Baltimore Sun, “…. Lieberman, who according to a DNC spokeswoman has brought in more than $17 million in the two months since his nomination, has energized Jewish supporters across the country.” [WALDRON, T., p. 1B] (Lieberman’s “former top aide,” Micheal Lewin, surfaced in the news later as a consequence of the scandals surrounding the collapse of the notorious Enron company. Lewin had left Lieberman to become a lobbyist for Enron. [MARGASAK, L., L., 1-16-02] (One of the central players in the Enron scandal was Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, also Jewish.)

Other Jews in Al Gore’s intimate political circle have included Marc Greenberg, “senior coordinator for foreign policy in the Gore [for president] campaign,” Steve Grossman, “an informal adviser to Gore” (and the eventual head of AIPAC), Mel Levine, and Nita Lowey, an adviser on abortion issues. [SAMBBER, S., 2-92-2000, p. 8] David Steiner, one-time president of AIPAC and continued board member, is Gore’s “financial consultant.” Another AIPAC board member, Meldon Levine, is another “Gore campaign advisor.” [LAKE, E., 3-21-2000, p. 1] Leon Feurth is Gore’s “longtime national security aide.” Marc Ginsburg co-chaired Gore’s Middle East advisory committee. Joan Spero is an advisor on economic policy and Steven Rabinowitz (who also worked on Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak’s campaign) another Gore “consultant.” (Even Al Gore’s father, Al Gore, Sr., a senator from Tennessee was a partner in the cattle business with corrupt Jewish entrepreneur Armand Hammer. Gore, Sr., was a “loyal friend, who had defended Armand against accusations of attempted bribery on the floor of the U. S. Senate.”) [BLUMAY, C., 1992, p. 57] [See http://ukar.org/gore13.shtml for an outside link to Lubomyr Prytulak’s keen analysis of the deep Gore family link to corrupt Jewish businessman Armand Hammer]

“Key campaign strategists at the [2000] Democratic National Committee in Washington and Gore headquarters in Nashville include general election cam-campaign chairman John Giesser, Josh Wachs, Laurie Moskowitz, Eric Kleinfeld, Deborah Mohile and research director David Ginsburg.” [TUGEND, T., 8-9-2000, p. 17] The law firm of Manatt, Phelps and Phillips was even chosen to represent the 2000 Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. The CEO of that company is Irving Phillips, and its “principal liaison” to the convention was Lisa Specht, earlier winner of the American Jewish Committee’s “Learned Hand Award.” [BUSINESS WIRE, 6-7-2000] Two (Eli Broad, David Geffen) of the three people “that brought the [2000] Democratic Convention to Los Angeles” were also Jewish, as were both of the Convention co-chairs, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer. [TUGEND, T., 8-9-2000, p. 17]

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency noted the Jewish Democratic gatherings in Los Angeles for the National Convention:

“President Clinton, addressing nearly 4,000 Jews at an outdoor party on Sunday afternoon, quoted [Jewish] comedian Red Buttons that ‘in Los Angeles, the Democrats are changing their theme song from ‘Happy Days Are Here Again’ to [the Jewish song] ‘Hava Nagila.’” Senator John Rockefeller (D-W. Va.) keynoted an elegant fund-raiser for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee on Saturday night and wound up a somewhat disjointed speech by declaring, ‘I wish I were a Jew.’” [TUGEND, T., 8-14-00]

In 1999, St. Martin’s Press published a book by British journalist Gordon Thomas about Israel’s Mossad organization. (Major newspapers, including the Washington Post, New York Times, and Los Angeles Times, ignored it). Thomas, a veteran of 40 years of worldwide reporting, asserted (from his extensive interviews with a variety of intelligence operatives) that Danny Yotam, the Inspector General of Mossad, had nearly 30 hours of tapes of President Clinton having telephone sex with Monica Lewinsky and they were considered as leverage to blackmail Clinton into reigning in the FBI’s search for the Israeli mole (or moles), the aforementioned “Mega,” in the upper echelons of the American government. Such an assertion, of course, is impossible to prove. The fact that Clinton had phone sex with Lewinsky, however, was documented by Clinton prosecutor Kenneth Star; it is also public knowledge that Clinton warned her that they had probably been wiretapped by a “foreign government.” As TV journalist Barbara Walters noted: “There was something like 60 different phone calls. There is a lot of phone calls. There was phone sex. It was part of the recklessness of the whole act. He was calling from the White House. The fact that he would do this from the beginning two or three times a week – this is a tremendous chance to take in addition to everything else.” [WHITE HOUSE BULLETIN, 3-3-99; AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 3-3-99; GURDON/DAVIES, 3-4-99, p. 14]

For Hollywood’s part during the Lewinsky scandal, the mass media widely noted with wonder the curious timing of how “art imitates life” in the cases of the then-current motion pictures “Wag the Dog,” directed by Barry Levinson, and “Primary Colors,” directed by another Jewish filmmaker, Mike Nichols. The first film depicted a President of the United States who cuts a deal with a Hollywood producer to create a fake war to detract attention from the President’s womanizing. [In real life, Clinton faced both the Lewinsky scandal and a possible attack on Iraq at the same time]. Primary Colors – based on a book by Newsweek columnist Joe Klein – is about a southern governor who is mired in sexual scandals. John Travolta, as the governor, noted the Washington Post, “mimics Clinton’s style, mannerisms and voice.” [WELKOS, p. A19]

This was not the only sex controversy Clinton had involving a Jewish bedmate, laced with political intrigue. In 1997, a political influence scandal broke open over Larry Lawrence’s grave at Arlington National Cemetery. Lawrence, a San Diego real estate developer who had donated millions of dollars over the years to the Democratic Party, was the Ambassador to Switzerland at the time of his death. He was also Jewish. “A firestorm of criticism erupted yesterday,” noted the Boston Globe, “over allegations that the Clinton administration waived military rules so that major campaign donors could be buried at Arlington National Cemetery.” [HOHLER, B., p. A1] “Congressional investigations,” wrote the New York Daily News, “are trying to determine why [Lawrence’s] lies went undetected when he was named ambassador to Switzerland in 1994, and why he got a special waiver for burial at Arlington with a push from President Clinton.” [GOLDSCHLAG, 10] Only after his death it came to light that Lawrence had built elaborate lies about being a wounded military hero as a Merchant Marine officer – a career that in no way existed. “When he testified before Congress during his 1993 confirmation hearings for his ambassadorship,” noted the Boston Globe, “[Lawrence] told them of being thrown through the air after a torpedo slammed into his ship, the Horace Bushnell. It was a lie, outraging members of Congress and decorated veterans, that led to Lawrence’s removal from Arlington last week.” [FARRAGHER, p. A14]

Soon thereafter, Arianna Huffington, a syndicated columnist, was sued by Lawrence’s wife for stating in a column that her husband’s ambassadorship was a payoff for Lawrence’s silence about an affair between his wife and President Clinton. Huffington appeared on CNN to defend her accusation, noting that lawyers for Paula Jones [a woman suing Clinton for sexual harassment] subpoenaed Lawrence’s wife, Sheila, “to ask her about the possibility of a payoff between an alleged affair and the pact that the man who was so completely unqualified to be ambassador would fabricate his military record, [and] who had dozens of pending disputes with the IRS, was nevertheless appointed to a preeminent ambassadorial position.” Huffington also asserted that she had “at least two dozen sources of people who talked about the alleged payoff … – former employees of the Lawrences who had personal knowledge of an alleged affair.” A former State Department employee, Christina Alexander, also “filed [other] charges against the Lawrences with the State Department under the Management Fraud and Waste Act.” For her part, Sheila Lawrence was also appointed “without any qualifications” by President Clinton to the Conservative Union, an environmental organization. [CNN, Burden of Proof, 3-9-98]

(Yet another Jewish politician, Madeline Kunin [a former governor of Vermont] replaced Lawrence as the ambassador to Switzerland).
In 1999, Rabbi Daniel Lapin noted with concern the repeated Jewish-based governmental scandals in the Clinton administration:

“The scandals in this administration have brought to public attention an entirely different group of Jews, from Monica Lewinsky, whose sexual proclivities have made me burn with shame, to all the spinning defense lawyers on national TV night after night, from Bernard Schwartz of Loral, who apparently sold missile technology to China [discussed elsewhere in this volume], to Larry Lawrence, who falsified his war record to be buried in Arlington National Cemetery. This is a new group of Jewish faces, a whole different generation from that of Einstein, and Cardozo, Salk and Buber. Frankly, they strike me as arrogant, shameless, and very foolish. They have all the answers, or so they think, but the people who see them on TV night after night know better.” [LAPIN, D., 1999, p. 42]

On the Republican side of Jewish politicking, in 1972 Seymour Lipset noted that “some of the most pro-Israel senators are among the most conservative Republicans in Congress.” [LIPSET, in COX, p. 196] Among Richard Nixon’s high-level Jewish appointees were Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the chairman of the President’s Council for Economic Advisors, Herbert Stein, and the chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts, Ronald Berman. Ronald Ziegler was Nixon’s press secretary. After Watergate, Len Garment, a Jewish liberal Democrat, became Nixon’s lawyer. [HICKS, J., 3-29-97, p. B1] Among President Ford’s Jewish appointees was Edward Levi, the Attorney General. Among George Bush’s Jewish appointees was David Kessler, Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration. Bill Kristol was the Chief of Staff for Vice President Dan Quayle in the George Bush administration. The chairman of the Board of Directors of the Barbara Bush Foundation for Family Literacy was also Jewish: Joan Abrahamson. “Most of the senior Middle East positions [in the Bush administration] are Jews,” noted Joyce Starr in 1990. [STARR, J., 1990, p. 247]

In 1999, in the early stages of the Republican presidential primary campaign, the former president’s son, candidate George W. Bush, the governor of Texas, “surrounded himself with a number of Jewish advisers, including Indianapolis mayor Stephen Goldsmith; Josh Belton, policy director for the campaign, and foreign policy hawk Richard Perle. [ROTH, B., 10-11-99] Ari Fleischer was Bush’s spokesman to the mass media. (When Bush became president, Fleischer became his press secretary. Fleischer is “active in a group of Jewish congressional staffers who study with the Lubavitch Chasidic movement’s Washington representative, Rabbi Levi Shemtov.” [FORWARD, THE FORWARD FIFTY, 2000/2001] In fact, Fleischer “was an early leader and co-president of Chabad’s Capitol Jewish Forum.” He was awarded Chabad’s Young Leadership award in October 2001. [BESSER, J., 10-26-01, p. 30] Note Chabad’s racist tenets at http://jewishtribalreview.org/cha.htm Bush had gone on a tour of Israel the year earlier, under the auspices of the National Jewish Coalition. “Gov. Bush Shores Up Image with Jews,” headlined the Jewish Telegraphic Agency. “By Visiting Israel.” “The relationship between the United States and Israel is a very special relationship,” said the candidate, “It will always be that way.” [DORF, M., 12-7-98] Alfred Lerner, the Jewish CEO and chairman of credit card giant MBNA, “was the single largest corporate contributor to George W. Bush during the last election cycle.” [MOTHER JONES, 5-3-01] A rabbi, Victor Weissberg, was even selected to be the religious leader to give the invocation on the first night of the 2000 Republican National Convention. [ZACHARIA, J., 10-3-2000] This is not surprising, especially when two of the three co-chairmen of the Republican National Convention were Jewish, David Cohen and Brian Roberts. [FELDMAN, S., 6-22-2000, p. 12]

The New Jersey Jewish News noted

“Cliff Sobel, finance chair of the Bush for President campaign in New Jersey, says the Republican National Committee’s platform subcommittee on foreign policy went out of its way to ‘make sure its positions were right from Israel’s standpoint.’ Although the subcommittee, of which Sobel was a member, confronted issues in “Japan, China, Ireland, and elsewhere, those were dealt with differently than the issues in Israel. Regarding the Middle East, with Israel at its center, there was a uniformity of opinion in determining what is in the best interests of Israel and the United States – always considered a common interest, Sobel said. This predisposition, he added, was ‘opposed to special interests within the framework of some other countries.” [FRIEDLAND, E., 8-10-02, p. 8]

In August of the same year, the Forward, a Jewish journal, noted in a headline the depth of the Jewish contingent in the Republican Party: “Republican Convention Gives Key Roles to Jews.” “The ‘who’s who’ of Jews in the camp of the Republican presidential nominee, George Bush of Texas,” said the article, “reaches far into the inner circle, including senior adviser and spokesman Ari Fleischer, policy director Joshua Belton and foreign policy advisers Dov Zakheim, Richard Perle and Paul Wolfowitz, all former Reagan aides. A former mayor of Indianapolis Stephen Goldsmith, is Mr. Bush’s top domestic policy adviser, while the campaign’s counsel is lawyer Benjamin Ginsberg. Jews also hold top spots in the Republican National Committee and its platform committee: the RNC’s campaign finance director is a former ambassador to Australia, Mel Sembler; its communication director is Clifford May and its platform committee is headed by Mitch Bainwol. Top fundraisers include Eric Javits, the chairman of an elite group called the Republican Eagles, and Cheryl Halpern of the Republican Jewish Coalition.” [DONADIO, R., 8-4-2000]

The Forward interviewed Kalman Sporn, the youngest member of the Republican Eagles, who observed that

“The Republican leadership recognizes, rightly or wrongly, that Jews are the key to raising millions for their political interests. To sustain that support, they know they need to support Jewish concerns, and number one, the principal way that Republican leadership has demonstrated support for Jews has been through its unyielding support for the state of Israel.” [DONADIO, R., 8-4-2000]
“Jewish Republicans,” notes the Baltimore Jewish Times,

“provide a nagging reminder to the Republican congressional leaders that support for Israel is not the exclusive property of the Democrats. Jewish campaign contributors, an important part of the party’s money base, do more than just nag … Many young, conservative Jews serve as staffers to Republican members of Congress, and some say their numbers are growing … The presence on Mr. Bush’s campaign team of a handful of well-known Jewish activists and the critical role of some top Jewish givers, [some] believe, will pay off when Mr. Bush puts his government together, should he win the election.” [BESSER, J., 7-28-2000, p. 25]

In February 2002, Jewish speechwriter David Frum was identified as the author of Bush’s controversial “Axis of Evil” speech, in which Iraq, Iran, and North Korea were identified as “evil” entities and implicitly threatened. [NOAH, T., 2-5-02] In the wake of taking credit for the speech, Frum resigned his post. The Asia Times subsequently editorialized about the profound political power he and other Jews in powerful foreign policy positions represented:

“White House speechwriter David Frum who coined the incendiary ‘axis of evil’ moniker used by President Bush is leaving Bush’s employ for the neo-conservative American Enterprise Institute (AEI). It seems a perfect fit … The AEI has long been a source of provocation, particularly for intelligence professionals at the State Department and the Central Intelligence Agency (IA). The staunchly unilateralist AEI, and its foreign policy honcho, Richard Perle [also Jewish] have never been so powerful. Much to the frustration of Secretary of State Colin Powell and Washington’s European and Arab allies, the administration has embraced virtually all of the AEI’s policy positions on the Middle East, including the right-wing [Israeli] Likud Party’s opposition to the Oslo peace process for Israel and Palestine … Unlike the ‘axis of evil,’ members of the ‘axis of incitement’ share a passionate belief in the inherent goodness and redemptive mission of the United States; the moral cowardice of ‘liberals’ and ‘European elites’; existential necessity of supporting Israel in the shadow of the Holocaust and in the face of ‘implacable hatred,’ as Frum has written, of Palsetinains, Arabs and Muslims, and the primacy of military power. Their reach within the administration extends far. At the Pentagon, they include Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz [also Jewish], whose relationship with Perle goes back 30 years, and Undersecretary for Policy Douglas Feith [also Jewish] whose pro-Likud sentiments led him to denounce the 1978 Camp David accords between Israel and Egypt as an Israeli sell-out.” [ASIA TIMES, 3-9-02]

(Perle has an office in the Pentagon today as chairman of the Defense Policy Board. Former U.S. Congressman Paul Findley once noted that an “FBI wiretap recorded Perle discussing classified information with someone at the Israeli embassy.” “In 1983,” adds Grace Halsell, “newspapers reported that Perle had received substantial payments for representing an Israeli arms manufacturer while he was working for the senator. Despite this background, Perle received the Reagan administration appointment as assistant secretary of defense. He later resigned from that post to write and speak for Israeli interests.”) [HALSELL, G., MARCH 1993, p. 9]

Outside government, Asia Times also notes the “axis of incitement” extends to include propaganda from the Jewish Institute for National Security, as well as Jewish journalists Charles Krauthammer, A. M. Rosenthal, and former Jewish “CIA Mideast operative” Michael Ledeen. [ASIA TIMES, 3-9-02]

In the new American governmental propaganda wars, post 9-11 attack, to socialize Arab youth to Western/Israeli interests, and spread American cultural imperialism, Norman Pattiz, a Jewish radio mogul, headed the project. Pattiz, noted New Yorker magazine,

“is the founder and chairman of Westwood One, the $3.5 billion company that is the country’s largest distributor of commercial radio programming. Starting next month, he will oversee an innovative radio network aimed at bringing American values and pop culture to Arabs in the Middle East. The project, which has a budget of thirty million dollars, is being launched by the U.S. Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees international government-sponsored programs. Pattiz [was] appointed to the board by President Clinton ... Pattiz also hired Casey Kassem’s producer, Bert Kleinman, to give the station a more Top Forty style. ‘Will the [Muslim] religious extremists like it?’ Pattiz asked himself the other day. ‘Probably not. But you’ve got to go after the hearts and minds you can get.’ He has a lot of faith in the power of American pop culture. ‘After all,’ he said, ‘it was MTV that brought down the Berlin Wall.” [MAYER, J., 2-18-02]

In May 2000, in the heat of the American presidential campaign, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency noted the sameness, on at least one issue, of the Democratic and Republican candidates:

“Whoever the next president of the United States might be, the pro-Israel community seems to like what he has to say. Then again the messages Texas governor George W. Bush and Vice President Al Gore conveyed to delegates at this week’s annual policy conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee seemed indistinguishable …

At the end of his speech, Gore brought the crowd to its feet when he said safeguarding Israel was not just his policy, but is ‘in my heart, in my conscience and in my bones and in my soul.” [SAMBER, S., 5-24-2000]

And if George W. Bush rival John McCain had won the 2000 Republican primary? “I have known the senator [McCain] for many years,” said Jewish McCain fundraiser Marvin Jubas, “No one in this town is more aware of his integrity and character than I. Nobody is more pro-Israel than the senator and those of us associated with AIPAC know that if we really need someone, we turn to John.” [TUGEND, T., 2-16-2000, p. 8] [McCain’s 2002 speech to AIPAC: http://jewishtribalreview.org/mccain.htm]
Joseph Gildenhorn, also Jewish, and formerly the U.S. Ambassador to Switzerland, also headed the George W. Bush campaign in Washington DC. [FORDWARD, 6-18-99, p. 15] Joel Strom is the chairman for Bush volunteers in the crucial state of California. [TUGEND, T., 2-16-2000, p. 8] In 1999, Jewish billionaire Michael Dell, of Dell Computers, was named chairman of a Bush “high-tech advisory council.” [MARKS, M., 7-15-99, p. 6] Even in the American hinterlands of Utah, Jewish real estate developer John Price “has long been one of the nation’s most generous political donors and the biggest Utah donor to the national Republican Party.” [KNUDSON, M., 3-23-97] With the 2001 bombing of Afghanistan, the Los Angeles Times noted that Bush’s Secretary of State Colin Powell “announced that he had appointed Richard Haass, director of policy planning at the State Department, as his special coordinator to explore with United Nations and key countries the issue of Afghanistan’s future.” [RICHTER/PADDOCK, 10-16-01, p. A13]

Likewise in 1999, on the Democratic side, like virtually all modern day politicians, presidential candidate Bill Bradley felt the same need for Jewish pre-eminence in his campaign. The Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles noted that he “has built up considerable Jewish friends and political support. Several of his top aides are Jewish: Doug Berman; his campaign chairman; Gina Clantz, his campaign manager; spokesman Eric Hauser; and Marcia Aronoff, a top adviser.” [SHAPIRO, M., 11-19-99] Even political maverick Pat Buchanan (widely decried by the Jewish community as an “anti-Semite,” particularly for his unusually sharp public stands about Zionist influence in Washington), announced in 1999 that Rabbi Aryeh Spero was a “Senior Adviser” to his presidential campaign. One of his four national co-chairmen for the 1996 Buchanan for President Campaign was Rabbi Yahuda Levin. [BRODER, J., 3-12-96, p. A5] In 2000, Buchanan’s main rival for the Reform party presidential nomination was John Hagelin. Leonard Goldman, “Hagelin’s faction’s attorney, said that if the FEC rules in Buchanan’s favor [for government funding], he will seek a court injunction to freeze the money and file a lawsuit.” [THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL, 8-14-00, p. A4] Hagelin’s vice presidential running mate, Nat Goldhaber, was also Jewish.

When Massachusetts governor Michael Dukakis challenged George Bush for the presidency in 1988, the head of his presidential finance committee was also Jewish, Alan Levanthol. [UPI, 4-20-87] (That year, in his Dukakis’ home state, Jewish businessman Sheldon Adelman made the news for giving both Democrat Dukakis and Republican Bush over $80,000). [BEAM, A., 11-4-88, p. 67] Dukakis’s campaign manager, Susan Estrich, was also Jewish. In 1996, Simon Fireman, also Jewish, vice chairman of the Robert Dole for President Campaign and formerly the head of an organization called Massachusetts Democrats for Reagan, was forced to “pay a record $6 million in fines for funneling illegal contributions through his employees to the Dole camp and other political causes.” [COMMERCIAL-APPEAL, 7-11-96, p. 4A] “His plan,” noted the Boston Globe, “was to raise enough money for Dole so that Dole would consider him for an ambassadorship if he won.” [FLINT, A., 7-22-96] Fireman was also that year’s Hebrew Center “Man of the Year.” [PATRIOT-LEDGER, 7-12-96, p. 8]

On the Republican side of Massachusetts politics, in 1996 James Rappaport was re-elected as the chairman of the state Republican Party. At the same time, Ron Kaufman, also from Massachusetts and formerly the Political Director in the White House for the George Bush presidential administration, was the GOP National Committeeman. [KLEMOVICH, D., 4-12-96, p. 7; DISTASO, J., 1-14-97, p. 6]

Elsewhere, within government bureaucracy itself, in 1985, the Jewish Week noted Dov S. Zakheim, the Pentagon’s undersecretary for planning and resources in Ronald Reagan’s tenure as President (and also an ordained rabbi), [STARR, J., 1990, p. 79] adding that “Zakheim … is not alone as a Jew in a sensitive position dealing with U.S.-Israel matters. Whether in the Pentagon, the State Department, the Central Intelligence Agency, the White House, the National Security Council, the Justice Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the Congress, there is no shortage of Jews working in very senior and extremely sensitive positions.” [BLITZER, 6-27-86, p. 3]

With George W. Bush’s presidential victory in 2000, he appointed Zakheim – “an ordained – and meticulously observant – Orthodox rabbi as Undersecretary of Defense and Comptroller of the Pentagon … Another [Jew], Paul Wolfowitz, [became] deputy Secretary of Defense, the number two position at the Pentagon.” [SIEFF, M., 3-2-01, p. 5] Wolfowitz, noted the Jewish ethnic magazine Forward as the U.S. invaded Afghanistan, “is the official whose feral-sounding surname and bellicose sound-bites have marked him as the administration’s wild-eyed warmonger, the wooly counterpoint to that suave and sensible diplomat, Secretary of State Colin Powell … He has also emerged … as one of the administration’s leading hawks and one of Israel’s most important allies … Mr. Wolfowitz is also a fixture of the capital’s Jewish circles.”) [KINTISCH, E., 10-12-01, p. 6]

Coming into the Pentagon with Wolfowitz was fellow Jewish activist Douglas Feith. As the Forward further notes:

“Mr. Wolfowitz and his associate Douglas Feith, an undersecretary of defense for policy, are known as among the administration’s most hawkish members when it comes to Israel. With [Secretary of Defense Donald] Rumsfeld, they round out a Defense triumvirate that has often clashed over Israel with Mr. Powell. Speaking to the Jerusalem Post last December, an official of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee commended both Mr. Wolfowitz and Mr. Rumsfeld for their ‘very strong records on Israel.’ Mr. Powell’s team at [the State Department] reportedly fought the nominations of both Mr. Feith and Mr. Wolfowitz.” [KINTISCH, E., 10-12-01, p. 6]

In October 1997, Douglas Feith, with his father, Dalck, were formal guests of honor at a yearly Zionist Organization of America awards dinner, both men heralded by the ZOA as “noted Jewish philanthropists and pro-Israel activists.”
Dalck, who “was active in [far right-wing] Betar, the Zionist youth movement founded by [neo-fascist] Ze’ev Jabotinsky,” received the ZOA’s “special Centennial Award ... for lifetime service to Israel and the Jewish people. His son, Douglas J. Feith, the former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense, will receive the prestigious Louis D. Brandeis Award at the dinner.” [ZIONIST ORG. of AMERICA, 10-13-97]

Upon Feith’s new appointment in the Bush administration in 2001, James Zogby, head of the Arab American Institute, wrote with alarm in an article entitled “A Dangerous Appointment”:

“Douglas J. Feith has been appointed Undersecretary of Policy at the U.S. Department of Defense (DOD). This is one of the Pentagon’s four senior senior posts, charged with ‘all matters concerning the formulation of national security and defense policy and the integration and oversight of DOD policy and plans’ ... This is a powerful position with great influence ... A prolific writer, Feith has left a long paper trail of anti-Arab tracts and diatribes against those who challenge or seek to compromise Israel’s strength and as he defines it, ‘moral superiority’ over the Arabs ... Feith’s law practice in Washington sheds further light on the one-sided nature of his work. His small law firm hs one international affiliate, in Israel. Over two-thirds of all their reported casework involves representing Israeli interests. And, in light of Feith’s new appointment, one of these cases deserves some attention. As described on the firm’s website, Feith ‘represented a leading Israeli armaments manufacturer in establishing joint ventures with leading U.S. aerospace manufacturers for manufacture and sale of missile systems, to the U.S. Department of Defense and worldwide ... Serious questions must be asked whether or not someone with his views and associations can fairly serve in a critical post at the Department of Defense. I, for one, am terrified at the prospect. He is an ideologue with an extreme anti-Arab bias, and his role in the sensitive position of chief architect of U.S. defense policy can, I believe, have grave consequences for the United States and its relations with the entire Arab world.” [ZOGBY, J., 4-16-01]

Marc Grossman, the new Undersecretary of State, told Israeli President Moshe Katsav at a dinner in Washington DC hosted by the Israeli ambassador that “The main relationship between Israel and the United States is rock solid. Making sure Israel has a military edge over the Arabs is a cornerstone of our foreign policy.” [JERUSALEM REPORT, 2001] Bush’s first appointment for Secretary of Labor was Linda Chavez. She is married to Chris Gersten, former Executive Director of the Republican Jewish Coalition. [BESSER, J., 1-5-01] Jamie Rubin is the State Department’s spokesman in the Bush era.

“At the time Pollard [the Jewish American spy for Israel, exposed during the Reagan administration] was trading secrets with the Israelis,” notes the Jewish magazine Moment, “the Secretary of the Navy was John Lehman [also Jewish]. Never before or since was there a more pro-Israel person in that office. The level of co-operation [with Israel] was unprecedented.” [BLOOMFIELD, 4-30-96,
In 1982, the biography of another Jewish naval officer, Admiral Hyman G. Rickover, head of the Navy’s nuclear power program, was published. “It is difficult to find another twentieth-century American,” noted its authors, “who has striven so hard in so many areas of military and civil endeavor. And, especially, one who is doing so has, without elected office, without even accountability to his superiors in government, attained absolute and total control of a large segment of the American defense establishment … [POLMAR/ALLEN, p. 11] … By the 1970s Rickover was practically an honorary member of Congress.” [POLMAR/ALLEN, p. 244]

And what of the likes of a fellow Jew at the heart of the US Navy nuclear program – Israel-lover Alvin Radkowsky? Radowsky, notes the Jerusalem Post, “immigrated to Israel in 1972 after serving as chief scientist of the US Navy nuclear propulsion program for 24 years.” [SIEGEL, J., 6-2-97] Would not such a scientist moving to Iran or Russia, or anywhere else, deservedly raise some eyebrows, and probably the creation of some new laws?

Seymour Hersh notes Israeli power in maneuvering through the American government for what it has needed militarily:

“William Bader, who was serving in 1979 as Assistant Deputy Under-Secretary of Defense for Policy, recalled his frustration at knowing that the Israelis were ‘edging deeper into the overhead’ and not knowing how to stop it. ‘You didn’t know where to complain,’ Bader said. ‘We knew that these guys [the Israelis] had access that went around the colonels and the deputy assistant secretaries.’ If a complaint got to the wrong office, he explained, ‘you might get your head handed back to you.’” [HERSH, S., p. 13-14]

In 1988 the Jewish hunt for anti-Semites among Republicans succeeded in having eight George Bush administration aides “dismissed” – or forced to “resign” – for anti-Semitism. One of them was Frederick Malek, Deputy Chairman of the Republican National Convention. His crime was that in 1971, under orders from President Richard Nixon, he collected a list of Bureau of Labor employees with Jewish-sounding names. Nixon was concerned, says the Jewish Week, with a “Jewish cabal” in that bureau. 13 of 35 top administrators in that department were ascertained to be Jewish. [JEWISH WK, 9-16-88] When Nixon faced the Watergate investigations that eventually drove him from office, two of the three Justice Department prosecutors on his tail were also Jewish. [VOLKMAN, p. 103] With the release to the public of the famous “Nixon tapes” in 1999, London’s Daily Telegraph notes that

“In July 1971 Nixon felt he was undermined by the unexpected release of bad unemployment figures by the Bureau of Labour Statistics. He ordered Charles Colson, a staff member he often used for unpleasant tasks, to investigate the bureau with a view to sacking its Jewish head. On the tapes, Colson lists the names of the leading officials at which Nixon exclaims incredulously, ‘They are all Jews?’ Colson replies: ‘Every one of them. Well, with a couple exceptions.’” [FENTON, B., 10-7-99, p. 24]
In 1981, a Reagan appointee to the Department of Health and Human Services office, Warren Richardson, was dismissed when it was discovered he had a link to the far-right-wing Liberty Lobby organization, a group known to be especially critical of the Jewish community. [VOLKMAN, p. 58] Likewise, in the same year, Ernest Lefever was forced to withdraw his nomination as Assistant Secretary for Human Rights when it was discovered that he had written an article that was interpreted to be too sympathetic to Arab nations in their conflict with Israel. [VOLKMAN, p. 62-65]

In earlier years, United States Attorney General William Saxbee found himself under attack as an anti-Semite when, in the context of discussing the shift from governmental concerns about Communist spies to new kinds of subversion, he made the public relations mistake of mentioning the “change in the Jewish intellectual, who in those days was very enamored of the Communist Party.” [VOLKMAN, p. 105] This statement, based on considerable fact as we have seen, threw Saxbee into an apologetic mode for all the Jewish organizations that soon assailed him. Modern Jewish scholarship has also decided that there were anti-Semites in the State Department (so much dominated by Jews and Zionist policy today) in earlier decades. William Carr, “backbone of the State Department” in the 1930s stands accused by Richard Breitman and Alan Kraut, as does William Phillips, an undersecretary to Franklin Delano Roosevelt (“Phillips hated Jews”), and Breckenridge Long. [BREITMAN/KRAUT, 1986, p. 170, 176, 188]

In 1969, Vice President Spiro T. Agnew even told Jewish newswoman Barbara Walters on NBC’s Today Show that a “Jewish cabal” in the media permitted “Zionist influence” to “tilt American foreign policy unduly towards Israel.” (Agnew later even wrote a novel, The Canfield Decision, “in which pro-Israeli zealots conspire with an American vice-president to take over the United States.”) [VOLKMAN, p. 104] Two of Agnew’s former (Jewish) speechwriters – William Safire and Victor Gold (who was also once Agnew’s press secretary) – protested the vice-president’s public commentary on national TV. In the 1970s, Stephen Isaacs noted the “entrepreneurial bent” of men like Safire:

“The strong entrepreneurial bent of Jewish political professionals is discernible in careers like those of [Frank] Mankiewicz, [William] Safire, and [Ben] Wattenberg, to select three of the more prominent ones. Mankiewicz, who has a degree in law, has moved from law to journalism to political staffing to journalism, back to direct politics, then to book writing. Safire went from journalism to television producing to public relations to speech writing in the Nixon White House and then again into journalism, as a columnist for the New York Times.” [ISAACS, p. 34]

Wattenberg started out as a speech writer for Lyndon Johnson. [JARVIK, L., 1997, p. 196] He was also once the campaign manager for ardently pro-Israel senator Henry “Scoop” Jackson. [RADOSH, R., 1996, p. 155]

In 1995, during the Presidential campaign, Republican challenger Bob Dole was accused by a former low-level aide, Stanley Hilton, of having anti-Semitic views. “Dole sometimes privately expressed envy and resentment at Jews for having an unduly large amount of money, power, and influence in the United States,” wrote Hilton, “… Like his hero Richard Nixon and many other traditional WASP Republicans, Dole has sometimes been critical of Jews, their politics, and their financial power.” [DORF, M, Unauth., p.]

Incredibly, even Hillary Clinton was charged with anti-Semitism in July 2000, an accusation that loomed as a possible death blow to her campaign for Senate in New York. More incredibly, this charge made national news. A former (Jewish) writer for the National Enquirer (!) wrote that Hillary once called a man who worked for the Bill Clinton, Paul Fray, a “Jew bastard.” Fray, the accuser, wasn’t even Jewish, there was no evidence that the incident ever took place except his own charge, and it allegedly took place 26 years ago in Arkansas. Even Ms. Clinton, champion of the Jews, surrounded by Jewish aides and associates throughout government, was twisted down and forced to squirm before the omnipresent Jewish Inquisition. At a special press conference she emphatically denied the charge. [MSNBC, 7-17-2000]

In 1991, the White House Chief of Staff, John Sununu, of Lebanese Arab ancestry, found himself embroiled in controversy over governmental travel expenses for personal use. The controversy stretched further when he was alleged to have accused Jewish lobbying groups of carrying out a vendetta against him. “The charge that he may have blamed Jewish groups and others for his woes is serious,” noted the Boston Globe, “because it could arouse widespread concerns among Jews that Sununu is antagonistic to them.” [KURKJIAN, p. 1] Earlier, the Wall Street Journal had quoted an unnamed source who said that “Israel’s supporters quietly campaign against him.” [KURKJIAN, p. 1] Jewish leaders had long been concerned about Sununu from the start of his tenure, noted the Los Angeles Times, because of his “refusal to join other governors in denouncing the ‘Zionism is racism’ vote at the United Nations.” [WALKER, p. M2]

Also in 1991, a speech by the Bush administration’s Secretary of State, James Baker, to AIPAC, was noted in the Jewish Week: “The speech was written by American Jews because Baker’s key aides are Jewish.” [AIN, S, CULTURAL, 1-18-91, p. 16] (The “speech writer and policy analyst” for the Reagan administration’s first Secretary of State, Alexander Haig, was also Jewish, Harvey Sicherman. Haig’s Executive Assistant was Sherwood Goldberg.) [HAIG, p. 61-62] James Baker’s four-person team to broker the Arab-Israeli peace negotiations were also all Jews – Dennis Ross, Daniel Kurtzer, Aaron Miller, and Richard Haas. [GOLDBERG, JJ, p. 231] “We act in America’s interest, but through a prism,” one of the peace team members told a Jewish reporter, “speaking on condition of anonymity.” [GOLDBERG, p. 232] In the Republican administration’s White House State Department, in the same year, 1991, seven of 19 assistant secretaries were also Jewish.

Even more recently, a popular “media consultant, pollsters, and strategist” for prominent Republican politicians has been Arthur Finkelstein. His client list, noted the Metrowest Jewish News in 1996, “reads like a who’s who of conservatism including [Israeli right-wing Likud party Prime Minister Benyamin]
Netanyahu, New York governor George Pataki, Senator Alfonso D’Amato (NY), Jesse Helms (NC) and Ronald Lauder. [FRIEDLAND, E., 7-11-96, p. 8]

In 1991 President George Bush was nearly overwhelmed by the Jewish American lobby against his efforts to limit (via conditions on loan guarantees, as part of the Israel-Arab peace negotiation) continued Israeli settlement in (the largely Arab) Occupied Territories. Church organizations that urged Bush to deny Israel’s request for money for this project included the American Friends Service Committee, Episcopal Church, American Baptist Church, Evangelical Lutheran Church, Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers, National Council of Churches, Presbyterian Churches, Roman Catholic Conference of Major Superiors of Men, Unitarian Universalist Association and the United Church of Christ. [GINZBERG, p. 227]

Jewish journalist Glenn Frankel noted the scenario: “Reading the satellite data, the headlines and [Israeli minister] Ariel Sharon’s public statements, [Bush] and his staff concluded that Israel had launched a large-scale settlement program even while Shamir was telling Washington that no such buildup was taking place. Bush grew increasingly furious … And now AIPAC and Shamir and their allies in Congress were telling the administration that the loan guarantees were no longer in Bush’s power to grant or deny. To George Bush, it felt as if Israel and its friends were spitting in his face.” [FRANKEL, G., p. 301]

Framing the loan guarantees as non-negotiable humanitarian aide to help build housing for new Jewish immigrants from Russia escaping anti-Semitism, the Jewish forces against President Bush became “one of the biggest and most emotionally powerful lobbying campaigns American Jewish groups had ever organized … Bush fielded phone calls from senators who warned that they could not resist American Jewish pressure to approve the guarantees without a strong public stance by the president himself.” [FRANKEL, p. 303]

Bush did go public, complaining in a speech that he was “up against some powerful political forces … We’re up against very strong and effective, sometimes, groups that go up in the [Capitol] Hill.” [FRANKEL, p. 304] Bush’s courage to stand up to the Jewish lobby, however veiled, drew an avalanche of condemnation from Jews who saw it “as a blatant appeal to anti-Semitism, a claim that Jews were too powerful and too shadowy, that they needed to be confronted. They also did not like being portrayed as serving the interest of a foreign power in opposing the President.” [FRANKEL, p. 305] Israeli cabinet members Ehud Omert and Rehavim Zeevi openly called him an anti-Semite. Bush eventually was forced to make a public apology to the Jewish community for the few careful clauses he had spoken about Jewish power. “Bush’s role in defeating [Israel’s] request [for the funds],” notes Glenn Frankel, “helped elect Democratic opponent Bill Clinton in November 1992.” [FRANKEL, p. 313]

Across the world, in 1999 a French author, Jean d’Ormesson, a member of the French Academy, stirred controversy when he wrote that France’s former socialist president, François Mitterand, made an “anti-Semitic” statement to him in 1995. “According to M. d’Ormesson,” noted the Times (of London), “Mitterand said, ‘There you can see the powerful and harmful Jewish lobby in France.’ Although there is no evidence to support this claim, some of Mitterand’s aides, including Jacques Attali, said yesterday the former president had made similar anti-Semitic comments on other occasions. Jean Daniel, the editor of Le Nouvel Observateur and a staunch supporter of Mitterand, said he had talked of a Zionist lobby.” [SAGE] (For that matter, the same year, another deceased French hero, underwater explorer Jacques Cousteau, was also assailed in the news media for a similar crime. “The biographer of Jacques Cousteau,” announced the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “has uncovered evidence that the late underwater explorer harbored anti-Semitic attitudes.” [DAVIS, D., 6-22-99, p. 14]

In 2002, outgoing French Foreign Minister Hubert Védrine made Jewish international news. “In a closed meeting” with European Union and Mediterranean state foreign ministers, said the Jerusalem Post, Vedrine declared that Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon was “an obstacle to the [Mideast] peace process bolstered in his intransigence by American Jewry, which Vedrine said is essentially more Sharon than Sharon ... The French foreign minister said American Jewry – which supports Sharon – is more ‘intransigent’ than the prime minister, and influences the positions of President George Bush.” [KEINON, H., 4-24-02]

In Italy, in 1994, the Italian government felt enough international Jewish pressure to “formally reassure American Jews that it had no anti-Semitic bias after a Cabinet minister blamed ‘New York’s Jewish lobby’ for Italy’s economic problems.” [COWELL, A., p. 14]

Meanwhile, Jews in the upper echelons of the American university system typically produce protective fictions about Jewish/Zionist power, like this from professor Steven Spiegel:

“Jewish political strength arises from thousands of individual Jews who are prepared to express their sentiments to politicians and officials. Intense concern in part compensates for small numbers. Moreover, Jews have neither a bureaucratic mission nor a profit motive. Their religious, humanitarian, and ethnic concerns often appear more altruistic and less self-serving to politicians than those of their adversaries.” [SPIEGEL, p. 7]

Moving along in the nation’s capital, “the Adat Yisrael synagogue in Washington,” observed Israeli journalist Bar-Yosef, in his article about Jewish influence in the Federal government, “is not only a place of worship. It is a Jewish community center …. its members are the creme of Washington society, rich businessmen. All are wealthy people … The entrance fee to the synagogue is $1000 for a single holiday … the most important reason for their praying is that they feel a close connection to Israel.” [BAR-YOSEF]

Across town, in Georgetown, is another prominent synagogue where “its prayers,” says Bar-Yossef, “are conducted in the Israeli style favored by ‘Gush Emunim’ [the racist Jewish messianic movement]. The Israeli flag is proudly displayed above the Sacred Ark alongside the American flag … Many Jewish Administration officials pray there. They not only don’t try to conceal their religious affiliation but go to great length to demonstrate their Judaism since it may help their careers greatly.” [BAR-YOSEF]
The prominent Washington DC Jewish community does not just have deep roots in the American government. “In the Washington media,” says Bar-Yossef, “a significant part of the most important persons and most popular programs on the TV are warm Jews. A significant part of the senior media correspondents, newspaper editors, and analysts are Jewish and many of them are warm Jews too. Many of them are influenced in Israel’s favor by attending suitable synagogues.” [BAR-YOSEF]

Media members cited by Bar-Yossef include Barry Schweid (Associated Press’ political reporter) and Amy Schwartz (the Washington Post’s education reporter) who “regularly participate in a prayer session which is considered to be close to Israel at the Cleveland Park synagogue. Also the Israeli flag is posted proudly about the Sacred Ark.” [BAR-YOSSEF]

In 1997 the Wall Street Journal carried a disturbing item in its pages about Vadim Rabinovich, founder and head of the All-Ukrainian Jewish Congress and business associate of prominent Jewish-American Republican entrepreneur Ronald Lauder in Eastern European mass media enterprises. Rabinovich, as noted earlier, made the news for his alleged connections to the Russian mafia, particularly through a Russian-owned company in Vienna called Nordex. The Journal said this:

“A Congressional fund-raising probe last year disclosed that Mr. Rabinovich and [Nordex President] Mr. Louthansky met President Clinton in 1993 and were invited to a Democratic National Convention fundraiser in 1995. Though they never attended, the revelation prompted another former CIA director, R. James Woolsey, to issue a written statement accusing the Clinton administration of ‘at a bare minimum … a severe lack of scrutiny and appalling bad judgment. It would be unwise in the extreme for there to be any ties between the United States government and … Nordex.”

The other former CIA director quoted, John Deutch, had noted that Nordex “is an example of Russian criminal activity moving out of Russia.” [BRZEZINSKI, M. WOES, p. A18]

But Vadim Rabinovich did attend the Democratic fundraiser in Miami in 1995. The Washington Post even ran a snapshot of Rabinovich standing between President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore, the three men posing for the camera, obviously as a memento for Rabinovich, this when his visa to the United States had been revoked a month earlier. [FARRIS, p. A18] Who managed to get him there between the two most powerful men in American government? How did they do it? Who was beholding to who and what does it all mean? (Upon Clinton’s closure as American president, he has had many well-paid opportunities to speak to his Jewish constituency, including three such audiences (Glasgow, Manchester, London) in a single week in England. Coming up was a $100,000 speaking engagement in Israel sponsored by “Nes Technologies, headed by former ministry director general Aharon Fogel.” Thanks to Clinton’s efforts in raising $17 million for an Israeli project in the Negev desert, a reservoir was tabbed to be named after him.) [MARCUS, R., 12-17-01]
A common paradigm to Jewish devotion and transcendent allegiance within, but rooted without, the American political scene may be measured in the following example. In 1995, Barry Rubin, a former Jewish American foreign service diplomat (press officer) who was held captive in the notorious Iran “hostage crisis,” by now a professor at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, listed the following arguments against a complete Jewish assimilation into American society:

- “Total assimilation diminishes the individual … To ignore the unique factors shaping one’s standpoint is intellectually and psychologically impoverishing …
- Total assimilation means the extinction of a type of individual whose worldview and standpoint has shown extraordinary social and intellectual worth …
- However cloaked as altruistic or universalist, total assimilation is a desertion of comrades for basically selfish interests …
- Rejection of Jewish peoplehood for another ideology, nation, or religion does not denote progress but a descent in moral and historical consciousness … Jews … possess … a past and an alternative intellectual universe extending before and beyond America.” [RUBIN, p. 250-251]

How many non-Jewish readers will read this section on government – and the rest of the book – and be stunned by the sheer scope of what they didn’t know. Is a Zionist-centered government the kind of rule non-Jewish Americans would choose, if (breaking through systematically enforced censorship on the subject of Jewish dominance) they had any access to information about the problem, and grasped the enormous dimensions to the issue? This is what President James Madison, one of the founders of the American Constitutional government, had to say about the prerequisite for a healthy democracy, today so disturbingly lacking:

“A popular government, without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy; or perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance; and a people who mean to be their own government must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives.”

Let’s conclude this section of this chapter with the very tangible implications of our Zionist-centered government for the American people: war, increased animosity against the American people by Arabs and Muslims everywhere because of pro-Israel foreign policy, and a frightening future for everyone. The following words in 1998 are those of Osama Bin Laden, America’s foremost terrorist enemy, internationally notorious after the 2001 Pentagon and World Trade Center jet attacks upon thousands, including both civilians and military personnel:

“The American government, we think, is an agent that represents the Israel inside America. If we look at sensitive departments in the present government like the defense department or the state department, or sensitive security departments like the CIA and others, we find that Jews have the first word in the American government, which is how they use America to carry out their plans in the world and especially the Muslim world. The presence of Americans in the Holy Land supports the Jews and gives them a safe back. The American government, in a time where there are millions of Americans living on the street and those living below the standard of living and below the poverty line, we find the American government turning toward helping Israel in occupying our land and building settlements in the Holy Land.” [MILLER, J., 6-9-98, ABC News]

Samplings elsewhere:

“Jews,” noted M. Hirsch Goldberg in 1976, “have served as the heads of governments in the Diaspora in nine different countries: England (Benjamin Disraeli), France (Leon Blum, Pierre Mendes-France and Rene Mayer), Italy (Luigi Luzzatti and Sidney Sonnino), Austria (Bruno Kreisky), Australia (Sir Isaac Isaacs), Bavaria (Kurt Eisner), Hungary (Bela Kun), India (Marquis of Reading), and Palestine (Sir Herbert Samuel) … In [South] Africa … Saul Solomon ... declined several offers to serve as Prime Minister.” [GOLDBERG, M., 1976, p. 51-52]

In Great Britain today, Jews are an incredibly influential lobbying presence in the national government. Even England’s most famous (and non-Jewish) statesman, Winston Churchill declared in 1954: “I am a Zionist. Let me make that clear. I was one of the original ones, after the Balfour Declaration, and I have worked faithfully for it.” “As a boy,” notes the Zionist journal Midstream, “Churchill saw that, however rude his father could be to everyone else, he maintained a warm social connection to Nathan Rothschild and Sir Ernest Cassel, the heads of the two greatest banking houses. (Cassel was a German-born banker who adopted England and moved in the most elevated circles, including that of Edward, Prince of Wales, with whom he was an intimate.”) [COLEMAN, D., MAY-JUNE 1999, p. 10]

An Arab critic noted the political situation in England in the 1980s with concern. “English people were often furious about the disproportionate representation the Jews got in [Margaret Thatcher’s] cabinet,” wrote Asem Hamdan, “One branch of the Conservative Party, known as the Monday Club, openly criticized key portfolios such as interior and finance being held by Jews. Thatcher responded by closing the club.” [HAMDAN] (A former “pillar of the Monday Club” was Harold Soref, who resigned from the British Board of Deputies in 1984. “It has long been my view,” he said, “that the policies of the British Board of Deputies help create anti-Semitism.” [DAILY TELE, 3-17-93]

As half of one percent of the British population, Jews in the Margaret Thatcher era held 5 of 20 cabinet positions. Her high office Jewish contingent included Nigel Lawson (Chancellor, who resigned over the “Westland Affair”), Leon Brittan (Trade and Industry Secretary), David Young (Minister without portfolio), Malcolm Rifkind (Foreign Secretary), and Keith Joseph. British Chief Rabbi Immanuel Jacobovitz was awarded a seat in the House of Lords. “I was born to a Lithuanian father and am of Jewish descent,” noted Minister David Young. “My only brother, Stewart, is chairman of the BBC. My father used to say, ‘One son deputy chairman of the government, another chairman of the BBC – that’s not bad for immigrants.’” [TALATI, p. 12]

Gerald Kaufman, an eventual British Member of Parliament, notes that he “followed [his father] into Zionism. I became a member of PZ [Poale Zion] and of Labour Friends of Israel … During the [1967 Israeli] six-day war and its aftermath, when I worked in Harold Wilson’s office at 10 Downing Street, I went every day to the Israeli embassy as a secret link between the [British] prime minister and the Israeli ambassador, Aharon Remez. My work was well known to the Israeli government and a subsequent [Israeli] prime minister, Golda Meir, thanked me for it.” [KAUFMAN, p. 14]

In 1983 a Russian communist (Leonid Belkin) perspective was cited by the BBC: “Inconspicuous Conservatives such as Brittan and Lawson ascending to the pinnacle of power is by no means a miracle. One contributing factor which is not taken into account as a rule is the support of the Jewish bourgeoisie and the numerous Zionist organizations in Britain which served its interests. This factor reflects the growing Zionist influence on the country’s political life … Before the 1970s the Jewish bourgeoisie was represented by only two MPs in Parliament … By the end of the 1970s the number was 12, and in 1983, 17.” [BELKIN] By 1997, 20 Jews were members of Parliament. [BUTLER/KAVANAGH, p. 200]

As one observer, Galina Orionova, noted about traditional Soviet views of the West:

“[The Zionist conspiracy theory] permeates the Soviet press corps at both the national and the local level. They are not only interested in Israel itself. They’re interested in the power of the American Jewish lobby and how it defines American foreign policy.” [RA’NNAN/LUKES, p. 229]

In 1997 the Jerusalem Post ran an article sub-headlined: “The British Labor Party Leader Tony Blair Has Assiduously Courted the Jewish Community. It Looks Like It Will Pay Off in Next Thursday’s Election.” It did; Blair won. He was England’s new prime minister. The article further noted that:

“Blair has repeatedly pledged that he would ‘not repeat the mistakes of the previous Labor leaders during the Eighties,’ who were regarded as insensitive, if not apathetic, to Jewish causes, notably Israel. Blair has been well rewarded when the media revealed last year that a secret fund had been set up to finance his office, it was also revealed that the architect of the fund was a prominent Jewish accounting firm in London and that the major donors included leading members of the Jewish community.” [DAVID, D., 4-25-97, p. 8]

Such Jewish donors included Sir Trevor Chinn (chairman of England’s largest motor dealer, and also “president of the Joint Israel Appeal, Britain’s biggest fundraising charity for Israel,” [RUFFURD] and Michael Goldstein, a partner in the Blick Rothenberg company that oversaw the fund. “David Rothenburg, the firm’s senior tax partner,” noted the (London) Sunday Times, “was in Israel this weekend and unavailable for comment [about the fund].” [RUF-FURD] Other secret contributors included Alex Bernstein – the chairman of the Granada television empire, and Emmanuel Kaye.

In 1998, the (London) Guardian noted another lobbying case, that of the new Lawson Lucas Mendelsohn (LLD) “company [that was] embroiled in the row over political lobbying.” [HENCKE, p. 3] Steve Rubin, “the main venture capitalist” behind the company met John Mendelsohn, a founder of LLD, “after working with him on Jewish charities.” [HENCKE, p. 3] Yet another powerful Jewish British lobbyist (and eventual politician), Michael Levy, was noted by the Daily Telegraph in 1996 as the “millionaire record producer and philanthropist [who] is the power behind the Labour leader’s [Tony Blair’s] throne … His crucial gift to Labour’s war chest will be through fund-raising, something he is extremely good at.” [SYLVESTER, p. 9] Levy noted the Independent, “owns luxurious homes in north London and Israel.” [WOLMAR, p. 3] He “is estimated to have raised some $60 million for Blair, much of it from Jewish donors and much of it channeled through a blind trust to shield the identity of the donors and protect Blair from scandal.” [DAVIS, D., 2-10-2000, p. 5]

By 2000, Levy (now deemed the position of Lord Levy by Blair) was being criticized by the British press for his role as “Blair’s secret Foreign Minister.” “Officials are concerned,” noted the Express, “that Mr. Blair is bypassing normal diplomatic channels, using a close friend [Levy] who is unelected, unaccountable, and publicly unknown, as a roving ambassador. Lord Levy is the man who raised the cash for the ‘blind trust’ which financed Mr. Blair’s office before he became Prime Minister in 1997.” Levy has visited Syria, Jordan, Oman, Qatar, Bahrain, Lebanon, Egypt, and Israel on ambassador-like missions. [BEVINS, A., 3-10-2000] Levy, noted the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “is deeply mistrusted by large sections of the British political establishment and has been the subject of questions by legislators.” [DAVIS, D., 2-10-2000, p. 5] He “is now the chief fundraiser for the ‘high value’ donors account at the Labour Party, along with his deputy Amanda Delew (who worked with him at Jewish Care).” [RED STAR RESEARCH]

In a later article the Jerusalem Post noted with satisfaction the growing prominence of Jews in places of power in the British government:

“‘We’re not yet a majority, but we certainly have more than a minyan [the minimal number of Jews necessary to hold religious services together] – and Tony Blair is helping,’ said Lord Wolf, one of several Jewish members of the House of Lords. Recent examples of that brand of assistance included Michael Levy, former Jewish Care chairperson … former Labor MP Greville Janner [also an honorary vice president of the World Jewish Congress and former head of the Board of Deputies of British Jews], and Anthony Jacobs, an active Liberal Democrat who is chairman of the board of governors of Haifa University [in Israel]. All three have been elevated to peerage since Blair became prime minister.” [CASHMAN, p. 14]
Other Jews in the House of Lords in the late 1990s were Andrew Stone (also chairman of the British Overseas Trade Board Group for Israel), Daniel Sainsbury (“one of the richest men in the country” [JONES, G.], and Daniel Finkelstein, among many others. (Finkelstein is the “personal policy advisor” for “Tory leader” William Hague. In 2000 the Times of London noted that Hague “is hoping that his current visit to Israel will help to capture at least four marginal [Parliament] seats with significant Jewish votes.”) [WATSON, R., 6-2-2000] The British Home Secretary was also Jewish, Michael Howard. As noted earlier, Peter Mandelson resigned as Britain’s Trade and Industry Secretary. (Caught in a minor scandal, the charges against him, suggests one supporter, was “insidious, unregistered anti-Semitism.” [GLANVILLE, p. 10] In recent years Keith Joseph has been the Education Secretary and head of the Department of Trade and Industry. In 1998, the testimony of a British M-15 officer “linked [former Defense and Foreign Secretary Malcolm Rifkind] to an alleged plot to assassinate [Libya leader] Colonel Gaddafi.” The February 1996 bomb did not succeed in killing him. [HANNAH/DINGWELL, p. 16]

In 1999, Leon Brittan, by now the European Union’s Trade Minister, complained about a trade dispute between the United States and Europe. “He blames,” said the Economist, with no trace of humorous irony, “the ‘extreme political influence wielded by Chiquita,’ an American banana company.” [ECONOMIST, p 2-6-99, p. 56]

Jewish lobbying influence in the British Parliament is comparable to that in the United States Congress. In 2001, during the much-reported Palestinian revolt against Israeli rule, “a meeting of MPs and peers supportive of Israel … [was held] to counter the growing pro-Arab sentiment at Westminster. Organised jointly by the Labour, Conservative, and Liberal Democrat Friends of Israel groups, the rally [was] expected [to attract numbers] … well into three figures. [The sponsoring umbrella group was] the all-party Britain-Israel Parliamentary Group.” [JOSEPHS, B., 3-2-01, p. 19]

In 2002, wary of the subcurrent of Zionism, the Iranian foreign minister to Great Britain was “doing his best to block the appointment of a British ambassador who comes from Jewish stock.” [MARCUS, Y., 1-13-02]

Ireland? There are scant Jews in that country but as Hank Greenspun noted in 1966,

“Bear in mind Robert Briscoe, the Jewish Lord Mayor of Dublin … worked for both Irish Republican and Zionist causes; and Rabbi Herzog, Israel’s first Chief Rabbi, [was] once the Chief Rabbi of Ireland.” [GREENSPUN, H., 1966, p. 35] [More Ireland: http://jewishtribalreview.org/iricorres.htm]

In France, Jews constitute about one percent of the French population. In 1997, the American Jewish Yearbook noted the “relatively high number of Jews active in French politics.” [SINGER/SELDIN, 1997, p. 287] In 1999, Daniel Cohn-Bendit was “one of the best-placed leftist candidates for mayor [of Paris], just behind the socialist finance minister [of the French government], Dominique Strauss-Kahn.” [WEBSTER, 7-9-99] “During the heady days of the [19]68 protests that rocked France, it seemed Cohn-Bendit was everywhere, on every barricade, at the head of every protest.” [SEWARD, D., 3-22-99] “As long as there is anti-Semitism, I am a Jew,” says Cohn-Bendit. [WOSNITZA, R., 1-26-01] For Strauss-Kahn’s part, he resigned in the midst of a scandal in November 1999. He was accused of having earlier accepted $100,000 from a health care company for fictitious services. His signature appeared on two forged documents. Strauss-Kahn had “the broadest portfolio – finance, economy, and industry – in the French government.” [DAHLBURG, J., 11-3-99, p. A20] Jean Kahn is the president of the French Central Consistory and Jack Lang is another former government minister.

Among others of the political elite, Laurent Fabius was the youngest (38) prime minister (the fourth Jewish one) [GOLDBERG, M. H., 1976, p. 167] in French history). He began his term in 1984. By 1999, now president of the National Assembly (the parallel to the U.S. House of Representatives), he was involved in emotionally-charged controversy. He, and two other politicians, were tried on charges of involuntary manslaughter in their decisions (years earlier) to delay government testing that could have prevented the HIV virus from contaminating hospital blood supplies. 1,000 people eventually died as a result of the delay. In a controversial decision by a French court, he and the other defendants were ultimately acquitted. “The Court of Justice of the Republic has given the impression,” responded the Le Figaro daily, “of sparing those in power.” “The verdict,” declared Liberation, “was political.” “The verdict issued Tuesday by the special court of judges and politicians,” noted Agence France Presse, “triggered angry cries of political bias and judicial incompetence from across the spectrum.” [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 3-10-99] “Mr. Fabius,” said the Irish Times, “has over the past five years orchestrated a vast public relations campaign in which scientists, professors, and politicians have defended him in the media. Some claimed that Mr. Fabius, who is Jewish, was … a victim of anti-Semitism. The strategy paid off yesterday.” [MARLOWE, L., 3-10-99, p. 14] “Friends,” noted the Times (of London), “see the Jewish politician as a victim of anti-Semitic emotion.” [BREMNER, C., 2-13-99] Fabius is also co-author of the Fabius-Gayssot law, which makes it a punishable crime in France to deny the existence of the Holocaust.

For decades, Jewish politician Simone Veil has also been in the forefront of French politics. She was the president of the European Economic Union Parliament in 1979–82. In 1994, as the French Social Affairs and Health Minister, she enforced the government’s ban on Muslim schoolgirls’ headscarves in classes. “The ban has provoked outrage among Moslems,” noted Agence France Presse, “since it effectively allows the wearing of crucifixes and [Jewish] skullcaps.” [AGENCE PRESSE FRANCE, 11-2-94] In 1983, Veil was awarded the Zionist Jabotinsky Foundation’s “Shield of Jerusalem Prize” for “defense of the rights of Jewish people.” [NEW YORK TIMES, 11-14-83, p. B2] She was also, noted the Washington Post, “instrumental in forcing French television to show the American-produced ‘Holocaust’ series on the fate of the Jews in Nazi Europe after the head of all three TV stations had made public statements refusing to show it.” [KOVEN, R., 5-15-79]
As early as the 1950s, notes Barnett Litvinoff,

"From 1950 to 1954 [French] politics were largely dominated by René Mayer and Pierre Mendes-France. They were both of the Radical-Socialist wing, yet at the same time such bitter enemies as to prompt one anti-Semitic monthly, Écrits de Paris, to see their feud as an age-old conflict between Ashkenazi and Sephardi! Gilbert Grandval, a baptized Jew, had been Resident-General in Morocco, Jules Moch was playing an important international role at the United Nations, while the faithful Gaullist René Cassin won immense prestige as president of the Supreme Court of Appeal. Prime Minister [Edgar] Faure’s wife too, was a Jewess [LITVINOFF, p. 126] … The Jews themselves did not realize their own importance until the national elections of March 1967, when every party, not excluding the Communists, hastened to express its admiration for the state of Israel." [LITVINOFF, p. 132]

In 1988, “one of France’s leading Jews,” René Cassin, former president of France’s Jewish umbrella group Alliance Israélite Universelle, “was reinterred in the Panthéon, the resting place of France’s heroes … with full national honors … He represented France at the League of Nations from 1924 till 1938 and served as a legal adviser to [president Charles] De Gaulle’s Free French Forces in London during the war … In 1967 Cassin bitterly criticized De Gaulle’s decision to embargo French weapons to Israel.” [SINGER, D., 1989, p. 313]

Also in France, in 1991, the former national spokesman for the left-wing ecology-based Green Party, Jean Brière, was sued by two Jewish organizations and the “International League Against Racism and Anti-Semitism” for comments he had made in an internal party memorandum about that year’s Persian Gulf War. In it he denounced the “warmongering role of Israel and the Zionist lobby.” Israel he wrote, was a “racist, militaristic, theocratic and expansionist state, with a policy based on the logic of perennial war … The influence of the Jewish lobby in the United States was decisive in the states in favor of war.” [ZLOTOWSKI, M., 4-21-91]

For these statements, Brière was given a suspended three-month jail sentence and fined $3,700 under existing “hate laws” by a French court. The punishments were later overturned, only because the memo was intended as an internal memorandum and not to be made public. . [More France: http://jewishtribalreview.org/frcorres.htm] (In October 2000, the [Jewish] Forward reported that the Green Party, behind its presidential candidate Ralph Nader, “called this week for a suspension of United States aid to Israel and blamed the jewish state for the current violence in the Middle East … Democratic activists are calling the Green Party’s statement one of the most anti-Israel ever attributed to a party engaged in a presidential campaign – They are demanding that Green Party Jews abandon Mr. Nader and his running mate, Winona LaDuke, a Native American activist whose mother is Jewish.”) [CATTAN, N., 10-27-00]

In 1999, a Jewish woman, Ruth Dreifuss, became Switzerland’s new president. Jo Benkow was the head of the Conservative Party of Norway from 1980-84. He was the Speaker of the Norwegian Parliament from 1985-93, a position that “is often referred to as ‘president’ and is second in the official chain of command behind the King.” [ALTMAN-OHR, 2-11-2000, p. 8] Despite the fact that Jews have always been a tiny group in Denmark, (there are only about 7,000 Jews in today’s population of 4.2 million), Edvard Brandes was once “leader of Denmark’s Liberal Party and twice minister of finance; Herman Trier, president of Parliament; General C. J. De Meza, commander of the Danish army during the war with Prussia in 1864.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 73] In 2001, in the Netherlands, the State Secretary of Justice, Job Cohen, became the mayor of Amsterdam. As the Jewish Chronicle noted, “most recent mayors have been Social Democrats, and Jews … Harry van den Bergh, a Cohen political ally and head of the Dutch Refugees Association remarked, “As a Jew, I find it exceptional that we have a Jewish mayor of Amsterdam for the fourth time since the war … Premier Wim Kok is said to be looking for a chosen successor, and Job Cohen is among the names which have been mentioned…” [FRIEDMANN, E., 1-26-01]

In Italy, Tullia Zevi, head of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, is described by the American Jewish Yearbook as “one of the most prominent women in Italy.” [SINGER/SELDIN, 1997, p. 324] [See earlier discussion of Jewish prominence in Mussolini’s fascist Italy p. 167 and p. 182] In 2001, non-Jewish media mogul Silvio Berlusconi became the prime minister of Italy, heading a right-of-center government. “Berlusconi’s new administration,” noted the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “will be the most pro-Israel government in Italy in years. Defense Minister Antonio Martino, for example, is vice president of the Italian Friends of Israel association … ‘We have a lot of friends in this government,’ said Amos Vidan, currently in charge of the Israeli embassy in Rome … ‘The people in power have a more sympathetic approach to Israel, especially Berlusconi himself.”’ [GRUBER, R., 6-12-01]

In 2000 in Australia, powerful and influential Jewish mogul Joseph Gutnick made the local political news. Attempting to lobby Prime Minister John Howard to change existing laws to kick alleged former Nazis from the country, Gutnick was rebuffed and threatened to sue the prime minister for his frank commentary about his Jewish donor. As the Melbourne paper The Age noted, “ABC radio yesterday reported that Mr. Gotnick had threatened to withhold financial support for the Liberals over the issue and when asked on ABC radio if he could ‘do without Gutnick’s money,’ Mr. Howard said … “I don’t change policy according to the financial contributions from anybody, whether it’s Mr. Gutnick or not.” [THE AGE, 8-10-2000]

Even in New Zealand, “as far back as the nineteenth century, Sir Julius Vogel was twice elected prime minister (in 1873 and 1876), while Sir Arthur Myers served as minister of munitions in World War I. There were five Jewish mayors of Auckland, and almost every city had a Jewish chief magistrate at one time or another.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 171]

In Poland, a country that has – post-World War II – only a few thousand Jews (see http://jewishtribalreview.org/jidele2.htm), the government’s Foreign Minister, Bronislaw Geremek, is Jewish, as was 1993 Prime Minister Hanna Suchocka. As noted earlier, while Jews were prominent in leadership positions in the communist rule of Poland, they were also noteworthy in positions of leadership in antithesis to the ruling regime. Prominent leaders of Jewish descent in the Solidarity resistance movement included Jan Litynski, Adam Michnik, and Karol Modzelewski. [WESCHLER, p. 40]

In the Czech Republic, a country that has an estimated Jewish population of only 6,000, in 1998 the Jewish Telegraphic Agency noted that “there is a strong Jewish representation in the Czech Foreign Ministry. Deputy Foreign Minister Otto Pick is Jewish, for example.” So is Jiri Pehe, “senior political adviser” to the president. [GREENE, R., 8-4-98, p. 6 & 6-23-98, p. 11] Thomas Jelinek was elected chairman of the Prague Jewish Community in 2001. He is also “a confidant of President Vaclav Havel and an economic adviser in the presidential office.” “I am strictly separating my agenda with the president, which covers mainly economic issues, from my position as chairman,” Jelinek told a Jewish ethnic news agency, “But for sure if there would be some serious issue affecting the Jewish community in the Czech Republic, it would feel natural to inform him about it.” [BENNETT, M., 7-2-01] A Jewish Austrian member of the European Parliament, Peter Sichrovsky, is even a member of the far right Freedom Party (much maligned for alleged anti-Semitism by the international Jewish community). [HARRIS, D., 2-3-2000, p. 1]

From the Ukraine, in 1994 the Jewish acting head of the Ukrainian cabinet, Yefim Zvyagilsky, “was faced with charges of embezzlement of state property [worth $25 million].” [STETSYURA] After fleeing to Israel, the Jewish state denied the Ukrainian request for his extradition. “Ukrainian officials,” noted Reuters, “say Zvyagilsky, a Jew by origin, acquired an Israeli passport during his two and a half years in Israel but he denies this … Some top [Ukrainian] government officials, including Foreign Minister Hennady Vdovenko have suggested that Ukrainian authorities might have to think twice before appointing Jews to senior jobs in the future.” [REUTERS, 2-12-97] [Bulgaria? See http://jewishtribalreview.org/bulgaria.htm]

Tzippi Hoffman and Alan Fisher note that

“In Cape Town, since 1867 there have been 69 mayors of which 12 were Jews. In Cape Town nearly a third of the Parliamentary Council are Jews.” [HOFFMAN/FISHER, p. 26]

How about the African nation of Zimbabwe, home to 750 Jews? In 2001, that country’s (Jewish) Chief Justice, Anthony Gubbay (born in Manchester, Great Britain) resigned his post after political troubles with president Robert Mugabe. [BELLING, S., 3-12-01]

In 2002, Sheila Firestone retired after 18 years in the Canadian Senate. Firestone won her position in 1984 in election battles against fellow Jews William Dery and Sharon Wolfe. “In her farewell address to her colleagues,” noted the Canadian Jewish News, “spoke first of her ‘ancestral land,’ Israel … In an interview, Firestone said she regarded bringing the concerns of the Jewish community, including ensuring fair representation of Israel’s cause, as fundamental to her role as a parliamentarian – in caucus, in government, and internationally. ‘I have a strong sense of Jewish responsibility and the need to ensure respect and fair play for Israel,’ said Finestone … ‘I have taken my share of taunts for making representations for Israel. I’ve been called an Israeli agent and Mrs. Israel, but I’m proud to be acknowledged as a concerned member of the Jewish people.” [ARNOLD, J.]

That same year, Jewish politicians from around the world were invited to a conference in Israel. As the Globe and Mail noted:

“An influential group of Canadian Liberal MPs [Members of Parliament], led by Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, is lending its support to Israel by attending a conference of Jewish politicians organized by the Israeli government. More than 50 legislators from Europe, the Americas and South Africa are attending the four-day meeting in Jerusalem, sponsored by the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. ‘I made the decision [to come] because I am a Jew,’ said Anita Neville, a rookie Liberal MP from Winnipeg. ‘I have a large Jewish community in my riding, and I care deeply about the nature of the relationship between Canada and Israel.’ Five of Canada’s six Jewish MPs are attending, along with two Liberal senators. Although the United States has a larger delegation, Canada is the only country to be represented by two senior ministers, Mr. Gray and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan. Ms. Caplan said she sees no problem wearing ‘two hats,’ one as a Canadian minister and another as a supporter of Israel.” [ADAMS, P., 1-8-02]
In 1985, Frank Stuart Miller became the first Jewish premiere of Ontario, that country’s richest and most populace province. In 1993 Jacqueline Holzman was elected mayor of Ottawa. In 1991, Gary Weiner became Canada’s Secretary of State. In 1991 alone, Judy Rebick became President of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, Harvey Webber became President of the Council for Canadian Unity, and Karen Mock became Chairman of the Canadian Multicultural Advisory Board. Invariably at the helm of any “minority” movement that is open to them, in Quebec, the director (David Birnbaum), the chairman (Harold Chorney), and the first vice president (Andy Housefather) of the “Alliance for Quebec” (an “English-speaking rights group” in predominantly French Quebec) are Jewish. So is Howard Galganov, founder and president of another “English-rights” group there, the Quebec Political Action Committee. Galganov is a former member of Meir Kahane’s Jewish Defense League. In 1996 he charged that the majority French-speaking movement was against him, it was “anti-Semitic,” and they “must be stopped before it [anti-Semitism] gets started.” [FORWARD, JEWISH, p. 2]

Tired of all the Judeo-centric/Zionist censorial power everywhere around us, including America, and like to address it? Perhaps you might think to approach the National Coalition Against Censorship (NCAC) until you discover that the “first and longtime director” was Leanne Katz, succeeded by Joanne Bertin. [BLUME, p. 67] Taking an airplane any time soon? The Director of Aviation Safety for the National Transportation Safety Board, retiring in 2001, is Bernard Loeb. “It did not escape [Egyptian officials’] attention that the legendary head of aviation investigations at the NTSB – a brilliant and abrasive engineer named Bernard Loeb – who was overseeing the Flight 990 inquiry [an Egyptian airliner crash in 1999] – was Jewish and something of a Zionist.” [LANGEWIESCHE, W., NOV 2001, p. 47]

The head of the U.S. Space agency, NASA? Also Jewish: Daniel Goldin, honored at the First Annual National Jewish Leadership Awards dinner in 2001. Goldin, who has “family in Israel and has visited [t]here numerous times since 1967,” announced that an Israeli astronaut would be part of a crew into space in 2002. On a recent trip to Israel he “emphasized the possibilities of integrating Israel into the European space center and having it join the exclusive club of countries participating in the international space station, along with involving Israeli research and researchers in the station. [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon commented that he sees Israel’s integration in NASAs’s research and development plans as critically important.” [SIEGEL, J., 8-15-01]

Judeo-centric, pro-Israel (albeit veiled) government think tanks (as of 1993) included the Washington Institute for Near East Policy (co-founded by Martin Indyk), the Foreign Policy Research Institute (“the personal think tank” of Jewish academic Daniel Pipes), and the Jewish Insitute for National Security Affairs (JINSA; founded by Michael Ledeen – Ledeen was involved in the Iran-gate affair. His wife was then-Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle’s secretary). “Stephen Bryen,” notes Grace Halsell, “served as JINSA’s executive director during the time charges were being investigated that, as a Senate Foreign Relations Committee aide, he had offered military secrets to a visiting Israeli defense official. Bryen was not indicted, and subsequently was named Reagan administration deputy assistant secretary of defense in charge of protecting sensitive American technology. While Bryen was in the Pentagon his wife, Shoshanna Byren, served as JINSA’s executive director, during the time charges were being investigated that, as a Senate Foreign Relations Committee aide, he had offered military secrets to a visiting Israeli defense official. In 1988, five Jews – all Toronto-based – were elected to Canada’s national legislature. Three became cabinet ministers: Monte Kwinter (Minister of Industry, Trade, and Technology), Elinor Caplan (Minister of Health – later, of Immigration), and Chaviva Hosek (Minister of Housing). Jewish deputy ministers included Martin Barkin and Elaine Todres. [SINGER, D., 1989, p. 255] The chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Brian Dickson, was also Jewish as was Quebec chief justice Alan B. Gold. Jonathan Schneiderman was also president of the “youth wing” of the Liberal party. [SINGER, D., 1989, p. 268]

The Jewish oligarchs dominating today’s Russian political situation are noted earlier (as is Jewish pre-eminence in the communist governments of the last few decades throughout Eastern Europe), but a 1997 World Press Review commentary sums it up well enough for purposes here:
“The [Russian economic] crisis also explains why Boris Berezovsky and his six prominent Russian bank allies, who, according to Berezovsky’s own account, first made President Boris Yeltsin’s reelection possible, then arranged the promotions of presidential Chief of Staff Anatoly Chubais and First Deputy Prime Minister Vladimir Potanin. Berezovsky runs a conglomerate that includes Russia’s Channel 1 television network. He boasts of controlling most of the independent television stations and newspapers.” [HELMER, p. 44-45]

Any addressing of Jewish political empowerment in Latin America must inevitably consider the implications following 1998 observations by professor Judith Elkin, whose specialty is the Jews of Latin America:

“Following formation of the state of Israel, Yiddish was replaced by Hebrew in most Jewish schools, and Israel became the preferred locus for teacher training. Financial subsidies for Latin American schools were allocated by the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency. Zionism conquered the schools on the way to conquering the [Jewish] communities as a whole … [ELKIN, 1998, p. 176] … Organized Jewish life came to revolve around Zionist activities: the sale of Israel Bonds, celebration of Israel Independence Day, the training and hiring of Hebrew teachers, and so forth … Jews living in Latin America are occasionally able to apply political leverage in support of the government of Israel … The close relationship between Latin American Jews and Israelis sustain the suspicion among nacionalistas that Jews’ extra-territorial loyalties exceed the bounds of patriotic propriety. The accusation of double loyalty dogged the communities from the start, and continues today.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 232-233]

The potential of Zionism empowered in Peru? There are only 3,000 Jews in Peru, a land of 27 million. [PERELMAN, M., 4-20-01] But when Sally Goodgold followed a fellow Jew identified with the last name of Golden to meet the Prime Minister of Peru, Ephraim Goldenberg, in 1997 at the Museum of Natural History in New York, she noted that “he joked about ‘all the Golds’ at this ‘Gold of Peru’ event … The prime minister bent down and said to me, ‘Madame, … my mother [co-founded] Hadassah [the women’s international Zionist organization] of Peru.” [LEON, 9-26-97, p. 13] “In a meaningful symbolic act,” notes Judith Elkin, “Peruvian President Alberto Fujimori [of Japanese ancestry] prepared for Efrain Goldenberg’s swearing in as prime minister by removing the crucifix that usually presides over such ceremonies.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 278] (A Jewish heir to a mining fortune, August Salcedo, was Peru’s president from 1906-1912, and again from 1919 to 1930.) [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 268]

As Jewish historian Howard Sachar notes about the modern Jewish community in Peru:

“[It] is a tightly knit, quite ethnocentric community, with a remarkably lower record of intermarriage than in most other Latin American nations.” [SACHAR, H., p. 269]
In 2000, the shadowy head of the state Peruvian spy agency, Vladimiro Montesinos, known as Peru’s “Rasputin,” was arrested for bribing a Congressman; the incident was captured on videotape. The arrest of the powerful behind-the-scenes leader (one television-sponsored survey noted that 30% of Peruvians believed Montesinos ran the country) [BOYD, S., 12-97, p. 33-34] caused a crisis in the President Fujimori government. He was born into a “Marxist family” in 1944, later becoming a prominent lawyer known for defending major drug dealers. [LANE, C., 9-22-2000, p. A37] The wife, Elaine Karp, of a defeated Peruvian presidential candidate (Alejandro Toledo), is an Israeli. Karp, noted the Jerusalem Post in 2000, “brought charges against the Israeli defense establishment for allegedly assisting Montesino’s organization.” [COHEN, C., 9-18-2000, p. 5] In 2001, a Peruvian special prosecutor, Dr. Jose Carlos Ugaz, determined that Montesinos – still a fugitive – had stashed millions of dollars in bribery payments in Swiss banks. The money came from “Israeli businessmen as part of a deal for the sale of Russian fighter aircraft to Peru’s armed forces … Montesinos was closely connected to a group of businessmen – some Israeli and some Jews with Peruvian citizenship – who acted for him in international arms deals, from which he collected illegal commissions.” [DAYAN, A., 3-5-01]

(Nonetheless, the Jewish Week noted American Jewish lobbying pressure upon Toledo to pardon Lori Berenson, a Jew from New York, who had been sentenced by a Peruvian court “to 20 years in jail for collaborating with [Peruvian] terrorists.” “California Rabbi Steven Jacobs,” noted the Jewish Week, “who sat with the Berensons [parents of Lori] during the verdict, said he intends to put together a delegation of rabbis to meet with Toledo, whose wife and daughter are Jewish.”) [GREENBERG, E., 6-28-01] Montesinos was dismissed from the Peruvian military in 1977 “for selling state secrets to the CIA.” He grew to power as a lawyer and became part of the Fujimori government in 1990. He is the alleged “architect” of a military coup in 1992. [LANE, C., 9-22-2000, p. A37] “When an ostensible democracy had been restored,” notes Charles Lane, “its revamped institutions were stocked with people Montesinos controlled through classic institutions of espionage: bibl-ery and blackmail. The previously obscure National Intelligence Services, known as SIN, emerged as the true source of power in Peru, and Montesinos ran it… Even prominent citizens lowered their voices when they mentioned his name … [There are] credible charges of death squads [against Montesinos], drug payoffs, and, most recently, large scale electoral fraud that the two [Montesinos and Fujimori] had faced.” [LANE, C., 9-22-200] “Human rights groups and United States senators,” noted the Los Angeles Times, “also have expressed concern over allegations linking Montesinos to slayings and torture of leftists and turncoat spies. Critics accuse him of masterminding the alleged dirty tricks that brought international condemnation on the presidential election.” [ROSELLA/TARNAWIECKI, 9-16-2000, pt. 1, p. A1]

An earlier defeated presidential candidate, novelist Mario Vargas Llosa, writes that the Peruvian “regime [is] manipulated from behind the scenes by the all-powerful and sinister Vladimiro Montesinos.” [LLOSA, M., 4-4-2000, p. B1] “Brazilian police,” reported Deutsche Presse-Agentur, “believe [Montesinos] is involved in drug trafficking.” [GROTH, H., 7-25-97]

In Chile, the principles of Salvador Allende’s early 1970s Marxist government (overthrown in large part by the CIA) “were in part designed by Senator Volodia Teitelboim, chief strategist of Chile’s Communist party who as a youth had belonged to Hashomer Hatzair, the left wing of the Zionist movement.” Other Jews in Allende governmental posts were David Baytelman, David Silberman, Jaime Faivoich, Jacobo Schaulsohn, Enrique Kirberg, Enrique Testa, and Luis Vega. [ELKIN, p. 268] By the 1970s about 30,000 Jews lived in Chile. The commander of the Chilean air force was Jewish, notes Jewish historian Howard Sachar,

“As was Chile’s ambassador to Israel. Two or three hundred other Jews held administrative positions [in government], served as deans and department chairmans in the nation’s universities … Here, as elsewhere in the West, Zionism served as the binding integument of Jewish life.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 275, 276]

How deep is this commitment to Israel? Former President of the American Jewish Congress, Joachim Prinz, once noted the allegiance of the so-called “secret Jews,” people of Jewish heritage who had been living for generations as Christians in Chile:

“Once, in 1950, when I delivered a lecture in Santiago, Chile, I was asked to receive a delegation of apparently good, faithful Christians who were collecting money for the purchase of land in Israel through the Jewish National Fund. They confessed that this was their link to their Jewish past. When I asked how they knew about their heritage they said, ‘Our fathers passed it down to us, as they received this knowledge from their parents and grandparents. We recognized each other because each of us observed the Sabbath, fasted on the Day of Atonement and kept other Jewish customs.’ Today this group of Marranos [‘secret Jews’] call themselves Sons of Zion and have emigrated to Argentina, where they live in a commune in preparation for their emigration to Israel.” [PRINZ, J., 1973, p. 5]
In Argentina, the American Jewish Yearbook noted in 1987 that “right-wing members of the military and rightist elements of the Catholic Church and the Peronist trade unions charged that [earlier president Raul] Alfonsin’s government was in the hands of the so-called Sinagoga Radical (Radical synagogue), referring to the large number of Jews in high-level government positions … Among Jews who occupied prominent positions in the government were Marcos Aguinis, secretary of culture and advisor to the president, and later the person responsible for organizing the First National Educational Congress; Cesar Jaroslavsky, president of the Radical Civic Union bloc in the Chamber of Deputies; Bernardo Grinspun, the first minister of the economy in Alfonsin’s cabinet; Leopoldo Portnoi, president of the Central Bank; Jacobo Fiterman, public works commissioner in the Buenos Aires city administration … Fiterman had earlier been president of the Zionist Organization and head of the local United Jewish Appeal, called CUJA.”

[SINGER, D., 1989, p. 72]

The appointment of Aguinis, a “well-known Jewish psychoanalyst and writer,” as cultural minister “enraged the Catholic Church and its allies.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 264-265]

Other Alfonsin-era Jewish prominent officials included the Treasury Secretary (Mario Brodersohn), the Minister of Education (Adolfo Stubrin), the Secretary of State for Science and Technology (Manuel Sadosky), the Undersecretary of State for Information and Development (Robert Schteingart), the Undersecretary for Research and Administrative Reform (Oscar Oszlak), and the rector of the University of Buenos Aires (Oscar Shuberoff). [ELKIN, J. 1998, p. 264] (Earlier, Polish-born Jose Ber Gelbard was a controversial Minister of Economics).

“The warm acceptance of Jews by the Alfonsin regime,” notes David Singer, “was evident not only in the conspicuous presence of Jewish individuals within the government but in specific indications of support for Jewish issues.” [SINGER, D., 1989, p. 272] This increasing warmth to Jews in Argentine business and government prompted a right-wing general, Ramon Campos, to publish “a book in which he charged the Jewish banking interests were subverting the state and [he] warned of Zionist infiltration.” [ELKIN, J. 1998, p. 264] “Some Argentine military sectors,” wrote Jacobo Timerman in 1981,

“… at various times, [ha]ve voiced the need to avoid any expression of anti-Semitism, maintaining this as a tactical necessity … Their main argument in favor of avoidance of any suspicion of anti-Semitism invariably has been the need to avoid confrontation with the powerful Jewish community in the United States.” [TIMERMAN, J., 1981, p. 131]

Alfonsin’s successor through the 1990s, Carlos Menem, has had close Jewish advisors, particularly Samuel Muzykanski and Moises Iknonicoff. His Minister of Interior (Carlos Corach) and Deputy Justice Minister (Elias Jassan) are also Jewish. [ELKIN, J. 1998, p. 265] Celso Lafer was also Minister of Foreign Affairs.
and Israel Klabin the mayor of Rio de Janeiro in the 1990s. [ELKIN, 1998, p. 92] In 1989, the Jerusalem Post noted the visit of the Anti-Defamation League Morton Rosenthal (head of ADL’s Latin American division) to Israel:

“Newly-elected Argentine President Carlos Menem hopes to obtain American assistance in extracting his country from its current economic morass. Rosenthal noted in an interview here last week, ‘Menem is aware that Jewish opinion is important in Washington. Where economic and political help is concerned, we try to help our friends, and Argentina does need our help.’” [HOFFMAN, C.]

Decades earlier, under famed Argentine leader Juan Peron,

“Angel Borlenenghi was appointed Minister of Interior, Abraham Kirslavin became his subsecretary, and Liberto Rabinovitch was named a federal judge. Several Jews were allowed to hold responsible positions in Peron’s Justicialista Party.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 286]

The ambassador from Costa Rica to the United States is Jaime Daremblum, also Jewish. [LAKE, E., 3-31-2000, p. 21] as is Mexico’s Ambassador to the European Union, Jaime Zabludovsky. Mexico’s Secretary of Foreign Affairs is Jorge G. Castaneda (Gutman), also Jewish. [http://www.aztlan.net/mexziston.htm] In 2001, the Washington Post noted that “Jorge G. Castenda is Mexico’s Foreign Minister and [Andres] Rozental is one of his key troubleshooters. Together, they have played leading roles in engaging the United States and Mexico in their most serious negotiations in decades aimed at reforming their immigration policies … Casteneda, 48, and Rozental, 56, share the same mother – a Russian immigrant to the Mexico – and deep understanding of the United States … Casteneda, whose father was also foreign minister, is the intellectual author of much of [Mexican president Vicente] Fox’s thinking about the world … Named ambassador-at-large while continuing his consulting business, Rozental is often on the road … Rozental’s dual role has led to questions about whether his work on behalf of the government is benefiting his consulting clients … In his private office, overlooking the heart of Mexico City, Rozental [said]: ‘We are each other’s best friend … I don’t think many people know how close we are.’” [SULLIVAN/JORDAN, 8-28-01]

In October 2001, Ernesto Cienfuegas posted the following list in an article (see http://www.aztlan.net/castakip.htm) about Castenda:

In 2001, a Jewish ethnic newspaper featured an article about Mexico’s President, Vicente Fox, and his attendance at the American Jewish Committee’s annual dinner:

“When Barry Jacobs, a Foreign Service officer for 28 years and now director of strategic studies for the American Jewish Committee, learned that Mexican President Vicente Fox was to speak at the group’s annual dinner, he was more than surprised. ‘It’s mind-blowing,’ said Jacobs, who serves as AJ Committee’s liaison to the Mexican-Jewish community. “It was an incredible honor that he flew up for this event. Fox was eager to participate in the May 3 dinner, according to AJ Committee officials … Fox’s well-received speech – indeed, his mere presence at the event – reflects the growing importance that Mexico’s 40,000 Jews have obtained in their country, says observers. When AJ Committee visited Mexico in October and invited Fox, then the president-elect, to speak at their dinner, he accepted immediately … Jacobs said several members of Fox’s Cabinet have some Jewish background, even though Jews make up less than half of 1 percent of Mexico’s population. ‘The importance of the Jewish community in Mexico is that they are a small community doing well economically,’ Jacobs said.” [BERGER, M., 5-11-01]

In fact, the Finance Chairman for the Vicente Fox presidential campaign was also Jewish, Lino Korrodi. [http://www.aztlan.net/fox-funds.htm]

Even in a place like Guyana, in South America, Janet (Rosenberg) Jagan, who was born in Chicago and had married a prominent Guyanan, became that country’s president in 1998.
There are only 44,000 Jews living in Uruguay, but

“in recent decades, there have been Jewish senators, ministers and deputy ministers, directors of the Central Bank and the central tax collection office, a rector of the university. Uruguay was the first Latin American government to recognize Israel … The single lingering consequence of these political changes [a Uruguayan army coups] has been an intensification of Uruguayan Jewry’s Zionist commitment … Leaders of the Jewish institutions [in Uruguay] dutifully consult the Israeli ambassador – their status symbol – on matters not only related to Israel but to domestic Jewish affairs … Jewish education, both the day schools, and in some eleven Sunday schools, has remained Israel-centered.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 273]

In Brazil, notes Judith Elkin, where the 120,000 Jews represent less than one-tenth of one percent of the total Brazilian population, “Individuals from the important commercial families Lafer, Klabin, Moses, Bloch, and Levy have entered politics as ministers of state, bankers, and presidential advisers. There are Jews in numerous posts and in significant military positions.” [ELKIN, p. 269]

Horacio Laufer was the Brazilian Minister of Finance from 1949-1959. “In later years,” notes Howard Sachar, “Jews sat in state and municipal cabinets. Max Feffer … was appointed Secretary of Culture, Science and Technology for the state of Sao Paulo … His predecessor, Jose Mindlin, was also a Jew. Jews have been mayors of Curtiba and Rio de Janeiro, where squares and streets are named for [Zionist leaders] Theodore Herzl, David Ben-Gurion, Ann Frank and other Jews. There have been Jewish generals in the armed forces – six of them in 1966. The nation’s cultural life has been as widely influenced by the Jewish leaven as in any Western land, from the conductor of the national symphony orchestra to directors of state academies and institutes to deans of universities.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 258]

“This is a Zionist community,” noted Fiszel Czeresnia, chairman of Brazil’s Zionist Organization, in 1985, “Zionism animated every Jewish institution we have in this country.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 262] And as Howard Sachar adds about the political mood of the very affluent Jewish community in Brazil:

“With a few exceptions – mainly university students and a handful of progressives in the state and national legislature – Jews have not taken a stand on the nation’s horrifying economic inequities. Living in comparative prosperity, accepted by the elite strata of Brazilian society, they appear content with the political status quo. As in Chile and Argentina, the largest numbers of Brazilian Jews remain suspicious of populist democracy.” [SACHAR, H., 1985, p. 264]
In conclusion for this chapter, let us simply note the editorial of a London newspaper, The Sun, which in 2001 (in the wake of the results of widespread Western foreign policy that supports the Jewish state) declared its support for Israel in this chilling manner:

“Terrorism is now, without a doubt, the greatest scourge in the free world. It has to be fought with utter determination wherever it threatens us. As we are seeing in [the] Afghanistan [war] this is not a pleasant task. When the Americans turn their attentions to Iraq – as they must – it will get even more unpleasant. And when the Israelis defend themselves – as they must – it will not be pleasant either. But if we have learned anything from the New York attacks, we should have learned this: WE ARE ALL ISRAELIS NOW.” [Emphasis in the original; SUN, 2001]

Or as journalist Richard Brookhiser’s article in the New York Observer proclaimed, echoing this growing theme throughout America:

“We Are All Jews in Our Enemy’s Eyes.”

[New York Observer, May 4, 2002]*

“Israel’s claim to the Holy Land rests on the existence of God. If it was not God’s will that they possessed Canaan, the nations can reproach them as mere conquering brigands.”

Herman Wouk, Jewish novelist, p. 186

“Is Zionism racism? I would say yes. It’s a policy that to me looks like it has very many parallels with racism. The effect is the same. Whether you call it that or not is in a sense irrelevant.”

Desmond Tutu, South African Archbishop and activist against apartheid, [in HOFFMAN, p. 15]

“Passionate hatred can give meaning and purpose to an empty life. Thus people haunted by the purposelessness of their lives to try to find a new content not only by dedicating themselves to a holy cause but also by nursing a fanatical grievance.”

Eric Hoffer, The True Believer, 1963, p. 102

“Zionism … must after Auschwitz be a Christian commitment as well [as a Jewish one] … The post-Holocaust Christian must repent of the Christian sin of suppressionism … Without Zionism, Christian as well as Jewish, the Holy Spirit cannot dwell between Jews and Christians in dialogue … Christians after the Holocaust, we have seen, must be Zionists on behalf not only of Jews but also of Christianity itself.”

Emil Fackenheim, Jewish author, p. 285, 305

“If power corrupts, the reverse is also true; persecution corrupts the victims though perhaps in subtler and more tragic ways.”

Arthur Koestler, [in GILMAN, p. 33]

“Is there anything more common than the transformation of persecuted into persecutor … ?

Maxime Rodinson, p. 9

“In the twentieth century, men – all of us – find themselves compelled to commit or condone evil for the sake of preventing an evil believed to be greater. And the tragedy is that we do not know whether the evil we condone will not in the end be greater than the evil we seek to avert – or be identified with.”

Emil Fackenheim, [in BELL, p. 317]
“If Israelis know about oppression, it is mostly from the oppressor’s end of the gun sight.”

Benjamin Beit Hallahmi, Israeli professor at Haifa University “

One of the major problems with Israeli democracy is that it has no constitutional guarantees of human rights. To my knowledge it’s the only functioning democracy without such provision.”

Asa Kasher, Israeli philosopher, [in BRANDT, J., 2000, p. 10]

“Israel is working on a biological weapon that would harm Arabs but not Jews, according to Israeli military and western intelligence sources … In developing their “ethno-bomb,” Israeli scientists are trying to exploit medical advances by identifying genes carried by some Arabs, then create a genetically modified bacterium or virus. The intention is to use the ability of viruses and certain bacteria to alter the DNA inside their host’s living cells. The scientists are trying to engineer deadly micro-organisms that attack only those bearing the distinctive genes. The programme is based at the biological institute in Nes Tziyona, the main research facility for Israel’s clandestine arsenal of chemical and biological weapons. A scientist there said the task was hugely complicated because both Arabs and Jews are of semitic origin. But he added: “They have, however, succeeded in pinpointing a particular characteristic in the genetic profile of certain Arab communities, particularly the Iraqi people.” The disease could be spread by spraying the organisms into the air or putting them in water supplies. The research mirrors biological studies conducted by South African scientists during the apartheid era and revealed in testimony before the truth commission. The idea of a Jewish state conducting such research has provoked outrage in some quarters because of parallels with the genetic experiments of Dr Josef Mengele, the Nazi scientist at Auschwitz.”

“A good many Israelis see that if conflict with the Arabs continues, they are in danger of becoming like the Germans from 1933 to 1945 – accomplices if not perpetrators of permanent oppression.”

Norman Birnbaum, Why, p. M5

“The ‘Israeli criterion’ as the key indicator in assessing anti-Semitic has increasingly been widened. The label of anti-Semite is no longer limited to those who reject the legitimacy of the Jewish state. Criticism of Israeli governmental policies and actions has also entered into the calculus … As the ‘Israeli criterion’ for evaluating anti-Semitism has become broader, it has more and more impaled individuals and groups on the liberal-to-left of the political spectrum on the charge of anti-Semitism.”

Arthur Liebman, 1986, p. 352
“Nor is there solid evidence that marginality increases humaneness. Freud felt that, on the contrary, Jewish history had produced some negative psychological results. In his essay, Some Character Types Met with in Psychoanalytic Work, he discusses the ‘exception’: the person who justifies his rebelliousness and claims special favor to himself by some injury he has suffered and of which he considers himself blameless. Such people, Freud notes, often feel quite justified in injuring others. He refers to Shakespeare’s Richard III as a prime example of the type. In the midst of this discussion Freud notes: ‘For reasons which will easily be understood I cannot communicate very much about these and other case histories. Nor do I propose to go into the obvious analogy between deformities of character resulting from protracted sickness in childhood, and the behavior of whole nations, whose past has been full of suffering.’ As [Jewish psychoanalyst] Theodore Reik points out, the reference is obviously to Jews.”

“The elements of the Jewish heritage that are hostile to non-Jews have long been known to the world, and anti-Semitic writings quote them at length. Until recently few would have seriously asserted that these passages reflect the opinions of Jews in our own generation. But, when religious extremists inject a contemporary relevance into these passages … they acquire a new and dangerous significance. They provide ammunition for anti-Semites, who can assert that the true Jewish character is revealed not when Jews are subjugated in Christian or Muslim societies, but precisely when they are free. It is in their natural environment, not in subjugation, that they dare disclose their true face, and the nations of the world must redefine their attitudes in view of the strong Jews rather than the impotent Jews.”

“It may be the case that [post-Holocaust] the authentic Jewish agnostic and the authentic Jewish believer are closer than at any previous time.”

Emil Fackenheim, Jewish theologian, in Sack, J., p. 135

The central symbol of Jewish identity today is the nation of Israel, the magnet of international Jewish loyalty and allegiance, an obsessive attraction that is difficult for most non-Jews to fathom. Ironically, even relatively few Jews living out of Israel know many details about the Jewish state; large numbers of diaspora Jews know only the religious or Zionist legends about the place, both views grounded in the myths of Jewish martyrology and redemption. “The vast majority of Jews have no familiarity with the currents of Israeli cultural and even political life,” notes Charles Liebman, “… Those that are devoted to Israel generally focus on the external threat [by non-Jewish nations against Israel] rather than the internal features of Israeli society.” [LIEBMAN, Rel Trends, p. 306] “American Jews … are not interested or knowledgeable [about Israel] as is frequently assumed,” says Chaim Waxman, “… In a number of surveys of American Jewish attitudes toward Israel, most of them are quite ignorant not only of Hebrew but of the basic aspects of Israeli society and culture. In a 1986 national sample, only one-third of American Jews were aware of such elementary facts as that Menachem Begin and Shimon Peres are not from the same political party, that Conservative and Reform rabbis cannot officiate weddings in Israel, and that Arab Israeli and Jewish Israeli children do not generally go to the same schools.” [WAXMAN, p. 136] Ze’ev Chafets, an American Jew who moved to live permanently in Israel in 1967, notes that

“During the first few months in Jerusalem, I found I knew very little about Arabs – and not much more about Jews … In the states I had been considered pretty Jewish by my friends … but in Israel I suddenly found myself little more than a tourist in what I increasingly wanted to see as my own country.” [CHAFETS, p. 15-16]

An “age-old ritual” for American Jews who visit Israel is to pay the Jewish National Fund $10 and plant a tree in honor or memory of a friend or relative. Preying on diaspora sentiment, it is a $50 million-per year business. In 2000 it was discovered by the Israeli newspaper Ma’ariv that workers at the popular Jerusalem planting site “cynically uproot the saplings planted by tourists to make way for the new day’s busloads.” [SONTAG, D., 7-3-2000, p. A4]

“Many American Jews,” says Charles Liebman, a professor in Israel, “… have created their own conception of Israel. This is the chunk of Israel that they see and/or imagine they see or they are shown when they visit Israel. Even when they stay for an extended period of time. I am impressed by how vivid this partial image remains. It is not an Israel of self-serving and inept leaders, of a rude populace, and … an xenophobic culture. Rather, it is a society that excludes universalist sentiment wrapped in symbols of Jewish particularism.” [LIEB-
For most Jews, notes Adam Garfinkle, “Israel is more of an icon than a real place [GARFINKEL, p. 144] … The Jewish sensibility and the Israeli sensibility is suffused with metaphors of chosenness, slavery, exile (galut), wandering in the wilderness, liberation, a covenant over the land of Israel, and the redemption of it, that resound from Biblical narratives.” [GARFINKEL, p. 22]

Many prominent Zionists have restrained, or hidden, fundamental Jewish ethnocentric sentiments to declare pan-human messianic statements about the Jewish state that are, in historical context, as we shall soon see, ludicrous. “Zionism,” insisted Solomon Goldman, president of the Zionist Organization of America, “… became a demonstration without parallel of the creative power of justice and democracy.” [GAL, A., 1986, p. 381]

Over time, notes Jonathan Sarna, “the Zion [Israel] of the American Jewish imagination, in short, became something of a fantasy land: a seductive heaven-on-earth, where enemies were vanquished, guilt assuaged, hopes realized, and deeply felt longings satisfied.” [SARNA, A Proj, p. 41-42] Marc Ellis, in discussing the work of Israeli author Avishai Margalit, notes that “In the Jewish context a glimpse of Masada, or the Wall, or the Temple Mount is enough to move the ‘Jewish heart,’ and the marketing of Israel takes full advantages of these images. Kitsch can also be politicized and become, in Margalit’s terms, part of state ideology whose ‘emblem is total innocence.’” [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 34]

Colin Shindler notes the widespread Jewish American efforts to mythify the Jewish homeland and control its depiction in the world mass media:

“The ‘Israel’ that was promoted [after 1967] tended to be one of unreal, utopian dimensions, where public relations had replaced reality … Obsession with the media spawned new organizations, expensive consultants and vigilante journalists to cope with real and imaginary anti-Israel bias in the press.” [SHINDLER, p. 96-97]

In 2001, during an extended Palestinian uprising against Israel occupation, when Israeli brutality against Palestinians was becoming difficult to veil, the Jewish state hired a New York public relations company – Rubenstein Associates – to control popular perceptions about the place. To improve Israel’s image, Rubenstein suggested less security guards around prime minister Ariel Sharon and painting Israeli weapons used on Palestinian rioters orange “to make it clear to television viewers that solders are firing nonlethal rounds.” Cleaning up after Arab riots was also thought to make for a better image on TV. “But Palestinian officials and young boys interviewed at the Ayosh junction in the West Bank town of Ramallah,” noted the Baltimore Sun, “one place singled out by Rubenstein as a problem area, say the proposals prove Israel would rather save face than save lives.” [HERMANN, P., 6-29-01]

An Israeli scholar, Boaz Evron, notes that many American Jews “feel … an obligation toward Israel … Israel, for them, is not … a political space devoted to the continuation of a normal national life, but a historical revenge … [EVRON, p. 110-112] … Perhaps a main factor in Israel’s psychological hold on the Jewish Diaspora is that part of the Diaspora that has lost its religious framework but has remained locked within the Jewish caste and uses Israel as a means of venting its complexes by proxy. These Jews imagine themselves to be part of the Israeli people, while maintaining their own comfortable existence in the Diaspora … thus Israel deliberately helps Diaspora Jews maintain an illusory existent identity. It is in the obvious interests of the Israeli leadership to prevent such an honest self-appraisal which might lead to a different, genuine Jewish identity.” [EVRON, p. 112]

Jewish American commentator Joyce Starr notes that “American Jews may talk about Israel extensively, petition on the nation’s behalf, and give generously from their bank accounts, but this does not mean they ‘know’ Israel. American Jews read voraciously about the country and are familiar with the Dead Sea, Jerusalem, and the Green Line [that separates Israel from the West Bank]. Yet the human perspective is all but out of reach.” [STARR, 1990, p. 147]

In paraphrasing the comments of the chairman of the North American Jewish Forum, Starr also asserts that the American Jewish-Israel relationship

“was built with the consent of the leadership in both places for their own convenience. Israel needed emigration, as well as political and financial support, whereas American Jewry was engrossed in establishing the infrastructure of a burgeoning Jewish community in the United States. The way to accomplish both objectives was to build a black-and-white stereotype of Israel as either an idealized society or as a society with security problems. These stereotypes, in turn, stimulated philanthropy and political action.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 151]

In 1998, Rabbi Marvin Hier (of Simon Wiesenthal Center/Museum of Tolerance fame) censored an in-house movie at his Moriah Films center. Entitled “A Dream No More,” the film was scheduled to be shown at various sites on the occasion of Israel’s fiftieth anniversary celebration. Hier scrapped the project because it wasn’t flattering enough to the Jewish state. To the film’s directors (Mark Harris and Stuart Schoffman), noted the Jerusalem Post, “the demise of Dream reflects, at bottom, the unwillingness of American Jews to face the realities of Israeli life and history as a mixture of light and shadow.” [TUGEND, T., 11-16-98, p. 7]

“Zionism conjured up a grand vision of ardent young men and women earnestly engaged in the selfless task of creating and new and better humanity,” says Jonathan Sarna, “this utopian view of Zionism, linked as it was both to the self-image of American Jews and to their highest religious aspirations, had less and less to do with the realities of the Middle East … All of the historic American Jewish images of Israel – from the early image of agrarian pioneers, to the twentieth-century image of the ‘model state’ – spoke to the needs of American Jews and reflected their ideals and fantasies, rather than the contemporary realities of Jewish life in the land of Israel.” [SARNA, J., p. 58]

“Israel became a wellspring for a variety of enriching experiences and myths,” says Sylvia Barack-Fishman, “– paradoxically, making American Jews feel both more Jewish and more physically empowered in the western world.”
“If American Jews were denied … opportunities to act out vigilance for Israel,” wonders Israeli Bernard Avishai, “what would be left of their Judaism? … Is it possible that American Jews now need to invent anti-Semites to feel like Jews?” [AVISHAI, B., p. 353]

As Israeli Boas Evron observes:

“When you try to explain to American Jews that we [Israelis] are not, in fact, in danger of annihilation [from Arabs], that for many years to come we will be stronger than any possible combination, that Israel has not, in fact, been in danger of physical annihilation since the first cease-fire of the War of Independence in 1948, and that the average human and cultural level of Israeli society, even in its current deteriorated state, is still much higher than that of the surrounding Arab society, and that this level rather than the quantity and sophistication of our arms constitutes our military advantage – you face resistance and outrage. And then you realize another fact: this image is needed by many American Jews in order for them to free themselves of their guilt regarding the Holocaust. Moreover, supporting Israel is necessary because of the loss of another focal point to their Jewish identity … They need to feel needed. They also need the ‘Israeli hero’ as a social and emotional compensation in a society in which the Jew is not usually perceived as embodying the characteristics of the tough, manly fighter. Thus, the Israeli provides the American Jew with a double, contradictory image – the virile superman, and the potential Holocaust victim – both of whose components are far from reality.” [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 37]

“American Jews aren’t usually aware of their ignorance about us,” an Israeli “intellectual” told (new Jewish American immigrant to Israel) Wendy Orange on her sixth night in the Jewish state, “Why do you people always superimpose your fantasies on our reality?” [original author’s emphases: ORANGE, W., 2000, p. 25] Jewish American Joyce Starr recalls addressing an audience of “major donors of one of the largest American Jewish organizations” and making the mistake of mentioning some problems in Israel. “The hostess of the event,” notes Starr, “became visibly furious … So glacial was the reception [to me] … An elderly grandmother-type finally took pity on my shock and confusion. ‘Darling, you must understand,’ she comforted. ‘Everything you said is true, but you never should have said it here.’” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 140]

“I used to conduct a program involving UJA-Federation young leadership types, called ‘Images of Israel,’” says Jonathan Woocher, “It was kind of a Thematic Apperception Test, using photographs to elicit responses regarding attitudes towards Israel. What has always astounded me was the enormous range of values, attitudes, and emotions that American Jews were projecting onto Israel – Israel the heroic, Israel the threatened, Israel the bearer of ancient traditions, and so on. To be sure, those are pieces of the reality, but the responses were more interesting for what they revealed of the respondents: indeed, Israel was being used to help American Jews make sense of their own identity. To me that is clearly something which is not a basis for a healthy relationship.” [WOOCHER, 1990, p. 33]
The large numbers of Jews from Israel living in the United States are even a source of aggravation for some American Jews, whose myths prefer that the emigrants remain happy in the Jewish homeland as role-model Zionists. “American Jews,” says Israeli Moshe Shokeid, “… are bewildered by the presence of Israelis in their midst … American Jews who want to restore the categories and definitions which constitute the order and values of the respective Israeli, Jewish, and Zionist identities, employ a subtle strategy: they ignore the yordim [Israelis in America], they avoid associating with them, and express that disdain and resentment as much as their code of civility allows.” Some American Jews refer to Israelis in America as “Fish,” “the abbreviations stand for ‘fucking Israeli shithead.”’ [SHOKEID, 1998, p. 507] By 1981, the World Jewish Congress estimated the number of yordim in the U.S. to be between 300,000 and 500,000 – “perhaps one for every six Israelis living in Israel. They create a difficult situation for Diaspora Jews, partly because of the yordim’s own sense of embarrassment, and partly because Israel denigrates them and is embarrassed by the undiagnosed phenomenon they represent.” [WALINSKY, L., 1981, p. 67]

Among the most important nationalist legends in the modern state of Israel (and for many in the international Jewish community) has been the story of Masada. In Israeli/Jewish lore, 900 Jewish zealots nobly defended themselves for months against attack and then committed mass suicide at a remote desert fortress near the Dead Sea in 73 AD rather than surrender to besieging Roman legions. The Masada tale of desperate Jewish warriors has popularly been regarded as historical fact and has served as heroic symbol – a “last stand” in Jewish collective consciousness, a story where Jews who were revolting against Roman domination chose to die for their Jewish heritage rather than suffer oppression at the hands of Gentiles. Masada has embodied a range of traditional Jewish beliefs: Jewry as a “nation apart” against all others, the few against the many, Jewish heroism against Gentile hordes, and dedication to each other to the point of death as itself a noble endeavor. Masada story has long been a source of Jewish and Israeli pride, especially since the founding of modern Israel in 1948. “Masada is not just a story,” notes Israeli historian Nachum Ben-Yehuda, “Masada provides, certainly for my generation of Israelis, an important ingredient in the very definition of our Jewishness and Israeli ‘identity.’” [BENVENISTI, p. 35] “Masada,” writes Yitzhak Landau in his famous patriotic poem to Israel and Jewish solidarity, “shall not fall again.” [BENYEHUDA, p. 5]

Astoundingly, however, the Masada legend of courageous Jewish defenders is false. Its historical basis was distorted and embellished to serve the propagandistic needs of early Israeli nation-building. Nachum Ben-Yehuda wrote an entire volume in 1995 that catalogues, not only that the heroic version of the Masada story is not true, but that it was consciously fabricated to serve Israeli propaganda about Jewish identity, especially in the early post-Holocaust period when the Jews of Europe were perceived to have so passively met their fate at the hands of Hitler.

Virtually everything modern scholarship knows about Masada comes from the writings of Flavius Josephus, a man – who born a Jew – joined the Romans and is generally considered in Jewish circles to be a traitor to his people (an odd source for heroizing ancient Jewry). A close reading of him, notes Ben-Yehuda, reveals that the “zealots” of Masada were actually Sicarri – “assassins,” of both Romans and Jews. The reason they fled to Masada was, not because they were fighting Roman domination, but that they were driven out of Jerusalem by fellow Jews. The Sicarri then “raided nearby Jewish villages, killed the inhabitants, and took their food.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 9] They killed about 700 Jews in Ein Gedi alone, “mostly women and children.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 36]

From this core of information about Masada’s dubious “defenders” provided by Josephus, Israeli propagandists “socially constructed a shrine for Jewish martyrdom and heroism” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 190] whereby the entire nation of modern Israel was itself conceived as a Masada, isolated defenders against gentile hostility towards Jews everywhere, “a symbol of the heroism of Israel for all generations … [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 87] … Masada was not destroyed. It became a symbol of the Jewish will to live as a nation, of refusal to surrender to the forces threatening its extinction.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 123] “In the late fifties and early sixties,” says Meron Benvenisti, “Masada became a national shrine.” [BENVENISIT, p. 38]

Yet, “the Masada mythical narratives,” adds Ben-Yehuda, “was consciously invented, fabricated, and supported by key moral entrepreneurs and organizations in the Yishuv [Israeli community] … [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 307] … [While Masada’s defenders were really] “thieves and assassins who robbed and killed other Jews.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 300] For years, Israeli army recruits were taken to the ruins of the Masada fortress to swear allegiance to the Jewish state, ritually stating “endless devotion” to Israel at this “place of splendor, glory and majesty.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 147] And Israeli newspaper in 1964 called Masada Israel’s “most cherished national asset” and the “mausoleum of the saints of the nation.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 185] A popular patriotic slogan became “Masada shall not fall again.” The Mossad’s assassination division was even called “Masada.”

Home of a band of fleeing Jewish murderers or not, the Masada story has not been without its Jewish critics on other terms. The idea of Israel itself as a veritable Masada country, a garrison state with a desperate back-to-the-wall “we against them” worldview (sometimes described as the “Masada complex”) has worried some Israeli commentators. Is collective suicide an appropriate role model for any people? How would this affect Israeli self-conception and behavior in the nuclear bomb world? Is an alienated “last stand” psychology a healthy premise to interact with the rest of the world? Seymour Hersh quotes the comments of an ‘expert who has been involved in government studies on the nuclear issue in the Middle East for two decades: “Israel has a well thought-out nuclear strategy and, if sufficiently threatened, they will use it.” [HERSH, S., p. 92] “Many senior nonproliferation officials in the American government,” adds Hersh, “were convinced by the early 1990s that the Middle East remained the one place where nuclear weapons might be used [i.e., no other Middle Eastern country has nuclear weapons except Israel].” [HERSH, p. 92]
“Our nationalists are leading us to Masada,” once complained famed tank commander Yitzhak Ben-Ari, “in the sense that ‘all the world is against us. We shall fight, and if we have a nuclear bomb, we shall use it.’ And what will remain for us? Nothing.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 157] “It is unavoidable,” worried Israeli historian Benyamin Kedar, “that [nationalist] behavior influenced by identification with Masada will indeed resuscitate it. If the entire world is against us, then one begins to behave as if we are against the entire world and such behavior is bound to lead to ever-increasing isolation.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 246]

It is clear that this Masada model is, of course, merely a secular, militant expression of the traditional religious “nation apart” syndrome itself, Jewish enclaves throughout history self-ghettoized against the non-Jewish Other. And as for the Masada myth itself, “time after time,” notes Ben-Yehuda, Jews who are told that the Masada story of heroism is fake “elicit expressions ranging from mild discomfort to (much more frequently) anger and open hostility. My worse encounters have typically been with [Israeli] history teachers … Obviously, the realization that a major element of one’s personal and national identity was based on a biased and falsified myth is not an easy thing to deal with.” [BEN-YEHUDA, p. 311]

Among the many forms of Masada mythologizing, in this case for American popular consumption, was a 1970 “historical novel,” Masada, subtitled A Novel of Love, Courage, and the Triumph of the Human Spirit, by Ernest Ganz, described by a Kirkus Reviews reviewer as “a return to the days of heroes larger than life.” It was also the subject of an “8-hour TV epic from ABC-TV and Universal.” [GANN, back cover and opening page] The Masada myth also saw American expression in 1987 when Jewish American Marvin David Levy, recently released after a two year prison term for his role in a drug smuggling ring, watched the Chicago Symphony Orchestra perform his “dramatic oratorio, Masada, in its newly expanded version.” The work, noted the Chicago Tribune, “emphasizes the triumph and tragedy of a heroic band that chose individual liberty at great personal cost.” [VON RHEIM, J., p. 26]

In 1971 Michael Rosenberg summarized American Jewry’s irrational views of Israel succinctly:

“Israel is the ultimate reality in the life of every living Jew today. I believe that Israel surpasses in importance Jewish ritual. It is more than the Jewish tradition; and, in fact, it is more than the Mosaic law itself. The anti-religious Jew who supports Israel is welcomed as a Jew and as an integral part of the community. The observant Jew who does not accept the centrality of Israel is not accepted and is rarely even tolerated. In dealing with those who oppose Israel, we are not reasonable and we are not rational. Nor should we be.” [ROSENBERG, M., p. 82]

While Jews have a deeply internalized millennium-old mythology about the place, a crucial instrument in formulating a more broadly favorable opinion about Israel in America among non-Jews is the mass media. In the 1950s the New York public relations company of Edward Gottleib commissioned a Jewish author, Leon Uris, to write a novel “to create a more sympathetic attitude towards Israel.” [FINDLEY, p. xxv] This novel, Exodus, published in 1958, “did more to popularize Israel with the American public,” says public relations expert Art Stevens, “than any other single presentation in the media.” [FINDLEY, p. xxvi] Until Exodus, most Americans knew nothing about Zionism or the new nation of Israel. Most still have the same essential ignorance, but Uris’s novel became number one on the New York Times best seller list for nineteen weeks and became, notes Edward Tivnan, “the primary source of knowledge about Jews and Americans that most Americans had.” [TIVNAN, P. 51] The New York Times described the book when it first came out as “a passionate summary of the inhuman treatment of the Jewish people in Europe, the exodus in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to Palestine, and the triumphant founding of the new Israel.” [TIVNAN, p. 51] This “new Israel” was founded out of a victorious war against Arab armies in 1948. “In books, movies, and TV shows in the 1950s and 1960s,” says Stephen Green, “the Jewish state was depicted as having defeated the Arabs against overwhelming odds, contrary to virtually every professional strength estimate of the opposing forces that were made at the time of the war itself.” [GREEN, S, p. 75] “Shortly before the outbreak of [the 1967] war in June, President Lyndon Johnson’s intelligence experts debated whether it would take a week or ten days for Israel to demolish its enemies.” [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 148]

The hardcover Exodus edition was still in print in the 1990s; a paperback edition was still going strong at its sixty-third printing. Uris, a high school drop-out who flunked three English classes and joined the marines at the age of seventeen, is boldly self-referential in a later novel, Mitla Pass (1988). Here an Israeli official says to the novel’s main character, a Jewish author, that “this would be the first American novel about Israel. It could be valuable in gaining favorable world opinion.” [URIS, L., Mitla, p. 304] In real life, even David Ben Gurion, one of Israel’s most revered prime ministers, said that “as a piece of propaganda [Exodus] is still the greatest thing ever written about Israel.” [WHITFIELD, p. 77] “Although propaganda novels have occasionally punctuated the history of United States mass taste,” writes Stephen Whitfield, “Exodus was unprecedented.” [WHITFIELD, p. 77] The prominent Jewish novelist, Saul Bellow, observed that “admittedly, some people say Exodus was not much of a novel, but it was extraordinarily effective as a document and we need such documents now. We do not need stories like those of [fellow Jewish novelist] Philip Roth which expose unpleasant Jewish traits.” [WHITFIELD, p. 79]

Then came the Hollywood film based on the novel. “Uris had the blessings of Hollywood before he wrote the book,” notes Stephen Whitfield, “MGM had commissioned a novel about the birth of the Third Jewish Commonwealth [modern Israel] because it expected that a best seller would lengthen the lines at the box office.” [WHITFIELD, p. 164] Pat Boone sang, “This land is mine, God gave it to me” in the Exodus sound track and there was such media-enflamed interest in the subject that Israel’s El Al airlines created a 16-day tourist package that led visitors on a pilgrimage to the sites where Otto Preminger made his movie. [WHITFIELD, p. 79] “People are the same no matter what they’re called,” says Eva Marie Saint in the movie. “Don’t believe it,” replies Paul Newman, “People have the right to be different.” [WHITFIELD, p. 164] “In Exodus,” notes Whitfield, “[the Jewish hero] battles not for the cause of democracy, nor for some cosmopolitan ideal of brotherhood, but as an unabashed [Jewish] nationalist.” [WHITFIELD, p. 164]

The book has sold, to date, over 20 million copies. [BREINES, p. 56] “All my life I’ve heard I’m supposed to be a coward because I’m a Jew,” the American Jewish captain of the ship, the Exodus, tells a Gentile nurse in the novel, “Let me tell you, kid. Every time the Palmach [a Jewish military branch in Palestine] blows up a British depot or knocks the hell out of some Arabs he’s winning respect for me. He’s making a liar out of everyone who tells me Jews are yellow. The guys over there are fighting my battle for respect … understand that?” [CHAFETS, p. 218] The real-life Israeli captain, Yeheil Aranowicz, of the blockade-running ship, the Exodus, upon which the novel is based, was subsequently quoted as saying that “the type [of characters in the novel] never existed in Israel. The novel is neither history or literature.” Informed of Captain Aranowicz’s authoritative judgements, Uris responded, “Captain who? And that’s all I have to say. I’m not going to pick on a light weight. Just look at my sales figures.” [BREINES, p. 55] Whatever the case, says Edward Tivnan, “the Israel of most Americans, including Jews, is still the Exodus version.” [BREINES, p. 56]

As Israeli writers Herbert Russcol and Margalit Banai noted in 1970 about the (overwhelmingly Jewish) illusory depictions of Israel:

“It may be better to rely upon the views of foreign [non-Israeli] observers, but most of them are too sympathetic [to Israel]. Their hearts are in the right places and they love us too much to see us plain. They are blinded by their gallant cause. In all the books written about Israel by outsiders there are never whores or alcoholics or greedy bankers or black marketers. There are only hero-farmers with a plow in one hand and a rifle in the other. We emerge from their pages rather like the cloth-dolls-of-Israel types which are sold in the souvenir shops of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv – here is the happy kibbutznik, the attractive girl soldier, the earlocked Jerusalemite, the quaint new immigrant from Yemen.” [RUSSCOL/BANAI, 1970, p. x]

Such views still persist, dominantly, with the widespread help of an institutionalized suppression of counter views to the alleged Israeli reality. Results of a 1987 Roper Poll during the Intifada [Palestinian uprising] era, noted a Jewish scholar, “reveal positive attitudes towards Israel and American Jews on the part of the American public.” These findings “are consistent with previous Roper results, [and] suggest that recent events, including the Iran-Contra affair, the Ivan Boesky insider trading scandal, and the Jonathan Pollard spy case have had little negative fall-out as far as attitudes towards Israel and American Jews are concerned.” [TOBIN, p. 50] Jewish pollster Lewis Harris noted in an interview in 1986 that “support for Israel is high despite all the controversies, just as it’s always been. At present, 78% of Americans feel very warm to Israel.” [TOBIN,
In the Jewish community itself, during the Intifada, “at the largest annual meeting of American Jews, the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Organizations … the Intifada was scarcely more than a side issue on the agenda.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 199]

In 1979, Edward Said, a prominent Palestinian-American professor at Columbia University, was troubled by the growing use of Jewish Holocaust mythologies in the media towards latent political ends:

“Anyone who watched the spring 1978 NBC presentation of Holocaust [by Graham Greene] was aware that at least part of the program was intended as a justification for Zionism – even while at about the same time Israeli troops in Lebanon produced devastation, thousands of civilian casualties, and untold suffering.” [SAID, Palestine, p. 55]

More generally, Jewish anti-Zionist Alfred Lilienthal condemned the dominant pro-Israel slant in the American mass media:

“Zionism did not waste time or energy on proving its extreme program to be morally and historically sound. All it had to do was to equate it with man’s compassion for the victims of history’s most cruel pogrom … The capture of the American press by Jewish nationalism was, in fact, incredibly complete. Magazines as well as newspapers, news stories, as well as editorial columns, gave primarily the Zionist view of events, before, during, and after Partition [of Palestine, creating a Jewish state].” [LILIENTHAL, p. 122]

Rabbi Jonathan and Judith Pearl note popular television's steady diet of pro-Israel emphasis:

“In a bit of serendipitous timing, the rebirth of the state of Israel and the establishment of a nationwide network television in America took place in the same year, 1948. Since then, these two phenomena have been inextricably linked, as scores of television dramas, comedies, and mini-series have turned to Israel and its stunning and turbulent history for subject matter. Many of these images have continued to be in the tradition of popular television, which has generally portrayed Jewish themes in a positive light … [PEARL/PEARL p. 173] … A sense of admiration for the Jewish state informs nearly all portrayals of Israel on American popular television over the past fifty years … Confidence in Israel’s ability to survive and thrive, and praise for its doing so, permeates television’s portrayal of Israel in a way that has seen little, if any, waverer or hesitation from the earliest years of network television until the present time. Almost invariably, these depictions include the expressing of much admiration by non-Jews for Israel’s heroism, achievements, and pioneer spirit.” [PEARL/PEARL p. 193]

After Israel’s Six Day War with Arab states in 1967, notes Amnon Rubenstein, “the reaction of the world press was so overtly pro-Israel … that it worried western diplomats in Arab capitals and forced Arab propagandists to radically alter their stand vis-a-vis the Jewish state.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 158]

Leon Hadar notes in overview that “Many of the same American Jews who led the fight against US intervention in Vietnam, and supported an unconditional withdrawal of US forces, ignore or defend the long and bloody Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, and the mistreatment of Palestinian population there. How have most supporters of Israel in the United States avoided dealing with their own political inconsistencies? The answer lies in their personal image-maintenance methods designed to avoid the cognitive dissonance between their perceptions of Israel and its reality. That, and an American media that for many years sympathized with the Israeli point of view, has helped them to preserve the Israeli fantasy.” [HADER, p. 27]

In Stephen Green’s research of documents at the United States National Center for a book about the founding of the state of Israel, he noted that “the reality was so different from the myth as to be unrecognizable … Selective historical knowledge has led to fundamental false impressions in America about Israel and about the Middle East dispute generally.” [GREEN, p. 10-11]

Another of the endless mythologies surrounding Israeli society is the enforced illusion that women fare better against male sexist-mores in the Jewish state. Israel has long propagated the symbols of young, noble women working the farm fields and female soldiers in the Israeli army. Lesley Hazelton, in her book Israeli Women: The Reality Behind the Myths, is among those who have severely deflated such propaganda. “Myths compel respect, not necessarily by their truth, but because they are needed by those who believe in them,” she says. “It is not a rational need, certainly not a conscious need: but it is often vital, since myths lay the basis for society’s perceptions of itself, for its collective identity and the identity of every member in it … The liberation of Israeli women is such a myth. For nearly three decades Israeli women have been the paradigm of women’s liberation … They have made an essential contribution to Israel’s self-image as good and progressive, the antithesis of its notoriously and cruelly sexist Arab neighbors … But the destructive aspects of this myth far outweigh its creative potential for Israeli women … Their reality has been subordinated to the accepted image, and they have been relegated to the status of shadows, while the gap continues to widen between their public image and their real selves.” [HAZELTON, p. 22]

Herbert Russcol and Margalit Banai noted in 1970 the status of women in Israeli society:

“In Israel, today, a wife is still called by the lowly, pejorative term that the Old Testament calls hers: isha, woman. Her husband is still addressed by his splendid biblical title, ba’al, master. In the glorious days of the Kings of Israel, upon marriage an isha became the physical possession, the chattel, of her ba’al along with his handmaidens and slaves, his ox and his ass. For this reason, ‘to marry a wife’ and ‘to become master’ have the same root meanings in Hebrew. The infinitive liv’al, commonly used in the sacred texts, means bluntly, and most vulgarly, to possess a woman sexually. What our fiercely free sabra girl thinks of referring to her husband a dozen times a day as ‘my master,’ with all the humiliating connotations described above, may well be imagined by the reader.” [RUSSCOL, BANAI, 1970, p. 178]

New York Jewish feminist Congresswoman Bella Abzug was caught off guard when she visited Israel in the same era. Despite the fact that Israel once had a female prime minister,

“When I was sitting in the Knesset [Israeli Parliament] I noticed, to my surprise, that only 8 of the 120 members were women. One evening I met with some of the most outstanding women in the country and challenged them on this. The reply I got was that since women in Israel have equality they don’t need to prove it so much.” [ABZUG, B., 1972, p. 228]

In Israel itself, central propagandizing myths and blatant historical distortions are only recently being addressed (and this remains controversial) in that country’s school system. In 1999, noted the New York Times wire services, “new, officially approved textbooks make plain that many of the most common Israeli beliefs are as much myth as fact. The new books say, for example, that it was the Israelis who had the military edge in the War of Independence. The books say that many Palestinians left their land not – as has traditionally been taught – because they smugly expected the Arab states to sweep back in victory, but because they were afraid and, in some cases, expelled by Israeli soldiers.” [BRONNER, E., Rewriting, p. 1]

“Only 10 years ago much of this was taboo,” explained Eyal Naveh, a professor of history at Tel Aviv University, “We were not mature enough to look at these controversial problems. Now we can deal with this the way Americans deal with Indians and black enslavement. We are getting rid of certain myths.” [BRONNER, E., p. 1]

A 1984 Israeli history text, for example, from the Israeli Education Ministry stated that (concerning Arab-Israel fighting from 1939-49), “The numerical standoff between the two sides in the conflict was horrifyingly unbalanced. The Jewish community numbered 650,000. The Arab states together came to 400 million. The chances were doubtful, and the Jewish community had to draft every possible fighter for the defense of the community.” [BRONNER, p. 1]

This traditional Jewish/Israeli view is only propaganda, a blatant misrepresentation of facts in mythologizing Jewish heroism and justifying mass expulsions of the Palestinians from their homeland. One of the new Israeli textbooks today concedes this: “On nearly every front and in nearly every battle, the Jewish side had the advantage over the Arabs in terms of planning, organization, operation of equipment, and also in the number of trained fighters who participated in the battle.” [BRONNER, p. 1]

“Instead of portraying the early Zionists as pure, peace-loving pioneers who fell victim to Arab hatred,” noted the Times, “the new historians focus on the early leaders’ machinations to build an iron-walled Jewish state regardless of the consequences to non-Jews living there.” [BRONNER, p. 1]
Among long neglected issues only recently being publicly (albeit guardedly) addressed in America are those of Israeli-instigated atrocities against Arabs. As Israeli author Meron Benvisti noted in 2000, “Atrocities and acts of [Jewish] brutality characterized this period [the fighting with Arabs to formally create a Jewish state in 1948]: summary executions, rape, blowing up houses along with their occupants, looting and plundering, and leaving hundreds of villagers to their own devices in the fields, without food or water. The most serious atrocities were committed in the village of al-Dawayima, on the western slopes of the Hebron Highlands … The occupying [Israeli] forces indiscriminately killed between 80 and 100 male villagers, blew up houses together with their occupants, murdered women and children, and committed rape. According to eyewitness testimony, these acts were committed ‘not in the heat of battle and inflamed passions, but out of a system of expulsion and destruction’ …. These atrocities – which fifty years later are regarded as libel, invented by the enemies of Israel, and whose retelling is perceived as an example of rewriting history by revisionist historians – were, at the time they took place, known to ministers in the Israeli government, military commanders, and even the general public. The government set up commissions of inquiry and the army set up commissions of its own, but the work of these bodies came to naught because soldiers and officers refused to testify against their comrades in arms.” [BENVENISTI, M., 2000, p. 153]

As Aharon Cizling, the Israeli Minister of Agriculture at the time, wrote:

“Now Jews too have behaved like Nazis and my entire being has been shaken … Obviously we have to conceal these actions from the public, and I agree that we should not even reveal that we’re investigating them. But they must be investigated.” [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 92]

Amos Kenan, a writer for the Israeli newspaper Yediot Aharonot, once wrote about his experiences on guard duty in an Arab town in the same era:

“At night, those of us who couldn’t restrain ourselves would go into the prison compounds to fuck Arab women. I want very much to assume, and perhaps even can, that those who couldn’t restrain themselves did what they thought the Arabs would have done to them had they won the war. Once, only once, did an Arab woman – perhaps a distant relative of [head of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine George] Habash – dare to complain. There was a court martial. The complainant didn’t even get to testify. The accused, who was sitting behind the judges, ran the back of his hand across his throat, as a signal to the woman. She understood. The rapist was not acquitted, he simply was not accused, because there was no one who would are accuse him. Two years later he was killed while plowing the fields of an Arab village, one no longer on the map because its inhabitants scattered and left it empty.” [ELLIS, 1990, p. 106]
In 1988 Israeli author David Grossman recounts with shame his meeting with Wadha Isma’il, a Palestinian woman in an Occupied Territory refugee camp. As a small girl, upon working in the family fields, Wadha watched Israeli soldiers blindfold her father, and then heard him shot behind some bushes. “I began to cry,” she told Grossman,

“The soldiers who had stayed with me asked me: Who is that man to you? I said: ‘He is my father.’ They said: ‘Go to the garden down there, and you will see that he is harvesting lettuce and eggplant.’ When I was some distance from them, I glanced back and I saw one of the soldiers aiming his rifle at me. I was frightened and bent over. His bullet hit my neck and came out the other side.”

“I don’t know what to say her,” writes Grossman, “and she interprets my silence, apparently, as disbelief. ‘Look,’ she says, and her work-hardened fingers undo her kerchief, and she smiles a sort of apology about having to bother me with her wound. I see an ugly scar in back, and another ugly scar in front. Young Hana cries. It seems that Wadha is her mother. ‘Every time I hear that story, it is as if it were the first time,’ Hanan says.” [GROSSMAN, D., 1988, p. 70-71]

Israeli professor and Holocaust survivor Israel Shahak wrote about another set of atrocities by Jews against the Palestinians during the late 1980s uprising (the “Intifada.”) Shahak translated eyewitness accounts from the Israeli Hebrew press into English. In his introduction to a compilation of such testimonies, Shahak noted that:

“The systematic use of atrocities, which in their intensity and the special intention to humiliate are Nazi-like and should be compared to the analogous German Nazi methods, is intentional and in fact constitutes the Israeli method for ruling Palestinians … There should be also no doubt that those Nazi-like horrors can and probably will become worse, if not stopped from the outside, and their use can lead to actual genocide, whether by ‘transfer’ or extermination. Indeed, this is one of my reasons for assembling this collection: to show that the actual genocide of the Palestinians in the territories is now possible, since those Israeli soldiers and officers who have committed the outrages recorded here are capable of anything and everything.” [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 85]

Such cold realities, so very unwelcome in mainstream Jewish circles, drastically contrasts with widespread Jewish mythology about the Israeli army, the beloved Jewish “child-soldiers” as typically articulated by Elie Wiesel about the 1967 war: “I have seen many armies; none more humble, more humane in its victories … My pride is that Israel has remained human because it has remained so deeply Jewish.” [And what of Wiesel’s subtext here, that if one is less “deeply Jewish,” one is less “human?”] [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 10] American Jewish Zionist historian Melvin Urofsky articulated the common Jewish view of the noble Israeli army and government in 1978: “When the War came, Israeli leaders did their best to convince their Arab neighbors not to run away.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 206] And, in the aftermath of Israel’s 1967 victory over the Arabs, “There is little to be found in history to compare with the behavior

Among the prominent Israeli revisionist authors in recent years are Benny Morris and Avi Shlaim. “The rise of revisionist historiography,” notes Steven Heydemann, “… reflects a serious ambivalence about once-deeply held notions of the moral purposes of Zionism, its position in the Middle East, and the future.” [HEYDEMANN, p. 6] Such Zionist myths have for decades been unquestioned canon in Jewish circles, widely parroted in America, only in recent years been subject to increasing scholarly attack in (but rarely outside) the Jewish state. Such myths include the innately incorrigible morality of the Zionist enterprise and the conviction that a large Palestinian populace chose exodus – and were not driven – out of their homeland. More and more Israeli scholars are arriving at the fact that war with Arabs was not thrust upon the young Jewish nation, but was part of Zionist objective. Seminal Zionist leader Ben Gurion, says Avi Shlaim, “grasped that the essential structure of the conflict left no room for compromise and this would entail the settlement of Zionist claims by violent means.” [HEYDEMANN, p. 23] As Heydemann notes, “Revisionist writings reveal a style of [Zionist] leadership [over past decades] in which the exercise of will was perceived primarily in terms of power and the application of force. Revisionism places an emphasis on the fierce, single-minded way in which Zionist leaders pursued three dominant strategic concerns: to expand the territory under Jewish control, to reduce the Arab population within this territory, and to encourage divisiveness among Arab states to prevent them from hindering the attainment of the first two.” [HEYDEMANN, p. 12]

These goals also included “compromise [with Arabs] as unnecessary in light of Israel’s evident military superiority,” and “indiscriminate whole expulsion of Arab communities, even those which had lived in peace with their Jewish neighbors.” [HEYDEMANN, p. 14]

“The ‘exhilarating’ possibilities of a land without Arabs,” observes Heydemann, “and the transfer of Arab farms, houses, and wealth into Jewish hands, set, as Morris reminds us, in the context of war and massive immigration, quickly overwhelmed the reservations expressed by minority factions about the morality of expelling Palestinian Arabs and destroying their villages.” [HEYDEMANN, p. 14] “We not only eradicated Arab place names [in Israel],” notes former Jerusalem deputy mayor Meron Benvenisti, “we actually destroyed the places as well.” [BENVENISTI, p. 196] The Israeli erasure of Palestinian history was consciously as complete as possible. As Benvenisti notes

“I was aware for quite some time that the Palestinian Research Institute in Beirut was compiling files on each Palestinian village in Israel. Since the beginning of the [Lebanon] war I wondered about the fate of those files. I was fairly sure that General [Ariel] Sharon and General Eitan would search them out, seize them, and destroy them in order to complete the eradication of Arab Palestine. That is what eventually happened when the Israeli army entered West Beirut.” [BENVENISTI, p. 198]

Benvenisti also notes the Israeli creation of a place called “Peace Forest” on the sites of eradicated Arab villages near Jerusalem, utterly destroyed to guarantee that the inhabitants never returned. “To call it Peace Forest,” he laments, “to take well-meaning [Jewish] donors and with their money turn all these orchards into a picnic area for Israelis and tourists is something else entirely. This betrays not only a lack of sensitivity but is something that must eventually corrupt our youth… Dehumanization is a contagious disease.” [BENVENISTI, p. 200-201]

Traditional Israeli reluctance to address the facts of history even stretches far into the distant past. As Elliot Horowitz notes about Jewish massacres of Christians in ancient Israel:

“After 1967 the reluctance of Israeli historians, especially those linked institutionally to universities and research institutes, to acknowledge Jewish violence in the distant past has become even greater than in the decades immediately following the Holocaust. This is true especially with regard to acts allegedly committed against non-Jews in the land of Israel and its environs. One suspects that the resistance to acknowledging such phenomena in the past has been related to a desire on the part of many Israelis to see themselves as enlightened and humane occupiers at present.” [HOROWITZ, 1998 p. 8]

Israel is a very small nation – in one area its width is only about ten miles; more than half of its land mass is desert. Only one-fifth of the country is arable. The Jewish nation has few natural resources; potash is one of them. Even limited water supplies loom as long-term threats to political stability with neighboring water-poor countries. Most water is pumped from the “Sea” of Galilee and its headwaters; water crucial to the Jewish state originates in the heavily Arab West Bank and in southern Lebanon. “Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza,” notes Amnon Rubenstein, “are routinely forbidden to dig new wells, deepen existing wells, or put in water systems that might reduce the water available for Israel.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 173] Although Israel is rich in religious lore and tradition, for all practical economic intents and purposes it is physically resource-less. It must rely of course upon the massive beneficence of wealthy and influential Jews throughout the world for help – economic contributions, but – more importantly – world-wide lobbying efforts of governments and peoples throughout the world to sustain the Jewish state which can never sustain itself, in drastic contradiction of seminal Zionist plans for the Jewish state. Hence, the resources of the rest of the world maintain an economic, social, and military level for Israel which it could never remotely maintain by its own means.

Nonetheless, Jewish and Zionist mythology about the sacredness of the land of Israel has fostered an extremely strange, and disturbing, paradox. Israeli Amos Oz notes Jewish myth about the actual land of Israel in Zionist tradition:
“This is … what some of my teachers taught me when I was a child: after our Temple was destroyed and we were banished from our Land, the gentiles came into our heritage and defiled it. Wild Arabs laid the land waste … When our first pioneers came to the land to rebuild and be rebuilt by it and redeem it from its desolation, they found an abandoned wasteland.” [OZ, p. 88]

This is an especially curious myth, given the fact that the deeds of defiling Gentiles and “wild Arabs” over all centuries combined can not remotely compare to the atrocious Jewish care taking of the Holy Land in recent history, in which the modern Israeli military-industrial state rampantly pollutes the place so important to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The most visible physical landmark in the Tel Aviv area, for example, on the outskirts of the city along the highway to Israel’s international airport, is a giant mountain of trash – the Hiriya dump. It had been absorbing 3,000 tons of garbage every day until it was recently closed, but not before the mountain of garbage “collapsed into the Ayalon River, threatening one of Tel Aviv’s sources of drinking water.” [COHN, M., 10-18-98] “As a Zionist,” bemoaned professor Harvey Lithwick, “you can’t believe that you came to reclaim the country … and yet you let the land go to garbage. For me, that’s horrible.” [COHN, M., 10-18-98]

In July 1999 one hundred scientists, under sponsorship of Israel’s Economic Forum and the Technion Institute in Haifa, released a report announcing that Israel’s environment was “on the verge of collapse.” The report noted that “underground aquifers suffer from almost irreversible salination, the quality of air is declining, causing one in ten children to have asthma, garbage is piling up [and] uncontrolled construction is eating away at open areas.” [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 7-14-99] That same year London’s Financial Times noted that “the statistics make grim reading. More than half of all untreated industrial waste, including poisonous chemicals and salts, flows directly into the [Israeli] environment, damaging underground aquifers, rivers and streams.” [FINANCIAL TIMES, 1-29-99, p. 12] Israel produces 170,000 tons of toxic waste a year – two-thirds of it is believed to be dumped illegally throughout the country and into the Mediterranean Sea. [COHN, M., 10-18-98]

“Zionists – who passionately reclaimed these biblical lands after 2,000 years in exile, “noted the Toronto Star in 1998, “have … a blind spot about their birthright.” “During the past 50 years,” said Israeli environmental activist Bilha Givon, “all the coasts along Israel have become wasteland, polluted by factories.” In 1997, during Israel’s international Jewish sporting event, the Maccabiah Games, a bridge collapsed over the Yarkon River. Two Jewish athletes from Australia survived the fall, notes the Star, “only to die of infection from the polluted river. The scandal over lethal toxins swirling in the water rocked the Jewish Maccabiah games.” [COHN, M., 10-18-98]

Of particular note, and increasing controversy, is Israel’s official toxic waste dumping ground, Ramat Hovav, located twelve miles south of Be’er Sheva in the Negev desert. With 43,000 tons of toxic material a year delivered its way, Ramat Hovav is notorious for mismanagement and haphazard storage of a variety of dangers. “Within the past twelve months,” noted the Jerusalem Post in August
A large community of (Muslim Arab) Bedouin of the Al-Azameh tribe lives in tents across the street. (Many were forced to move there after being evicted from their ancestral lands by the Jewish government). Putrid smells drift through the tents day and night. Environmental Ministry tests in 1994-95, noted Haim Chertok, noted “dangerous levels of pollution, issuing from organic waste stewing in Ramat Hovav, more than 40 percent of the time.” [CHERTOK, H., 5-30-97]

Arab workers are also employed in the most dangerous jobs at the hazardous waste area and in the cluster of pesticide and chemical factories within Ramat Hovav grounds. Explosions at the Chemgas chemical plant in 1999 injured six workers. “There are at least six factories, out of 15 at the site,” noted the Jerusalem Post, “where emissions could result in an accident causing irreversible harm to residents, or even death.” [COLLINS, L., 8-7-97] Mishandling disasters at, and around, the site are common – from overturned trucks hauling toxic cargo to leaking storage barrels to explosions of dangerous chemicals. From 1988 to 1998 there were “ten major incidents” including “two leaks of poisonous gases within a 12 hour period.” [COLLINS, L., 8-4-98, p. 3] In 1997 a lithium battery storage area exploded, a wall of flames 300 feet tall burned for hours, sending thick, black smoke over the area. “No one thought,” notes the Toronto Star, “to alert the Bedouin to the possible peril until three hours later.” [COHN, M., 10-18-98]

(In the same vein, in 1998 Palestinian investigators discovered a secret toxic waste dumping ground that Israeli companies had been using in Arab areas in the Occupied Territories, including “32 hazardous materials, including pesticides and medical waste.” [COHN, M., 10-18-98])

Meanwhile, a former deputy mayor of Jerusalem, Meron Benvenisti, notes the ideological undercurrent of the Israeli “ecological” military order in the Occupied Territories that prohibits local Arabs from picking a herb called Za’atar, a wild plant they had freely gathered for centuries:

“[The order] is only a strong political and ideological statement: You Palestinians despoil the land indiscriminately because you do not feel for it, ergo it is not your homeland. We [Jews] look after it. Therefore it is ours.” [BENVENISTI, p. 24]

The ideological foundation for the modern state of Israel is the political philosophy of Zionism; its fundamental assertions were practical, secular, and activist in nature. Unlike traditional Judaism which passively awaited God’s intervention via an expected Messiah to lead world Jewry into a messianic age of Jewish redemption, empowerment, and leadership, Zionism declared it important that Jews take their destiny into their own hands. “Zionism,” notes Charles Silberman, “… transformed the meaning of Jewishness messianism. Instead of waiting for God to bring about the Messianic Age in His own way and time, as the Orthodox believed … the Zionists insisted that the Jews had to go to work to bring about their own redemption.” [SILBERMAN, p. 39] And the most pressing Zionist issue at hand was the desire for an explicitly Jewish national homeland. Although in early Zionist years a temporary Jewish homeland in parts of Argentina or Kenya was considered, few of the rank and file members of the movement took such suggestions seriously. The emotional attachment, after all, unlike other European-based nationalist movements, was based on traditional religious beliefs: the ancient homeland that God had reputedly given to the Israelites. The homeland was not really negotiable. It had to be a return to Zion: Israel. “Even those who rebelled against religion,” notes Ehud Luz, “could not ignore the need to deal with it, for the simple reason that Jewish nationalism drew its legitimacy from the Jewish religion: Zionism was rooted in the Jewish past, and no one denied that this past had a religious character.” [LUZ, p. x] “The mythos-driven craving for the ancestral land,” suggests Israeli Jay Gonen, “is tied to deep unconscious layers in the Jewish psyche.” [GONEN, J., p. 200]

Sometimes these “cravings” are not so unconscious. The underlying links between the religion of Judaism and secular Zionism is so great that Henrietta Szold, the founder of Hadassah (the international Zionist women’s organization), was the first woman to study at the Jewish Theological Seminary. [HESCHEL, 1983, p. xiv]

Part of the Zionist revival included reclaiming the nearly dead language of Hebrew (which had been reduced over the centuries to use only for religious purposes). Intended to be applied to a new, secularized Zionist society, as early as 1926 scholar Gershom Scholem noted the latent undercurrents in attempting to secularly appropriate a religiously-charged language: “The Land [of Israel] is a volcano. It provides lodging for the language [of Hebrew] … What will be the result of the updating of Hebrew? Will the abyss of the holy tongue which we have implanted in our children not yawn wide? People here do not realize what they are doing. They think they have made Hebrew into a secular language, that they removed its apocalyptic sting. But that is not so … Every word which is not simply made up but rather taken from the treasure house of well-worn terms is laden with explosives.” [RAVITZKY, A., p. 3]

“Although in rabbinic times an Aramaic translation of the Torah was declared alongside the biblical text in public readings …,” notes Barry Holtz, “it was the Hebrew original that was venerated and preserved. This sense of the sacred quality of the language begins with the Bible itself. God speaks, and through language the world comes into being. Jews, at least since rabbinic times, have taken the holiness of the language with great seriousness.” [HOLTZ, B., 1984, p. 21]

“There is no Sabbath Judaism without Zionism,” notes Dagobert Runes, “Every daily prayer of the observing Jew carries the undertone of return to Zion. The four great holidays of the Jewish faith are imbedded in Zionist land and Zionist homecoming. Judaism is a little possible without Zionism as Christianity without Christ.” [MARX, K., 1959, p. x] “Herein lies the ambiguity of Zionism,” says Jacob Neusner,
“It was supposedly a secular movement, yet in reinterpreting the classic mythic structures of Judaism, it compromised its secularity and exposed its fundamental unity with the classic mythic being of Judaism … What has happened in Zionism is that the old has been in one instant destroyed and resurrected. The ‘holy people’ are no more, the nation-people take their place. How much has changed in the religious tradition, when the allegedly secular successor-continuator has preserved not only the essential perspective of the tradition, but done so pretty much in the tradition’s own symbols and language?” [NEUSNER, J., 1972, p. 100]

“The fact,” notes Alan Dowty, “that many early Zionists sought to ‘divorce’ themselves from Jewish history does not, however, mean that they always succeeded in disentangling themselves from its grip. In fact, the illusion that Zionism could escape the legacies – negative and positive – of the Jewish past, through an exercise of sheer ideological will, may have been the greatest conceit among the necessary self-deceptions of the founding fathers … Holidays and national symbols were also inevitably drawn from the past, even if attempts were made to alter their content and significance. The very legitimacy of the entire [Zionist] enterprise also rested, in the end, on Jewish history and religion, a factor that grew in importance as conflict with the Arab population developed.” [DOWTY, 1998]

Monford Harris sees a strong Judaism-Zionism link in the old religious covenant notion:

“The dynamic of Zionism … is only possible on the basis of covenantal solidarity. … None of the universal categories – race, nation, nationality, or religion – can account for this involvement. It is accountable only on the basis of covenantal solidarity throughout Jewish history. While twentieth century Jewry no longer uses conveniently terms and has lost its conscious awareness of its self-understanding, it does, nevertheless, operate with the ideas of the Covenant.” [HARRIS, M., 1965, p. 92]

Early Zionism in Israel also stressed a “back to the land” ethic, emphatically distancing the new Jewish people from their traditional “Shylock” economic middleman roles in Europe for honest labor in the farm fields of Palestine. Community-owned socialist agricultural enterprises called kibbutzim sprouted up everywhere and were hailed as the foundation for a new, proud, hard-working Jewish identity. By 1986, however, Etan Levine noted that “today’s kibbutz member is profoundly disturbed by the failure to transmit its values to the young … To many an Israeli, today’s kibbutz is seen as sort of a country club, using hired labor for the Arab and Sephardic towns, and exploiting the kibbutz’s favorable tax status and its undue influence in the Israeli Knesset.” [LEVINE, E., p. 46]

Rudiments of the Zionist world view began to take hold among a few Jewish thinkers in the mid-1800s. Moses Hess wrote Rome and Jerusalem in 1862, a work generally credited to be the origin of Zionist theory, although the term would not be invented, nor the ideas distilled, till decades later. “Hess,” wrote later Zionist philosopher Martin Buber, “was no ‘precursor’ of the Zionist movement. He was its initiation.” “Everything we have attempted,” said preeminent Zionist activist Theodore Herzl, “can be found in this [Rome and Jerusalem] work.” [HESS, opening page]

“The pious Jew is before all else a Jewish patriot,” wrote Hess in this seminal work of Jewish secular nationalism, “the ‘new-fangled’ Jew who denies Jewish nationalism is not only an apostate, a renegade in the religious sense, but a traitor to his people and to his family. Should it prove true that the emancipation of the Jews is incompatible with Jewish nationalism, then the Jew must sacrifice emancipation … The Jewish religion is primarily Jewish patriotism. This the Jewish ‘Reformers’ who ‘emancipated’ themselves from the Jewish nation knew quite well. They are wary of expressing their true sentiments frankly.” [HESS, p. 27-28] In an earlier work, entitled Money (1845), Hess had located the worldwide Jewish community in a socio-economic Darwinian sense far from their collective self-perception as humankind’s consummate victims: “The Jews, who in the natural history of the social animal would have had the world-historical mission to elicit the predator in humanity, have now accomplished the task.” [REINHARZ, p. 85] (The turn of the century socialist/Zionist Ber Borochov echoed this perspective of non-Jews, noting that non-Jews tended to gain “their livelihood from nature,” and that “it is obvious that Jews, in contradiction to all other nations, derive their livelihood exclusively from man.” [BOROCHOV, p. 62] Hess also, like so many in the Jewish political world in our own day, abandoned “universalist” political activism for Jewish “particularism.” Hess was for years a communist theorist, even writing in 1847 “a draft for a communist manifesto.” [GIDAL, p. 223]

A second Zionist theorist of considerable import was Leon Pinsker whose treatise Auto-Emancipation appeared in 1882. “We have not ceased even in the lands of our exile to be spiritually a distinct nation,” he wrote, “but this spiritual nationality, so far from giving us the status of nation in the eyes of other nations, is the very cause of their hatred for us as a people.” [SACHAR, p. 300] Traditional religious belief that Gentile hostility to Jews was a punishment from God was secularly adjusted in Pinsker’s argument; he proclaimed what in our day has become Jewish canon: Jewish irresponsibility for their roles in history and the declared irrational essence of a corresponding “Jew-hatred.” Pinsker, says Walter Laqueur, “regarded Judaeophobia as a psychic aberration, but in his view it was hereditary. Transmitted as a disease for two thousand years, it was incurable … Prejudice, subconscious notions, could not be removed by reasoning, however forceful and clear.” [LAQUEUR, p. 71] “One of the fundamentals of Zionism,” confirmed Zionist heroine Hannah Senesh in later years, “is the realization that anti-Semitism is an illness which can neither be fought against with words, nor cured with superficial treatment.” [UMANSKY/ASHTON, p. 175]

The most famous Zionist, however, was Theodore Herzl, a journalist (he was a correspondent for Vienna’s Neue Freie Presse, the most influential newspaper in the Hapsburg Empire), and playwright, who struggled as a dreamer and activist towards resolution of “the Jewish problem” in Europe. Herzl’s novel Altneuland has been described as “the foundation document of the modern state of Israel.” [SELZER, p. 42] “Herzl,” says Michael Selzer, “endorses as valid the negative image of the Jew with which he had earlier condemned and then catered most extravagantly to [for funds], [the book was the] creation of a fantasy state in which the self-hating Jewish readers of the book could find and identify themselves with their complete antithesis.” [SELZER, p. 42] Herzl’s idea of Israel, says Amnon Rubenstein, was “a mini-Switzerland in the heart of the Middle East.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 11]

As late as 1893, he seriously entertained the idea that the problem to anti-Semitism could be resolved by a mass conversion of all Jewish children to Christianity. [AVISHAI, p. 37] The publication of Herzl’s ideas about the creation of a Jewish homeland, The Jewish State, and mass Jewish exodus to it, became the most influential work in Zionist history.

Jacques Kornberg notes Herzl’s essential world view, so deeply rooted in the Jewish martyrlogical and persecution tradition: “Herzl’s litany of Jewish suffering was wildly exaggerated, for he claimed that Jews were ‘always the carefully looked after and cultivated leeches or the … chamber serfs … of the powerful.’ In Herzl’s view of Jewish history there were no periods of security or normality. Later this view was to become part of his Zionist conception of the Jewish dispersion as a 2,000 year period of captivity and unfreedom.” [KORNBERG, p. 84]

And as World Zionist Organization president Nahum Goldmann once wrote:

“[Theodore Herzl] put [the Zionist issue] in a famous and totally misleading saying: ‘The problem of Zionism is one of means of transport: there is a people without a land, and a land without a people’ … He utter[ed] a double falsehood: first, Palestine was not a country without people, since there were hundreds of thousands of Arabs living there; and second, the Jews were not a landless people, for the assimilated Jews were good Frenchmen, Germans, Englishmen and so on.” [GOLDMANN, N., 1978, p. 88]

Eventually Herzl and his cohorts were visiting powerful people throughout the world, lobbying the Zionist ideas intensely, seeking both funds from the wealthy and political favors. Among those from whom he sought help – particularly in concessions for Jewish immigration to Palestine – in his single-minded focus on Jews was the Sultan of Turkey. “When Herzl,” notes Hannah Arendt, “during these negotiations received cables from students of various oppressed nationalities protesting against agreements with a government which had just slaughtered hundreds of thousands of Armenians, he only observed: ‘This will be useful for me with the Sultan.”’ [ARENDT, in SELZER, p. 236]

Alfred Lilienthal notes the curious similarity of traditional Zionism and anti-Semitic ideology regarding the Jewish inability– or resistance – to assimilate into non-Jewish societies. Seminal Zionist writings, like those of Hess, Herzl and Pinsker, says Lilienthal, argued that “Jews formed in the midst of the nations, among which they reside, a distinctive element which cannot be readily digested in any country. (Strangely, these were practically the same words for which the [anti-Semitic] Dearborn Independent and Henry Ford, Sr. were to be sued more than sixty years later by American Jews of Zionist leanings).” [LILIENTHAL, p. 13]

This classical anti-Semitic accusation – that Jews live within a host society, but are not truly a fully dedicated part of it – is actually a fundamental belief too of the Zionist credo. An essential principle of Zionism is the secular revamping of the old religious notion of Jewish identity throughout the world: galut – exile. As noted earlier, the idea of galut asserts that Jews – dispersed from ancient Israel throughout the world – are everywhere in places they do not belong. Their own true home can only be Israel. Zionism holds that, because Jews are scattered throughout the world in other peoples’ lands, Jews are ethically, spiritually, morally, and physically impaired from their true natures. In Hebrew, one of the meanings of galut is “sighing under the yoke of oppression.” [GOLDSTEIN, p. 178] In the Zionist view, Jews are not –and cannot be – connected to the lands, culture, and peoples of their Diaspora (dispersion). “The Zionist critique of assimilation,” notes Donald Niewyk, “… rested on a certain conviction that all efforts to blend with non-Jews must lead unswervingly to deformed Jewish lives. The new discipline of psychoanalysis was mustered to demonstrate the neurotic side effects of divided consciousness. Rootlessness and inferiority complexes were shown to generate everything from revolutionary activity to Jewish anti-Semitism, extreme German nationalism, and suicide.” [NIEWYK, p. 126]

Only gathered together in their own nation can Jews of the world attain “normalization.” Once the Jewish people had “normalized,” hoped Theodore Herzl, the Zionist “father” of modern Israel, “it is the anti-Semite who will be our staunchest friends, and the anti-Semitic countries which will be our allies.” [FEUERLICHT, p. 222] In modern Israel the term galut is a slur. “Galut has become a general term of contempt,” says Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen, “bearing no relation to where one lives.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN]

“In classical Zionist thinking,” says Liebman and Cohen, “the non-Jews are not to be blamed for their hostility to the Jews. The fault lies in the unnatural condition of Jews living as strangers in a host society that understandably harbors suspicions of them and their intentions.” [LIEBMAN/SILBERMAN, p. 58] Even David Ben-Gurion, revered by many Jews as a pioneer Zionist and the first prime minister of the modern state of Israel (to 1963), said that

“The cause of our troubles and the anti-Semitism of which we complain result from our peculiar status that does not accord with the established framework of the nations of the world. It is not the result of the wickedness or folly of the Gentiles which we call anti-Semitism.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 58]

From a Zionist racial perspective, notes Donald Niewyk, “even a moderate Zionist such as Gustav Krojanker could describe anti-Semitism as the ideological superstructure of ‘instinctive animal peculiarities’ that were natural among groups ‘divided by blood and history.’” [NIEWYK, p. 127-128]

For decades, the Zionist movement basically agreed with the standard anti-Semitic criticisms of the Jews of Europe, that Jews were exploitive, often unethical, elitist separatists in their self-perceived “host nations,” and they were entrenched in the centers of commerce, overly fixated upon the accumulation of money. “The Zionist position,” says Aleksander Hertz, “was ... similar to that of the anti-Semite. Both spoke of the organic separateness of the Jews and their alienness. Although they differed fundamentally in their evaluations of the role of the Jews and their historic significance, their intellectual premises were the same, and they did not differ greatly in their conclusions.” [HERTZ] “Intriguingly,” notes Bernard Avishai, “political Zionists often accepted as true some of the anti-Semite’s most outrageous stereotypes of the Jew ... Accordingly, political Zionists were often unable to articulate precisely what Jewish principles were to be defended – apart from the assertion that the Jewish people should survive.” [AVISHAI, p. 25]

In pre-World War II Nazi Germany, Zionist assertions that Jews were an unassimilable people mirrored, and reinforced, the Nazis’ own arguments. Both groups asserted that there should be no Jews in Germany. “The anti-Semitic barrage continued weekly with Zionist aspersions sounding painfully similar to the Nazi line discrediting the German citizenship of the Jews,” notes Edwin Black, “It became that much harder for German Jews to defend against Nazi accusations of illegitimate citizenship when a land and visible group of their own [Zionists] continually published identical indictments ... Zionism had become a tool for anti-Semites.” [BLACK, E., p. 173]

On June 21, 1933, the German Zionist Federation sent their evaluation of the Jewish presence in Germany to Hitler, saying:

“Zionism believes that a rebirth ... such as that in German tradition resulting from a combination of Christian and national values, must also come about within the Jewish communities. Racial background, religion, a common fate and tribal consciousness must be of decisive importance in developing a lifestyle for Jews too.” [BLACK, E., p. 175]

The Israeli scholar Yehezkel Kaufman, who represents the revisionist history so popular among Jews today that deems anti-Semitism to be completely irrational in origin, noted that in Zionism’s early decades of development “Zionist ideology itself was by no means free from the influence of anti-Semitism, and Zionism actually based the national movement on a rationale of charges that it took over from the anti-Semites, and attempted to find a core of justice in the hatred of the Jews. Jews of the Galut, the countries of dispersion, really deserve to be hated: their customs, tendencies, businesses, attitude to the their environment, etc. are the same source of the hatred, the justifiable hatred. Therefore, they must leave Galut.” [KAUFMAN, p. 2451]

“Our function now [as Jews],” wrote Joseph Brenner, an important early twentieth century Zionist, “is to recognize and admit our meanness since the beginning of history to the present day, all the faults in our character, and then to rise and start over again.” [SILBERMAN, p. 39] “With a burning and passionate pleasure,” he wrote elsewhere, “I would blot out from the prayer book of the Jews of our day ‘Thou hast chosen us’ in every shape and form.” [DOWTY, 1998, p. 1] “The old Jew in Zionist iconography,” notes Haim Breseeth,
“was not dissimilar to the standard anti-Semitic portrait – the ‘inversion of what is productive,’ ‘the rootless, cosmopolitan, unproductive, and passive entity, inevitably attracting the hatred of its social environment, as it were. Zionism was to eradicate this type of Jewishness and replace it with the new Jew.” [BRESEETH, p. 194]

“The vocabulary of abuse [from Zionists about the Jewish people of Europe] in Hebrew literature,” notes Yehezkel Kaufman, “–where Jews speak to one another without fear of exaggeration – is of a sort you would find only in anti-Semitic literature of the worst type …. Frishman: ‘Jewish life is a ‘dog’s’ life that ‘evokes disgust.’ Berdichevski: ‘Not a nation, not a people, not human.’ Brenner: ‘Gypsies, filthy dogs, inhuman, wounded dogs.’ A. D. Gordon: ‘Parasitism, people fundamentally useless.’ From the articles of Shwardron: ‘Slaves, helots, the basest uncleanliness, worms, filth, parasitic rootlessness.’ (See his writings in Moznaim, 1933, nos. 33-38). In honor of the anniversary of Histadrut [the national Israeli labor federation], Davar, the Palestinian [i.e., now Israel] newspaper, printed a vowel-pointed headline: ‘National resistance, the regeneration of a parasitic nation.’” [KAUFMAN, p. 241]

As Joachim Doron notes, “the Jewish self-criticism so widespread among the German Zionist intelligentsia often seemed dangerously similar to the plaints of the German anti-Semites.” [FINKELSTEIN, N., 1998, p. 24]

Shaul Avigur, the head of the organization which aided illegal immigration to Israel against British Mandate curtailment, had great disdain for the Jewish survivors of the Holocaust who made it to Israel. Avigur remarked that “They are different … completely different [from other Jews in Israel]. The propensity to inform is widespread among them … in commerce they engage in everything possible; the children buy and sell dollars; corruption is horrible; … prostitution is terrible.” [PORAT, p. 162]

“The [European] ghetto Jew was doomed from the Zionist perspective,” says Haim Breseeth, “– human dust, as [former Israeli president] Weizmann named him, a historical figure with a despicable past and no future. Thus, the ghetto Jew became the antithesis of the Israeli Jew, even before the creation of the Israeli state. This is very different from how every other Jewish community, notably the buoyant American Jewish community, has perceived the European Jews.” [BRESEETH, p. 194]

“It is a sad opinion one hears many people expressing,” complained Yehezkel Kaufman in 1949, “– that anti-Semitism is in a certain sense an anteroom to Zionism. Many Zionists, and not only Western European Zionists, believe with complete naivety that to be ‘good Zionists,’ we must first become ‘good’ anti-Semites, we must first hate ourselves… [KAUFMAN, p. 244] …If you were to open the notebook of a Hebrew school student [in Israel] you might read such phrases as these: ‘The Jews in the Diaspora are living unhealthy lives, as unsavory tradesmen, and sometimes have unsavory private lives too … They are corrupt … The Gentiles around them are living healthy lives,’ or: ‘The Jews in the Galut prefer storekeeping, banking, and peddling’ and that is why the Gentiles hate them; ‘the lack of Jewish farmers and Jewish workers has been the reason for their unnatural lives, and has aroused hatred.” [KAUFMAN, p. 244]

“[Theodore Herzl, the official founder of the modern state of Israel] did not claim that the charges of the anti-Semite were altogether unjust,” observed Walter Laqueur, “The ghetto, which had not been of their making, had bred [in Jews] certain asocial qualities: the Jews had come to embody the characteristics of men who had served long prison terms.” [LAQUEUR, p. 88] Likewise, Zionist writer Theodore Lessing, says Daniel Niewyk, believed that European Jewry’s “preoccupation with security and material wealth had brought them a half-deserved reputation as exploiters.” [NIEWYK, p. 137]

“Reading today – in the post-Holocaust era – the writings of the founders of Zionism,” says Amnon Rubenstein, “one is slightly embarrassed by the abuse against the very nature of the Jewish communities in exile, in galut … [But] Zionism did not usher in this mood. Nineteenth century Hebrew and Yiddish literature … vilify the Jewish existence within the traditional Pale of Settlement, the ‘parasitical’ occupations which mar it and the sickening submission to brute force and oppression.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 5]

Of course, modern Israeli propaganda needs, and Jewish identity needs, have changed in recent years. Today the official Zionist view, malleable to the times, has reabsorbed traditional Jewish thinking about a mystical, omnipresent anti-Semitism, useful in hardening trans-world Jewish solidarity with Israel – the Protector. As Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen note:

“The role of anti-Semitism in formulations of Zionism and in the importance attributed to the existence of the Jewish state has not diminished. What has changed is the benign image held by Israeli leaders of the Gentile. It is no longer the Jew who is indirectly to blame for being hated. Anti-Semitism is no longer the expected hostility of the hosts toward their uninvited guests. As in the traditional Jewish past, anti-Semitism is now attributed to the Gentile’s irrational hatred of the Jew … The origins of anti-Semitism are no longer explained in terms of Jewish estrangement from their host societies, but as endemic to the non-Jew.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 59]

Increasingly in recent years, the modern state of Israel, and many Jewish apologists throughout the world, publicly espouse views about themselves and Israel that are implicitly irreconcilable. The widespread Jewish illusion of harmonizing completely contradictory worldviews (universalism and particularism) is likewise echoed in the ideology of Zionism (although some important Zionist strands have been disbanding not only allegiance to universality, but to democracy as a social principle). As the first Prime Minister of Israel, David Ben Gurion, (in this realm yet again a claim of Jewish “uniqueness”) put it:

“Two basic aspirations underlie all our work in this country: to be like all nations, and to be different from all nations.” [ARONOFF, Myths, p. 178]

Another example of Israel’s implicitly contradictory nature, notes Rachelle Saidel, is that the eventual “linking [of] the creation of the Jewish state to the murder of six million Jews causes this state to be born with a built-in paranoia. This ‘birth defect’ has led Israel to beg for normalcy – to be treated as all other nations, while at the same time pointing out how – because of the Holocaust, it should be treated differently." [SAIDEL, p. 17]

The clumsily veiled chauvinism at root here is, as always, the classical religiously-based Jewish notion of the necessity for Jews to be “a people apart,” “unique,” distinct from all others. [“Lo, the people shall dwell alone and shall not be reckoned among the nations.” –NUMBERS 23:9] For some Israelis, notes Myron Aronoff, the biblical admonition that Israel “is a people that shall dwell alone and shall never be reckoned among the nations, [is] a curse. However, others consider it an affirmation of Israel’s chosenness.” [ARONOFF, p. 178]

Alan Dowty notes that eventually Jewish “uniqueness” in Israel, “rather than normalization, was becoming the watchword … Israelis were again seeing themselves, in the words of Balaam’s blessing, as ‘a people who shall dwell alone’ … Israel was moving from a universalistic, secular, rational, civic orientation to one that was particularistic, religious, mystical, and primordial. It was reverting from an ‘Israeli’ outlook, embodied in the concept of the State of Israel, back to a more ‘Jewish’ self-identity.” [DOWTY, 1998]

Israeli Meron Benvenisti sees the transformation – the absorption of traditional Jewish exclusionist identity into Zionism – this way:

“Jewish elitist perceptions of the ‘chosen people’ were crystallized against a background of humiliation, scorn, hate, and alienation in the diaspora. Only a belief in his unique identity could sustain the Jew … The selfsame precepts, transferred to a situation where the Jews are the majority, ruling another nation [Arabs], interacting on an equal basis with the [other] goyim, assume a sinister, domineering significance. Ahavat Israel, the love of Israel, the deep sense of affinity and of common destiny, the belief in col Israel haverim (all Israel are comrades) which sustained the diaspora Jews and gave them a measure of security, resulted in xenophobia – being increasingly perceived as synonymous with sin’at hagoy (hate for the goyim).” [Benvenisti, p. 76]

In 1882 there were only 24,000 Jews in what was then called Palestine, an area under control of the Muslim Ottoman Empire of Turkey since 1516 (Great Britain took over control of Palestine in 1918). The first Zionist Congress was held in Switzerland in 1887 and by the late 1890s Theodore Herzl had seized prominent stage in the new Zionist movement, visiting wealthy Jewish philanthropists and even the Sultan of Turkey in the hopes of creating a Jewish state in the Holy Land. To acquire Palestine, said Herzl, “we require diplomatic negotiations … and propaganda on a large scale.” [LAQUEUR, p. 95] In the case of the Turkish ruler, Walter Laqueur observes that Herzl “was ready to use his influence [at the most important newspaper in central Europe, the Neue Freie Presse] to play down the anti-Armenian persecutions.” [LAQUEUR, p. 118]

Most early Jews in Palestine were religiously-oriented. With increased interest (mainly by Jews in Eastern Europe) in Jewish nationalism, and the growing Ho-revei Zion (Lovers of Zion) movement, activist Jews of a more secular nature began to make their way to Palestine in the later 1880s. Between 1881 and 1904 (in what is called the First Aliya – ascension – in Zionist circles) 30,000 Jews emigrated to Palestine. Still, by 1918 and World War I, the (now) 56,000 Jews in Palestine were still tiny compared to the 640,000 Arabs around them. [SHAPIRA, p. 22-23]

Although Zionism was conceived as a Jewish “back to the land” movement, “by 1910,” notes Walter Laqueur, “the [Zionist] settlers were owners of plantations employing mainly Arab workers. Their own children were sent to education in France.” [LAQUEUR, p. 79] “The major reason that Zionism survived its struggling early period before 1917,” says Norman Cantor, “was that it received the endorsement and patronage of many [Jewish] billionaire patriarchs and their charitable organizations right from the start of the modern Zionist ventures in the 1880s.” [CANTOR, p. 298] Of particular importance in this regard in the early Zionist years was Baron Edmond de Rothschild, one of the heirs to the fabulous Rothschild European banking dynasty.

Jews continued to make their way to Palestine, in repeated waves. There were second (1904-1914), third (1919-1923), fourth (1924-1928), and fifth aliyahs (1929-1939). After the founding of the Israeli state in 1948, the next ten years witnessed another 900,000 Jews moving to live in the Holy Land. In 1950 over 100,000 Jews emigrated from Israel to Iraq. “They were driven out of Iraq to Israel,” notes Amnon Rubenstein, “motivated by numerous anti-Jewish attacks. At the time, however, it was widely assumed these attacks were perpetrated by hostile Iraqis, but recent scholarship indicates the actions were undertaken by overly zealous Zionists who wanted to create an atmosphere of fear that would convince the Iraqis to move to Israel.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 60]

The Jewish National Fund was created in 1901, in large part to purchase land. Another international Jewish organization, the Jewish Agency, was founded in 1929 to encourage Jewish immigration, raise funds for settlement, and address administration of the new Jewish communities. By 1980, the Jewish National Fund alone had spent $15 billion on the Jews of Israel; per its charters, none of it went to the Arab sector of Israeli society. [AVISHAI, p. 320] By the 1920s, Palestinian Arabs began sometimes violent resistance to what they saw as Jewish encroachment, fearing what their new neighbors’ ultimate intentions might be. Major acts of violence continued to increase between Arabs and Zionists. In 1929, in rioting over control of the Jerusalem Wailing Wall, (the area with high religious significance to both to Jews and Muslims), 38 Arabs and 29 Jews were killed; riots spread into the distant towns of Hebron and Safed. A total of 120 Jews and 87 Arabs were reported killed in the fighting. By 1939 20,000 British troops had largely subdued Arab revolt against Zionist incursion.

“Hundreds of Arab villages” were destroyed by Jews by the end of 1949. “Traditional Israeli history,” says Amnon Rubenstein, “has presented the Palestinian exodus as the responsibility of Arab leaders who ordered the Palestinians to flee, promising that they could soon return to their homes as conquering heroes. Israeli leaders encouraged them to stay in their homes and villages. Recent research by a number of historians and political scientists, including Israeli scholar and journalist Benny Morris, reveals that this is a myth on several grounds.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 52] Rubenstein notes that the “vast majority of Palestinians” were expelled or driven out by terrorist campaigns against them, including those by varied Israeli forces: the Haganah, the Israel Defense Force, Irgun and LEHI. There was even a military plan – Plan Dalet – to empty Arab villages for later Jewish settlement. [RUBENSTEIN, A. p. 53] “Those expelled,” says Rubenstein, “were allowed to take with them only what they could carry; many had their valuables stolen by Israeli soldiers as they passed military checkpoints.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 53]

With heavy fighting between Jews and Arabs in 1948, most of the 175,000 Arabs who remained in the area that officially became part of the new nation of Israel that year were peasants in interior regions that the warring little reached. These people and their descendants are today resident/citizens of the Jewish state of Israel, an underclass to be sure, but distinct from the Arabs in what is generally known as the Occupied Territories: Gaza, the West Bank, and the Golan Heights. Bernard Avishai notes the modern day status of the Israeli Arabs: “About half of Israel’s Arabs still live in nearly isolated towns and serve as a work force for Israeli Jewish industries. A quarter work on Jewish farms and construction sites. These figures convincingly show that the Israeli Arabs are dependent upon and dominated by the Jewish economy, that Arabs have become a segregated industrial proletariat in Israel.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 315]

Tens of thousands of Palestinian refugees flooded into the Gaza area, an area 4-8 miles wide and 28 miles long, bordered by Israel, Egypt, and the Mediterranean sea. In 1967 the 350,000 Palestinians crammed into this small space marked it as the highest population density on earth. (AVISHAI, B., p. 274] With complete Israeli control of the area in all facets of economic, social, and political life, by 1973 a third of Gaza’s laborers were forced to work in low-paying, benefit-less jobs for Jewish employers. With few rights and no hope in an entire area that resembled a prison, Israeli Army Chief of Staff Raphael Eitan once called the Palestinians trapped within Israeli rule in the Occupied Territories “drugged cockroaches in a bottle.” [JANSEN, M., p. 15]

By 1991 55% of the land mass of the West Bank and 30% of Gaza Strip was even controlled by the Jewish National Fund. This means, notes Amnon Rubenstein, “that increasing numbers of Palestinians are forced into ever-smaller amounts of territory and in many cases are denied their means of livelihood.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 91] Israeli-legislated human rights violations in the Occupied Territories has included, for decades, the “shooting and beating of unarmed individuals,” “expulsion from regions without cause,” “suppression of Palestinian culture” (the word Palestine, the displaying of the Palestinian flag, wearing its colors, etc. have all been punishable crimes during Israeli rule), “collective punishment of entire neighborhoods,” “military censorship of all publications,” “confiscation of land and water resources,” and “restriction of economic activities.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 95]

In 1981 an Israeli-created administration system in the West Bank removed elected mayors it disliked and replaced them with Jewish overseers in the Arab towns of Nablus, Ramallah, and El-Bireh. [AVISHAI, p. 292] “The West Bank is ruled under British emergency regulations from 1946,” notes Bernard Avishai, “which one former Israeli Justice Minister, Yaacov Shimon Shapiro, has called Fascist; Amnesty International reported that, from January to June 1979 alone, some 1500 youths were taken into custody. Tens of thousands more were interrogated, or intimidated during the period of the general strike in the spring of 1982.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 307]

The opportunity to nakedly exploit the subjugated Arab population has not been overlooked by Jewish rulers. “Israeli investors and contractors, meanwhile,” says Avishai, “have not failed to profit from the situation [in the Occupied Territories], [Israeli scholar] Benvenisti points out that hundreds of private speculators and builders have made fortunes here.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 308]

For a small minority of Israelis, such conditions forced upon another people has elicited serious soul-searching. “A prolonged squabble [in this case, with Arabs] does not ennoble,” noted prominent Israeli novelist Amos Oz, “it degrades. In our case it is pushing us back into our ‘hereditary’ depression, into the neuroses, the atavistic tribal madness from which we were trying to escape, back into megalomania, the paranoia, the traditional nightmare.” [OZ, A., p. 194] “The social tensions entailed by occupation,” says another Israeli, Bernard Avishai, “would have taken their toll on any democracy, but they have had a peculiar and unfortunate impact on Israel – inasmuch as Israeli democracy was improvised in 1948 and has subsequently been made to coexist with a number of residual, genuinely Zionist institutions which had always excluded non-Jews [AVISHAI, p. 299] … Since the occupation is run entirely according to military law, Israeli soldiers, many of whom are civilian reservists, have not been subject to normal civilian penalties for the crimes they commit in uniform … In two notorious cases, [Chief of Staff General Eitan] pardoned murderers. Nor are civil prosecutors able to appeal such decisions, and there are no civil rights by means of which an Arab victim’s family might seek redress.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 310]

There was also the 1990 case of Rabbi Moshe Levinger, which epitomized an entire genre of Israeli legal lenience for Jewish violence against Arabs. “Levinger,” noted the Toronto Star,

“a strident founder of Israel’s settler movement [in the West Bank and Gaza] who calls Arabs ‘dogs,’ yesterday drew five months in jail for shooting an unarmed Arab shopkeeper to death in Hebron in the occupied West Bank. Israeli human rights activists decried the sentence as a ‘frightening’ travesty of justice … After his car window was smashed by Palestinian stone-throwers, Levinger reached an army roadblock and safety, and then opened fire on Arab merchants nearby, witnesses said … In 29 cases where Israelis allegedly killed Palestinians since the start of the Palestinian uprising, only four cases went to court, said Naam Yashuvi, information director for B’Tselem, a prominent Israeli human rights group. Two resulted in jail terms: the Levinger case, and that of Israel Zeev, who in December, 1988, got three years in jail and two more suspended for killing a shepherd.” [BARTHOS, G., 1990, p. A2]

In overview, observed Glenn Frankel, “A country that enforced a permanent military occupation in the West Bank and Gaza that denied its Palestinian subjects even the most rudimentary rights of free speech and the vote, and that locked up, abused and expelled Palestinians without formal charges or trial could not claim to wholeheartedly share liberal American values.” [FRANKEL, G., p. 224]

In response to Jewish dominance in the Holy Land, the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) was founded in 1964 to violently resist the Jewish state of Israel; it also eventually warred with Arab splinter groups like Fateh and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

With the expulsion of large numbers of Arabs in Israel’s “War of Independence” from self-declared Jewish lands, and with the impossibility of these refugees returning, the new Israeli government declared, in 1950, the Law for the Acquisition of Absent Property. Anyone absent from their property between November 1, 1947 and September 1 1948, and not residing in Jewish-controlled areas, was declared to have abandoned ownership and the property was confiscated by the Jewish state. This process also had the effect of robbing many Arab citizens within Jewish boundaries (who didn’t even know about the new law, or were unable to challenge it) from their lands. As Amnon Rubenstein explains, “once property was declared absentee property, this status would remain in force, even if it could later be proved that the property had been incorrectly classified.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 62] Another device to rob Arabs of their land was through the Emergency Article for the Exploitation of Uncultivated Areas. Land that had not been cultivated in the past three years was also confiscated by the state, often by declaring “an area farmed by Palestinians a closed military zone so that no Palestinian was allowed to enter it. After the three-year period had elapsed, the land could then be declared uncultivated” and seized. [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 63] Some Palestinian land officially under Ottoman Empire or British Mandate registration was also confiscated by the new Jewish state.

Despite condemnation by the international community, Israel formally annexed East Jerusalem in 1967 and the Golan Heights (bordering Syria) in 1981.

In its formative years, Zionism was actually overwhelmingly rejected by most of the world’s Jews. In Europe, in the nineteenth century, one of the most influential leaders of the Reform Judaism movement, Abraham Geiger, attacked Moses Hess as someone who “after bankruptcy as a socialist and all kinds of swindles wants to make a hit with [Jewish] nationalism.” [LAQUEUR, p. 53] In 1919 “French leader Sylvain Levi spoke violently against the restoration of a Jewish home in Palestine.” [LITVINOFF, B., p. 114] Subscription to Zionism was feared to open Jews everywhere to charges of national disloyalty in the countries they lived. “Except for a few scattered voices,” says Aharon Feldman, “Jewish leadership as a whole saw Herzl’s Zionism as a threat to Jewish survival. The spiritual giants of the times [the turn of the twentieth century] – Reb Yitzhak Elhanem, the Hafetz Haim, and Reb Haim Brisker – refused to enter a partnership with it.” [FELDMAN, p. 23] The first Zionist World Congress was held in Basel, Switzerland. Plans had been to hold it in Munich, Germany, but the Jewish community there didn’t want it. [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 42]

As Jewish philosopher, Morris Raphael Cohen, wrote in The New Republic in 1919:

“A national Jewish Palestine must necessarily mean a state founded on a peculiar race, a tribal religion and a mystic belief in a peculiar soil, when liberal America stands for separation of Church and state, the free mixing of races, and the fact that men can change their habitation and language and still advance the process of civilization.” [ROSENFELD, A., 1997, p. 111]

Some in the ultra-Orthodox world even blamed Zionists for the Holocaust. “As early as the second World War,” notes Israeli scholar Aviezer Ravitzky, “harsh accusations were made by some ultra-Orthodox radicals concerning direct Zionist responsibility for what was happening [to Jews in Europe]: it was the Zionists’ declarations that provoked the anger of the oppressor to the point of bloodshed; it was they who hindered the rescue effort [of European Jewry]; it was they who disturbed the tranquility of the Jews in the lands of their dispersion.” [RAVITZKY, p. 65] While Jewish Orthodoxy rejected Zionism as “a false messianic movement,” so too did “most Jewish liberals and socialists, [who] having accepted the faith of the Enlightenment, rejected Zionism as a reactionary philosophy.” [KOLSKY, p. 15-17]

In Britain, by the 1930s the Anglo-Jewish Association of the Board of Deputies (which included prominent Jews like Edward Montagu, the British Secretary of State for India) believed that Zionism was for a Jews a “traitorous disloyalty to their native lands.” [LILIENTHAL, p. 23] Some Jews worried that the Zionist movement would fuel anti-Semitic hostility, invariably reaffirming perceptions that Jews were, wherever they were in the world, essentially elitist separatists, concerned only with their own people. “Prominent Jewish communal leaders,” notes Thomas Kolsky, “like Lucien Wolf, Claude Montefiore, and Laurie Magnus denounced Zionism as an ally of anti-Semitism.” [KOLSKY, p. 17]

In Germany, prominent Jewish writer Joseph Roth compared the parallel racial structures of Zionism and German fascism, writing a letter to a Jewish friend in 1935: “A Zionist is a National Socialist [i.e., German Nazi]; a Nazi is a Zionist … I cannot fathom how it is you wish to start the fight against Hitler, who is merely the imbecilic brother of the Zionist, using a brother of the National Socialist, i.e., a Zionist, even the most ingenious of them. Perhaps you can protect Jewry in that way. But I wish to protect both Europe and mankind from the Nazis and also from Hitler Zionists.” [SHAKED, p. 186] “In these remarks, addressed to another assimilated Jew, Stephan Zweig,” says Gershon Shaked, reflecting a common, modern, pro-Zionist Jewish sentiment, “pathological universalism reached its apogee.” [SHAKED, p. 186]

In America, prominent Rabbi Issac Wise publicly “denounced the whole question of a Jewish state as foreign to the spirit of the modern Jew of this land who looks upon America as his Palestine and whose interests are centered here.” [LAQUEUR, p. 384] Prominent American financier and Jewish activist Jacob Schiff stated that, “I cannot for one moment concede that one can be at the same time a true American and an honest adherent to the Zionist movement.” [WHEATCROFT, 1996, p. 129] The founder and first president of Hebrew University, and an influential American rabbi, Judah Leon Magnes, in the 1930s also rejected the idea of a Jewish national homeland. [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 41] In the ongoing Zionist propaganda war, however incongruously, prominent American Zionist activist Louis Brandeis “regularly linked the ‘Zionist cause’ with the American ideal of democracy, of social justice and of liberty.” [SARNA, J., p. 57] This universalist view is commonly articulated to defend “particularist” Zionism to this day.

In 1942 a Jewish organization was founded by a group of Reform rabbis to oppose Zionism, the American Council for Judaism (ACJ). “The ACJ,” noted Kolsky, “condemned all forms of Jewish separatism … [and] denounced Zionist talk about homelessness, and opposed granting Jews special privileges … It rejected the creation of an exclusively Jewish state as undemocratic and as a retreat from the universal vision of Judaism.” [KOLSKY, p. 4] As ACJ head, and life-long anti-Zionist, Elmer Berger in later years noted one of the reasons Jews had joined ACJ: “The racial peoplehood character of Zionism was, on an ethical and moral basis, something to be particularly repudiated.” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 69] As the mass murder of the Jews under Hitler became better known, however, the ACJ’s position lost support in the Jewish community; it was soon disbanded. By 1946, one poll showed that 80% of American Jews supported the idea of a Jewish state in what was then Palestine. [SPIEGEL, S., p. 18]

Zionism in its development has been varied in ideological expression, manifest over the years in at least four principle branches. The weakest version was “spiritual Zionism”, or “cultural Zionism,” which held that “the Jewish people’s fate was to be dispersed and their mission was to transmit their unique spiritual genius to the societies in which they lived.” [JANSEN, p. 5] Asher HaAm (Asher Ginsberg), who moved to Palestine in 1921, was an influential exponent of this Zionist view. Earlier, upon former visits to the Holy Land, he wrote with concern that Jewish colonists there “treat Arabs with hostility and cruelty, deprive them of their rights, offend them without cause and even boast of their deeds, and nobody among us opposes this despicable and dangerous inclination.” [JANSEN, p. 6]
The most historically important version of Zionism – rooted in the socialist and communist origins of Eastern European Ashkenazi Jewish pioneers in Palestine – has been Labor Zionism. For decades Labor was dominant in founding the socio-political principles of the modern Jewish nation; it created the powerful Histadrut trade union, the Haganah (forerunner of today’s Israeli army), Israel’s largest bank, an insurance and other companies, and it emphasized and disproportionately supported its showpiece “back to the land” movement through communally owned socialist enterprises known as kibbutzim. The effects of Labor Zionism’s state-dominated economy remain today. “Recently published research,” noted Norman Cantor in the mid-1990s, “sponsored by Canada’s Fraser Institute and the U.S.-based Liberty Fund, show that in a survey of hundreds of economics professors around the world, Israel ranked nearly last in degree of economic freedom, ahead of only several communist countries and India.” [CANTOR, p. 385] Nonetheless, with huge infusions of American charity, the “Israeli economy in the 1991-96 period grew faster than any other industrial economy – averaging over 5.2% per year – with the lowest levels of unemployment in the country’s history.” [GARFINKEL, A., p. 117]

Labor Zionism disdained the “economic middleman” character of traditional European Jewry and celebrated physical work and toil, particularly agricultural, and most particularly in Israel, reconnecting with a lost identity. “The Jewish people has been completely cut off from nature and imprisoned with city walls for 2,000 years,” said early Zionist A. D. Gordon, “We have become accustomed to every form of life, except to a life of labor – of labor done at its own behest and for its own sake … A parasitical people is not a living people.” [CHAFETS, Z., p. 30]

At its earliest, idealistic stages some supporters of this brand of Zionism proclaimed a familiar theme: yet another Jewish expression – post-Enlightenment – to attempt to explain Jewish “uniqueness” in terms less problematical and offensive to others, now framed as a Jewish nation that would – at the very least – set emulative examples for others. It was, in secular terms, messianic in scope. Amnon Rubenstein notes that “the Labor [Zionist] movement endeavored to translate the Jewish terms of uniqueness into a contemporary universal language … It sought to go further and place the new Israel at the helm of international society. It spoke with messianic passion about a new millennium; a classless society, the religion of work, the redemption of man, the communal settlement experience, the kibbutz and the moshav [another form of communal agricultural settlement], the Histadrut as a workers’ society.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 45]

Labor Zionism had been completely dominant in Israeli political society until 1977, when the rightist Zionist strands of Menachem Begin was voted to power. Begin’s coalition party was the Likud; his own roots were in one of the right-wing organizations called Herut, which in turn was historically linked to the “radical right” version of Zionism known as Revisionism, founded by Vladimir Zabotinsky. Although overshadowed by Labor Zionism, Revisionists were not tiny. By 1931 the Revisionists claimed 21% of the delegates at the World Zionist Congress. [BELL, Terror, p. 24] “Vladimir Zabotinsky,” noted
David Biale, charged that Jews in the Diaspora “despised manhood, the principle of male power as understood by all free people in history, physical courage and physical force …, [and] prowess of the body … [which was] an object of ridicule.” [BIALE, p. 137] “Because the Yid [Jew] is ugly, sickly, and lacks decorum,” once said Jabotinsky, “we shall endow the ideal image of the Hebrew with masculine beauty.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 4] Elsewhere, Jabotinsky asserted that “Every race possessing a definite uniqueness seeks to become a nation, that is, to create for itself an economic, political, and intellectual environment in which every detail will derive from its specific thought and consequence that will also relate to its specific taste. A specific race can establish such an environment only in its own country, where it is master. For this reason every race seeks to become a state.” [AVISHAI, B., p.125]

“In the 1930s,” says Haim Breseeth, “the Revisionists, a typical European rightist force, were greatly influenced by Mussolini, adapting some of the trappings of fascism: motorcades of blackshirts, a party publication was renamed Diary of a Fascist; and some training camps were held in fascist Italy. Immediately after the coming to power of the Nazis, fascism became a central icon in Palestine, dividing left and right, or more accurately, Labor Zionism, led by Ben-Gurion, from the Revisionist camp, led by Jabotinsky.” [BRESEETH, p. 194-195] “Breaking away [from the other Zionist groups] in the 1920s,” says Peter Grose, “Jabotinsky’s Revisionist Zionism organized its own fighting force in Palestine. The Irgun Zvai Leumi came to remind unsympathetic outsiders of Mussolini fascists; Ben-Gurion called the Revisionist leader ‘Vladimir Hitler.’” [GROSE, p. 161] “Revisionists,” notes Edwin Black, “… were heavily fascists and profoundly influenced by Mussolini … True to fascist ideology, the fist and shout were the preferred methods of achieving Revisionist goals.” [BLACK, E., p. 143] Labor and Revisionist Zionism came close to civil war when the latter group brought a shipload of weapons into Israel. The ship was sunk by rival Zionists’ artillery fire and 16 members of the Irgun were killed. And, “ever since the mysterious murder of the Zionist ‘foreign minister’ Chaim Arlosoroff in 1933,” says Jay Gonen, “allegedly by right-wing Revisionists, there had been fears of Jewish fascism.” [GONEN, p. 58]

“Jabotinsky’s most cherished creation was Betar,” noted Livneh Eliezer, “[This] youth movement … was … a semi-militaristic entity that stressed hierarchy, discipline, obedience to superiors, rituals, and ceremonies. Military values [were] … a virtue,” as was “romantic heroism.” [ELIEZER, p. 26] Another small group (founded in 1931) linked to Revisionist theory was Brit Habironim (the Covenant of Thugs) which “was a mythological rediscovery of the glorious tales of the [Israeli] nation, a romantic glorification of the old days of blood, soil, heroism, and conquest.” [ELIEZER, p. 25] Among the “Covenant of Thugs” was Uri Zvi Greenberg, a popular poet well-respected in today’s Israel. Greenberg saw socialism as a “most dangerous enemy, and became more and more convinced that a dictator was needed to lead the masses.” [LAQUEUR, p. 362]

Some in the Revisionist camp in the 1930s, notes Jewish scholar Walter Laqueur, “expressed the view that but for Hitler’s anti-Semitism German National Socialism would have been acceptable [to Jews] and that, anyway, Hitler had saved Germany [LAQUEUR, W., p. 33] … Within the [Revisionist] movement there were … sections, some of them influential [where] … fascist ideas had made considerable headway and, but for the rise of Hitler and Nazism, would no doubt have become even more prominent.” [LAQUEUR, p. 382] Among Revisionist plans for Palestine (and a larger Transjordan area) was the expelling of Arabs to Iraq. [SELZER, p. 218, 219] Revisionist policy foresaw Jewish lands stretching from the Nile River into what is today Jordan. (In 1983, Eryk Spekter, CEO of Fame Fabrics in the U.S. and a former chairman of Herut USA, began awarding a $100,000 “Defender of Jerusalem” prize from his Jabotinsky Foundation at presentation dinners to people “who had stood up for Jewish rights.” Over the years, winner’s of the Jabotinsky Foundation’s award included Menachem Begin, New York Times editor A. M. Rosenthal, American Republican cabinet members Jeannine Kirkpatrick and George Schultz, Hawaiian Senator Daniel Inouye, and former French cabinet minister, Simone Weil among others). [NY TIMES, 12-16-98, B13]

Simha Flapan notes that

“The Yishuv and the Jewish masses in the Diaspora rejected most of his concepts, but [Jabotinsky] left an indelible mark on the Zionist attitude towards the Arab question. He implanted in Jewish psychology the image of the Arab as the mortal enemy, the idea of the inevitability of the conflict and of the impossibility of a solution except by sheer force. He propagated the ‘either-or’ notion by which all and every means was justified including terror and ruthless retaliation in the struggle for survival.” [FLAPAN, S., 1979, p. 117]

A fourth, increasingly important – and disturbing – strand of Zionism has been what is often referred to as “Messianic Zionism,” or “Religious Zionism.” In recent years its umbrella political group is the National Religious Party. Its influence escalated dramatically after 1967. With the “decline of socialist belief” in Zionism,” notes Amnon Rubenstein, “a resurgence of religious feeling gradually emerged … Many Israelis began to harbor a disbelief in the power of a new Jewish nationalism to replace traditional Jewish values.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 94] Aviezer Ravitzky notes that Zionism’s move towards the religious may be inevitable: “Zionism … seemed to [seek] to overthrow the traditional way of life and rebelled against the imperatives of the past. Yet at the same time it looked backwards: it employs the sacred symbols of the past and aspired to fulfill ancient Jewish hopes.” [RAVITZKY, A., p. 10]

Among Religious Zionism’s most prominent proponents was Rabbi Yitzhak Hacohen Kook, who believed that secular Zionist success in bringing Jews to power in the Holy Land was part of the establishment conditions that would lead to the triumphant return of the Messiah. Kook’s son, Zvi Yehudah Kook, also a rabbi who headed a religious school, notes Amos Elon, “raised a generation of zealots, a new Jewish man … Wrapped in a prayer shawl and armed with a Kalashnikov; nationalistic, callously trampling the watermelon bed of the Arabs.” [JANSEN, p. 4-5] This Kook asserted that the modern state of Israel was “fulfillment of the biblical tradition of redemption.” [RAVITZKY, A., p. 80] Elsewhere, fulfilling the worst concerns of any anti-Semite, he proclaimed that “The state of Israel is divine … Not only can/must there be no retreat from a single kilometer of the Land of Israel, God forbid, we shall conquer and liberate more and more … We are stronger than America, stronger than Russia … Our position in the world, in the world of history, in the cosmic world, is stronger and more secure in its timelessness than theirs. There are nations that know this, and there are nations of uncircumcised hearts that do not know it, but they shall gradually come to know it! … In our divine, world-encompassing undertaking, there is no room for retreat.” [RAVITZKY, A., p. 132]

 Religious Zionism took especially strong hold in Israel after the 1967 War. Jewish seizure of wider territory harkened for some Jewish thinkers the likeliness that conditions were being created for the return of the Messiah. Religious Zionists are particularly noticeable in the many garrisoned Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Arab areas. Zealous doctrine declares that the Occupied Territories of the West Bank and Gaza must never be surrendered to Arab jurisdiction. Philip Bentley of Floral Park, New Jersey, president of the Jewish Peace Fellowship says that

“I first time I noticed it was in 1981. I was on a post-convention tour of Israel for rabbis and their spouses. Our tour guide spoke of the settlements through the Occupied Territories on the West Bank … He told us that the Land will not produce for the Arabs like it will produce for the Jews, because this is our Land and the Land knows its true people … I immediately recognized this theory for what it was – old-fashioned blood-and-soil fascism … Add this to their … elevation of Jewish possession of the land over all other values; their demonization of Arabs as ‘Amalek’ and of Jews who support the Peace process as traitors or worse; and their belief that God demands of Israel that it expel non-Jews from the land or subjugate them even if it means war because Redemption depends upon it … It is time to promote Jewish unity, but not at the expense once again of ignoring the deadly cancer that exists in Israel and among some Jews the world over – fascism.” [BENTLEY, P.]

Among the most influential of the Religious Zionists is the group known as Gush Emunim (Block of the Faithful). Founded in 1974, its physical expression is symbolized men in knitted skullcaps carrying automatic weapons. Many are activists in Jewish settlements in the occupied territories. And many of these Jews are from America. “It is important to realize,” notes Amnon Rubenstei, “that [Gush Emunim’s] significance is not confined to the political area and does not lie merely in their ability to force their will upon the country. Gush Emunim … provides a vociferous and occasionally theatrical voice to a wider tendency within Israeli society … The influence of the Gush – always numerically a small fractional minority – upon Labor [Zionism] cannot be overestimated. They imposed their will upon successive Labor cabinets and forced the government’s hand on critical issues.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 104, 106]
By the late 1990s, noted the Jewish Monthly, “an estimated one-third of the recruits in IDF officer-training programs are religious Zionists.” [KEINON, H., p. 31] Concerns have been growing in some Jewish circles that such people will listen to Orthodox rabbinical instruction over military superiors. “In fact,” says Herb Keinon, “the army faced the beginnings of such a crisis in July 1995 when a dozen leading rabbis in the national religious camp signed a decree stating that the Torah forbids soldiers to evacuate army bases and then turn them over to non-Jews.” [KEINON, H., p. 31]

Ironically, with secular Labor Zionism being increasingly threatened by traditional religious-political currents, Israeli society today roils today in a furious imploding of the traditional Jewish Victimhood identity; confronted with a society that is predominantly other Jews, Jewish complainers must sooner or later face an inevitable Jewish Enemy in a Jewish-constructed society: the Victimhood Society itself as Oppressor. In a country where there are principally only other Jews to accuse as neighbor-monsters, what must be inevitably expressed is the curious spectacle of an intra-Jewish civil war over pre-eminent Victimhood status, i.e., opposing Jewish ideological groups asserting – and demanding – their respective version of the Jewish Persecution Tradition as pre-eminent over the other. “Each community,” says Emmett Ayala, “the secular and the religious, feels that it is on the margins of Israeli society, expressing anxieties of powerlessness in a public culture defined by the other.” [AYALA, E., p. 129]

To the degree that the Israeli government does not act entirely by Jewish religious law, notes Boas Evron, “to a certain extent the Orthodox communities in Israel regard the state in which it lives as an alien ‘gentile’ state (and in Israel this is accompanied by a particular hostility, for the very reason that the state claims to be Jewish).” [EVRON, B., 1995, p. 110]

Forms of Jewish Orthodoxy and ultra-Orthodoxy in Israel continues, often militantly, to grow. In 1988, Knesset elections marked “a dramatic rise in the political power of the Haredi (or ultra-Orthodox) parties.” Noteworthy beneficiaries were Agudat Israel and Shas, the Sephardic Haredi party. [FRIEDMAN, M., p. 177] “As fundamentalist-religious movements began to acquire power elsewhere in the world,” notes Menachem Friedman, “many observers – in Israel and abroad – tended to view the rise in Haredi strength as a genuine threat to liberal-secular culture.” [FRIEDMAN, M., p. 178] This growing influence in Israel is rooted in the belief that “the Jewish people are above history, and their political and spiritual destiny is determined directly by God, according to their fulfillment of Halacha.” [FRIEDMAN, M., p. 179] “Orthodoxy in Israel is no longer a creed,” complained Uri Huppert in 1988, “it is a well-established clerical rabbinical hierarchy and lay political and administrative infrastructure affecting very strongly the most sensitive political issues … Now, a generation after the Six Day War, nationalistic-Zionist Orthodoxy has emerged as a ‘nationalized’ Talmudic-halachic ideology of the Israeli ‘Moral Majority.’ This trend represents almost 50 percent of the Israeli electorate.” [HUPPERT, U., 1988, p. 21]
In 1998, Ran Kislev, citing a range of Orthodox rabbinical controls over burial practices, marriage, and other momentous personal milestones in Israeli society, wrote that:

“Not only are the laws of [medical] pathology adapted according to rabbinical rulings, but also an entire branch of surgery on transplants is limited by them … There are those among us warning against the dangers of Israel’s transformation into a halachic state. They instill in us a fear of an ayatollah state, like Iran. They may have missed the boat. We are not merely en route to an ayatollah state, we are already well in the midst of one.” [KISLEV, 7-24-98]

In 2000, confronting secular Israeli society, a news report noted that “Israel’s leading orthodox rabbis [the Council of Torah Sages] have issued a ruling banning the Internet from Jewish homes,” declaring that it is “1,000 times more dangerous than television” (which they banned thirty years ago) and it “threatened the survival of the country.” [PHILLIPS, A., 2000, p. 18]

Increased Orthodox influence in Israeli life also has serious ramifications for Jewish women. Israel already was problematic for the equality of women: in 1997 Jewish Israeli women earned half as much in their jobs as did their male counterparts. [LIPSCHITZ, M., p. 37] Since Israel’s founding, only 6.8% of the member of the Israeli parliament (Knesset) have been women. Most women who go into the Israeli army serve in a special unit called chen (Hebrew for “charm.”) The first female mayor elected to a town in Israel was not Jewish; she was Violet Khoury, an Arab woman in the Arab village of Kfar Yassif. [POPE, V., p. 202-211] Of especially momentous consequence to women, there is no civil marriage or divorce permitted in Israel; such matters – as well as rulings on child custody, deaths, and so on, in a standing compromise with the secular government – are controlled by the Orthodox rabbinate. “Among Jews,” says Juliet Pope,

“these matters are ruled by rabbinical courts which not only prohibit women from serving as judges but even ban the appearance of women as witnesses. According to Jewish law, a woman cannot get a divorce without the consent of her husband. Even in extremely difficult cases where a wife is physically abused or where her husband is missing or insane, the civil courts cannot grant her a divorce … A recent study suggested that in Israel there are currently as many as 7,000 women, termed agunot, who have been refused divorce, many of them subject to blackmail and extortion.” [POPE, p. 216, 217]

The oppression of women under Orthodox Jewish law even includes bigamy. “In several cases,” notes Israeli lawyer Uri Huppert,

“and they are not rare, the rabbinical tribunal [in Israel] permits a husband to take an additional wife. Thus criminal law in Israel allows Jews to practice bigamy when it has been permitted, with certain limitations, by the Chief Rabbinical Council … In only the year 1984-85, seventy-six requests were approved in Israel to marry an additional wife. For the same period, in Jerusalem alone, eighteen such requests were granted.” [HUPPERT, U., 1988, p. 167]
In 2000, due to Orthodox political influence, “women who worship in prayer shawls or chant from Torah scrolls at the Western Wall, the holiest shrine in Judaism, could go to prison for seven years under new legislation proposed by Israel’s parliament, the Knesset.” [VENTURA COUNTY STAR, 6-3-2000, p. A10]

Ironically, increasing Orthodox domination of Israeli society profoundly threatens many Jewish Americans’ myths about Israel. For many, it is even threatens their very identity as Jews. Whatever people who have only a Jewish father think of themselves (as well as converts to Reform and Conservative versions of Judaism, and a number of other categories), many are shocked to discover in visits to Israel that they are, by the Orthodox standards that govern such matters in Israel, not Jewish. Not only that. Because marriages, burials, and governance for Jewish identity itself are Orthodox-controlled and so-sanctioned by the Israeli government, Jews who align themselves with more liberal Reform or Conservative Judaism are prevented from fully expressing their religious beliefs in Israel. As Reform Rabbi Uri Regev, head of the Israel Religious Action Center, frames it: “Israel is the only country in the free democratic world which … denies Jews religious freedom.” [HYMAN, M., 1998, p. 107]

Whatever else the modern Jewish nation is, it is a military state: a heavily armed Jewish collective. Jewish youth (with a few exceptions, for example, chassids) after age 18 must join the military, men for three years and women for two. Men must also serve time every year (generally 30-60 days) in the ranks until they are age 55. “Compulsory military service,” observes Hanna Herzog, “reserve duty, and Israel’s recurring wars have made the Israel Defense Force (IDF) a staple of the Israeli experience and a key to Israeli identity … A significant portion of the socialization of Israeli youngsters is related to preparations for military service.” [HERZOG, H., 1998]

“Israel has been an armed camp and its entire population a citizen army,” says Laurence Silberstein, “The social and cultural consequences of a virtually total conscription policy have been far-reaching and significant. The army has been the meeting place for all Israelis … For the [Jewish] immigrant, the army has served, by conscious plan, as a primary school of Israel’s socialization.” [SILBERSTEIN, p. 34] “Military status is the single most important measure of social status for young men,” adds Zev Chafets, “To volunteer for an elite combat unit is the equivalent of attending an Ivy League university.” [CHAFETS, p. 212] “Being a professional soldier in Israel,” says Adam Garfinkel, “is a very high status profession. Being a member of an elite battalion, such as the Golani Brigade, is the dream of thousands of boys … The Ministry of Defense is usually thought of as the key civilian cabinet post [in the government] … In Israel, children generally stay in the same group all the way through school and go into the army together … They … know by second nature how to function and think as a unit … Army service for immigrants or their children has traditionally been the critical means of integrating into the society, of learning the language, and of apprehending the zeitgeist of the country.” [GARFINKEL, p. 108-109, 113]

25-45% of the Israeli Gross National Product is devoted to defense-related programs. [GARFINKEL, p. 115] (Despite its tiny size of only six million people, by some estimates Israel is the fourth largest military power on earth). Glenn Frankel noted in 1987 that Israel “still operated one of the most centralized state-run economies this side of North Korea. Bitahon, the Hebrew word for ‘military security,’ dominated people’s lives and dreams … [Israelis] paid more than half their income in taxes … There was one television station and it was state-owned … Every Memorial Day Israel dispatched to its elementary schools the parents of slain soldiers to tell the story of their children’s sacrifice and plant the seed of fear, pride, and determination in the new generation.” [FRANKEL, p. 24] “Memorialization of the dead,” says Myron Aronoff, “is a Leitmotiv in Israeli culture … In fact, it has become so extensive and central to the political culture that I suggest it has evolved into a national cult of memorializing the dead … Regularized rites institutionalized by the IDF are held at 39 military cemeteries throughout the country and two major monuments the day before the celebration of Israel’s Independence Day.” [ARONOFF, p. 54] Among those early Zionist heroes in Europe who have been reburied in Israel include Moses Hess, Vladimir Jabotinsky, and Theodore Herzl. [ARONOFF, p. 54]

Israel’s self-image, says Glenn Frankel, has been “a garrison-nation waving its defiant flag before implacable enemies in a treacherous part of the world. Its unifying myths were the twin traumas of Masada and the Holocaust. Its heroes were military men.” [FRANKEL, p. 23] “Israeli political history,” says Adam Garfinkel, “is full of generals moving into politics. Yitzhak Rabin, Ezer Weizman, Moshe Dayan, Yigal Allon, Ariel Sharon, Rafel Eytan, Avigdor Kahalani, and Ehud Barak.” [GARFINKEL, p. 188] Israel’s first prime minister, Ben Gurion, says Jacob Agus, believed that “the golden age of Israel was not the rise of literary prophecy in the eighth century before the Christian era, but the heroic generations of Joshua and the Judges that captured the Holy Land and slaughtered its inhabitants [AGUS, p. 214] … Men like Alexander Yannai, who could eat and drink while he watched with delight the torment and crucifixion of his enemies, were the real heroes of Jewish history. So were all the Maccabean rulers, including in particular that moral monster, Herod the Great.” [AGUS, p. 215] For the likes of modern demagogue Meir Kahane, “force, violence, and domination seem the very content of Jewish experience, its peak, as it were.” [BLIDSTEIN]

“There exists,” says Victor Azarya, “a strong similarity between army culture and civilian popular culture. Military slang and linguistic expressions are widely used in the civilian society. Army overcoats and other clothing items set the pace for young people’s fashion [AZARYA, p. 102] … The IDF [Israeli Defense Force] operates its own radio station [broadcasting, by 1981, Israel’s most popular radio channel, Galei Zahal], publishes various books, magazines and newspapers, and until a few years ago maintained a number of musical and theatrical ensembles. The civic education objective is never lost in these activities.” [AZARYA, p. 111]
Like any nation, the modern state of Israel has a discernible collective psychological attitude: a communal “personality.” It is formed at core by the conviction that Israelis as a Jewish island are a people under constant siege by hostile \textit{goyim}, immediately at hand manifest by neighboring Arabs. A key ingredient of the Israeli public persona, much championed, is that they are tough, macho, and emotionally hardened. And ruthless. Israeli popular culture celebrates a rugged self-image through the symbol of the “\textit{sabra}” (literally meaning a cactus fruit, but colloquially meaning a Jew born in Israel). In popular Israeli folklore, the Jews of Israel are “thorny and tough on the outside, but soft inside.”

This macho, mean Israeli self-image that has developed is the result of a consciously promoted Zionist self-identity towards a secular, redemptive inversion of the old Shylock Ghetto Jew image, of which all were so ashamed. “These Jews, described as ’sheep who went to the slaughter,’” says Carmon Arye, “have been perceived as the antithesis of the self-image that has been inculcated into Israeli collective consciousness.” [ARYE, p. 76] “Puny, ugly, enslaved, degraded and egoistic,” said Nachum Syrkin, one of the foremost Zionist theorists, “is the Jew when he forgets his great self; great, beautiful, moral and social is the Jew when he returns to himself and recognizes his own soul.” [in RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 6] The necessity in Zionist leadership to replace a perceived shameful communal past is noted by Jacques Kornberg:

“The traits [Theodore] Herzl derided in the bourgeoisie – greed, opportunism, lack of idealism, vulgar ostentation – were characteristics imputed to Jews above all. Capitalism was a new phenomenon in Austria, Vienna, viewed especially after 1873, as morally shady and as a Jewish creation, arising out of Jews’ proclivity for commerce … [KORNBERG, p. 66] … Herzl saw cowardice as a Jewish trait and … this fed his Jewish self-contempt … [KORNBERG, p. 70] … Describing an evening at a wealthy business friend’s home, Herzl wrote: ‘Yesterday a grand soiree at Treitel’s. Around 30 to 40 ugly little Jews and Jewesses. No consoling sight.’” [KORNBERG, p. 72]

Hence, Arab threat or not, the emphatic inversion in modern Israel. “The predominant attitude in all walks of life in Israel,” noted Georges Tamarin in 1973, “both in the written and spoken languages, tends to raise the \textit{sabra} [image] to an idol-like stature and a superman. This begins in the kindergarten, with tales in which the \textit{sabras} are depicted as \textit{free} and \textit{proud}, in contrast to their inferior parents from the Diaspora.” [TAMARIN, p. 115]

The \textit{sabra} image also has deep psychological sources in the nationalist “lessons” learned from the Holocaust, a situation where a perceived lack of Jewish physical force and power in the diaspora (\textit{galut}) throughout the world inevitably must – sooner or later – lead to disaster at the hands of Gentiles.

Ze’ev Chafets notes that

“It is impossible to underestimate the centrality of the Holocaust in the Israeli psyche … This sense of fear and rage is omnipresent. Every anti-Israeli or anti-Jewish statement or action feeds it, and people take a perverse pleasure in collecting examples. Not a day goes by without press reports [in Israel] of persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union, in Syria, Iran, Argentina, Romania … The sense of persecution remains the national glue … A great many Israelis have come to see the [Arab-Israeli] conflict in an emotional way, as a continuation of the Jewish condition. And, since anti-Semitism is a mysterious and irrational disease, the tendency is to view the conflict in irrational, almost fatalistic terms.” [CHAFETS, p. 100-101]

Zionism, in whatever form, has invariably dovetailed with some of the central tenets of classical religious Judaism, including the old “people apart” syndrome: Jewish alienation from all other peoples. “The civil religion [of Israel],” notes Charles Liebman and Eliezer Dov-Yehiya, “has been most forceful in asserting that Israel is an isolated nation confronting a hostile world … The growing importance of traditional Judaism and Jewishness is associated with the centrality of the Holocaust as the primary political myth of Israeli society, the symbol of Israel’s present condition and the one which provides Israel with legitimacy … The Holocaust to a great extent fashions ‘our national consciousness’ and the memory is omnipresent in Israeli society.” [SAIDEL, p. 18]

“As the show drew to a close, the group swung into an up-temp number.
‘Ha’olam Ku’lo heg’denu,’ they sang. ‘The whole world is against us.’ The audience knew the song and joined in on the chorus … [:] ‘The whole world is against us; never mind, we’ll get by; we don’t give a damn about them anyway.’” [CHAFETS, p. 98] (Peter Novick notes that this song was “at the top of the Jewish scholar Daniel Niewyk notes the racist dimension of the Zionist ideology of alienation from others, especially as it developed in Germany:

“At the heart of the Zionist critique of liberal assimilation lay the conviction that Jews constitute a unique race. It was the belief in insurmountable racial differences that made the inevitability of anti-Semitism credible, just as it rationalizes the view that every effort to assimilate must go aground on the barrier reef of biological determinism
… [NIEWYK, p. 129] … The maintenance of that [racial] purity was essential to German Zionism, for it acknowledged the essential prerequisite for nationhood to be [in the 1922 words of Zionist Fritz Kahn] ‘consanguinity of the flesh and solidarity of the soul’ together with the ‘will to establish a closer [Jewish] brotherhood over [and] against all other communities on earth.” [NIEWYK, p. 130]
Amnon Rubenstein notes the disturbing irony expressed in this world view of the Israeli people: “The establishment of Israel was an attempt to make Jews like everybody else. They would now have a state. It has not worked out that way. Israel has made Jews more, not less, exceptional. The pariah people, it seems, have simply succeeded in creating a pariah state.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 88] Perhaps, however, this situation is inevitable. Unmentioned by Rubenstein is the religiously-based “nation apart” self-concept always so deeply embedded in Jewish mass psychology, a self-understanding and communal choice that apparently cannot be shaken, even in a secular nation-state context.

Non-Jewish scholar Virginia Dominguez, who spent long periods of time in Israel in later years doing research, noted the traditional Jewish narcissism and interest in pedigrees of identity expressed by the Israelis she met:

“‘What do you mean you say you are not Jewish?’ I was asked on several occasions. ‘That you’re not religious? That your mother wasn’t Jewish? That “we the Jews” wouldn’t count you as a Jew because you had some Jewish ancestry but not the right ones, according to Halacha?’ I was incredulous at first. I had no way then to anticipate this reaction. Everything else seemed to point to the importance of Jewishness, and to controlling both the content and limits of Jewishness.” [DOMINGUEZ, V., p. 179]

The omnipresent stresses of a predominantly military state, the emphatic “we versus them” paradigm of traditional Jewish identity, the glorification of power and aggression, millennia-old disdain for non-Jews, and the emotional powder keg of Holocaust death camps as a motivational tool has invariably led to the noxious Israeli persona that is so much remarked upon by non-Israelis (often even Israelis themselves) who spend much time in Israel. This “national character” is commonly cited for its arrogance, insolence (chutzpah), coldness, roughness, and rudeness, to begin a long list of unpleasant “uncivil” attributes.

Many American Jews, in noting this Israeli character, tend to romanticize it. “There is a coldness,” notes Jewish scholar Norman Cantor, “a mystery, a distance from humanity about [Israelis] that anyone from another country who lives and works in Israel for a half a year will be impressed by.” [CANTOR, p. 417] “Israelis have a reputation for bad manners,” notes Jewish American immigrant to Israel Charles Liebman, “to the extent this reputation is deserved it stems from the sense of familiarity that Israelis feel towards one another.” [LIEBMAN, p. 21] In noting their “curt nature,” Adam Garfinkle adds that “Israelis are sometimes rude to an extent that it even bothers other Israelis. In 1995, Bezek, the communication company, instituted a program to get people to be more pleasant on the phone.” [GARFINKLE, p. 113] “The behavior of young Israelis,” notes Israeli Jay Gonen, “…is characterized by a high degree of chutzpah or gall; it is direct, blatant, unruly, clever, humorous, and indicates a certain lack of sensitivity to social requirements … [It has a] disregard for rules, regulations, social norms, and good manners.” [GONEN, p. 111] Melford Spiro, in his study of the kibbutzim, discusses “insolence” as an “outstanding characteristic of the sabras” (native-born Israelis). [SPIRO, p. 427]
Herbert Russcol – a Jewish American emigrant to Israel – and his sabra wife Margarit Banai noted the Israeli national character this way:

“’Horror stories’ about the chutzpah – of the sabra-men, women, and children alike – are notorious. What appears to be (and often is) their cheek, their insolence, has shocked and enraged everyone who has met them. Sabras freely admit their chutzpah as a people, but are rarely aware of being chutzpadik themselves. They will tell you, ‘Oh, we’re terrible. It’s a national vice. I am not so bad, but I have some very rude friends’ … Chutzpah is alarmingly close to chauvinism, and it must be admitted that the sabra is usually passionately chauvinistic in an era when no gospel has been more discredited in the West than blind, excessive patriotism … Our young [in the West] wish to be as universal as blades of grass. But the young Israelis cannot afford this, and will tell you defensively, ‘After all, you can’t build a nation without nationalism.” [RUSS-COL/BANAI, 1970, p. 170, 172]

“The deliberate and unadorned frankness [of Israelis],” notes Zionist historian Melvin Urofsky,

“so highly prized by Israelis, scornful of Westernized and ‘assimilated’ manners, struck [Jewish] Americans [who sought to live in Israel], accustomed to some courtesies in life, as downright rude. (As late as 1965, a study of bureaucratic behavior in one large Israeli enterprise disclosed that 60 per cent of officials in contact with the public did not believe in greeting a visitor, nor would they reply to his greeting; an even higher percentage would not offer him a chair, simply letting him stand during the interview).” [UROFSKY, M., 1978, p. 274]

Such attributes, it may be recalled, are among those that Jews have been noted for across the centuries of their diaspora. Leon Poliakov rhetorically noted the inevitable echo here in the European Jewish past: “Are the Jews congenitally unsociable and rude, or are they this way as a result of having been segregated in ghettos? Such was the form of the question in which arguments raged [among non-Jewish intellectuals] in the 18th century on the eve of Emancipation.” [CUDDIHY, Antisem, p. ix]

As Joyce Starr notes:

“Among Americans who have had extensive dealings with Israelis, whether in government, business, or Jewish circles, the first adjectives that comes to their lips are arrogant, willful, and sometimes infuriating.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 31]

Ms. Starr, who is also Jewish, notes the interchange she had with a man called J.R., “a high-ranking Israeli intelligence officer”:

“’Most Americans I interviewed in the government sphere – the State Department, Defense Department – use certain words when they describe Israelis.’

’Arrogant,’ J. R. replied.

’Yes, arrogant is a word that comes up frequently.’

1772
’By the way, I think it’s true. It applies to most Israelis. American fairness and Israeli fairness are different.’
’What is Israeli fairness.’
’Israeli fairness is ‘You give me 75 percent and leave 25 percent.’
’Do they know they do it?’
’Most of them do not. I think most of them believe that by some divine decree, they deserve to get everything.’
’What is divine decree?’
’It comes from God.’ He saw me laughing. ‘It’s not funny, Joyce.”

[STARR, J., 1990, p. 34]

“To the brief tourist,” wrote Leonard Wolf, a Jewish resident of Israel in 1970,

“[Israelis] are a rude, unsympathetic people, intent on themselves, irresponsible to nuances of feeling. Americans, who are instantly, if not profoundly, genial, are apt to find the slow pace of Israeli friendliness cold, comparing the Jewish hotelkeepers and tourist guides they meet unfavorably with the extraordinarily warm Arabs.” [WOLF, L., 1970, p. 7]

In 2001, a Jewish ethnic newspaper, the Forward, noted that the national Israeli propensity to be cheats and hustlers (always evasive of the law) probably had roots in Jewish history in other lands:

“[There is] universal awareness that something is definitely rotten in the state of Israel. This is, after all, a country in which bending the rules is said to be a national pastime, cutting corners a way of life and cheating the authorities the proof of merit … Sticklers for the law are ridiculed and abused, where anyone who works by the book is branded a sap, a ‘freier,’ the worst insult in modern Israeli lexicon … Many people believe Israeli laxity, which borders on anarchy, is a national personality trait that cannot be eradicated by laws alone. Some trace the trait all the way back to the historical Jewish Diaspora, where Jews often found solace in bending the rules imposed by the often anti-Semitic authorities.”

[SHALEV, C., 6-1-01]

In 1986, B. Z. Sobel, an Israeli sociologist at the University of Haifa, discussed his research into reasons why so many Israelis emigrate from Israel to other lands. Among the motivations for leaving, he noted that “there is indeed an edginess [in Israeli society]; tempers flare, and verbal violence is rampant … A large proportion of those [Israelis] interviewed for my study … have been abroad [overseas] or were born or raised abroad, and in almost all cases reference is made to the fact that ‘people are nice in chutz la’aretz.’ Strangers wish you a good day as they make change or pass you in the street, whereas at home [Israel] you can consider yourself fortunate to receive minimally civil treatment.”

[SOBEL, p. 153]

Among Sobel’s interviews with fellow Jews in Israel was one with an immigrant who had resided there for twelve years. At some point in his interview with her, she “broke down and wept … repeating over and over the word ‘garbage’: ‘People here are garbage, garbage. They’re hateful. I hate this place.’” [SO-
Another interviewee, this one born Israeli, when asked by Sobel why she was emigrating to the United States, “laughed almost hysterically, and shouted, ‘Why? Why? Because over there [in the United States] I am a child of God, a child of God. I am treated like a human being wherever I go. I am not shouted at our abused. Washer women in the supermarket don’t command me to watch my step. Why?’” [SOBEL, p. 153]

“Americans are much more polite, I would say,” remarked Israeli journalist Ze’ev Schiff, “while we are rude and have no patience … You can see it when some of us are waiting in a queue in a bank or waiting for a bus … This is the way we deal with each other, with the Egyptians, the Europeans, whoever.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 35] As Joyce Starr adds, “The tension [in Israel] spills out in sudden eruptions of rudeness. You can be standing in line in a gas station, and suddenly there will be an outbreak of shouts and terrible cursing for no apparent reason except that people explode in Israel.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 41]

Moshe Shokeid notes the comments of an Israeli identified as “Eli,” and his perceptions of the Israelis he met in New York City:

“When I looked at the crowd, I subconsciously saw myself in the mirror. When you see other Israelis screaming in Hebrew, you realize that you possibly look the same. Unfortunately, I rediscovered the ugly Israeli.” [SHOKEID, 1998, p. 510]

In the 1980s, Virginia Dominguez, a non-Jewish American sociologist of Cuban heritage, fluent in Hebrew and a Fulbright scholar in Israel, worried that obnoxious Israeli behavior and Jewish self-obsession threatened to push her into the camp of the anti-Semites:

“Has my obsessive, long-term encounter with Israeli society over the past six years turned me into the anti-Semite I never was? I find myself sharply intolerant of the noisy, brash behavior of most Israeli children. I coin terms of description that are even explicitly judgmental. I get exasperated with the perennial references in the [Hebrew] media to the Jewishness of well-known public figures abroad.” [DOMINGUEZ, p. 15]

Wendy Orange, a Jewish American, a new immigrant to Israel, noted with irritation the commentary of a group of Christian visitors she overheard in Jerusalem restaurant:

“I overheard one Ghanaian woman say, ‘Just ghastly, these people!’ She’s talking to a pregnant Irish woman, who responded wholeheartedly: ‘I never imagined they’d be so crude … so rude.’ The Ghanaian, tall and dignified, her hair wrapped high in a colorful African sash, became more emphatic: ‘No manners … They drive like madmen.’ She paused. ‘They are far more barbarian than I was warned. And I was warned, my dear, many times.” [ORANGE, W., 2000, p. 52]

An American Jewish scholar, Adam Garfinkle, noted his own child’s experience in Israel’s playgrounds:

“One day I saw two boys square off in the playground, and one gave the other a good pop to the chin. The victim ran to the teacher and complained that Yossi had hit him. The teacher said, quite typically, “Well, go hit him back.” By the time the child gets to first grade, he knows not to embarrass himself by going to the teacher for such matters. When [my son] Nate entered the first grade in the states the next year, we were not surprised to learn that he was ‘a bit rough’ with his friends.” [GARFINKEL, p. 110]

In such an Israeli socialization of children, Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, a professor in Israel, sees the classical Zionist dynamic:

“A significant part of the Israeli self-image is an ideal of toughness, which is contrasted to the softness of Diaspora Jews. The creation of a separate new Israeli identity was accomplished by many expressions of contempt for any form of weakness or moral sensitivity.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 238]

This harsh worldview, deeply aggrieved, shamed and angered by the Holocaust, and “centuries of persecution,” celebrates ruthless pragmatism as its interrelational essence. Exploiting the Jewish suffering in the Holocaust as a moral shield from criticism, David Ben-Gurion once proclaimed, “It is not important what Gentiles say, what matters is what Jews do.” [CHOMSKY, p. 236] Or as another Israeli prime minister (born in America), Golda Meir, put it: “The nations of Europe who did not help us during the Holocaust are not entitled to preach to us.” [in RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 81]

In 1973, Georges Tamarin, an Israeli psychologist, was alarmed at what he called the Israeli “cult of toughness,” the “Israeli authoritarian personality,” and its attendant “traits of ethnocentrism, glorification of strength and the prevailing admiration of the army.” [TAMARIN p. 80] “Aggressiveness, loudness, ignorance of basic international expressions, and fascination with arms are held to be grounds for pride.” [TAMARIN, p. 116] Tamarin saw in such national values an emphatic counter-construct and overcompensation against the embarrassing image of the physically weak European “ghetto Jew.” He noted the

“the constant preoccupation of Israeli youth with physical strength and courage and some caricaturist demonstrations of toughness and ‘(he) manhood (lack of inhibitions, loud speech, the ideal of the [military] parachutist, about whom all the women are ‘crazy,’ overemphasis on masculine symbols (in a style which is a curious mixture of Biblical and Hollywood-type narratives; see the ‘Exodus’) are dominant traits of the Israeli authoritarian personality.” [TAMARIN, p. 87]

“Our negligence,” complained Israeli Meron Benvenisti in 1989, “of … values such as the brotherhood of man, social justice, and civil equality to all ha[s] led inexorably to chauvinism and xenophobia … It is tempting to take the easy way out and dismiss the right-wing chauvinists and religious fundamentalists [in Israel] as an aberration, as marginal, half-crazed fanatics. Yet very influential sections of Israeli public opinion accept their philosophy, albeit considering them ‘good boys who slipped’.” [BENVENISTI, p. 45]

In 1989 an American-born Jew, Aaron Wolf, wrote a book about his experiences in the Israeli army. On one occasion after the killing of some Arab combatants, says the author, “I cornered Alon, the Chicagovan whose specialty is falling in love and who was one of the men on that patrol. ‘Hey, Alon,’ I said, ‘Tell me something. You’ve been trained as a medic. You’ve had a three-month course learning how to save lives. How do you feel now that you’ve killed somebody?’ ‘How do I feel?’ he said. ‘I feel hungry.’” [WOLF, A., p. 171]

In 1989, Israeli commentators noted with concern a rash of brash “Russian Roulette”-styled behaviors in the country’s youth. Groups of children were playing games of life and death daring with passing cars and trains, leaping out, or lying down, in front of them. Reuters called it a “deadly plague” happening to the Jewish state. “Adults gamble,” a Jerusalem high school teacher told the wire service, “but the children have less money so they gamble with their lives. I believe Israeli behavior on the roads is macho, and I this is the way children without licenses behave in the streets.” Reuters also noted that “when Education Minister Yitzak Navon asked during a school visit why pupils played the deadly game, students replied: ‘To show they’re brave,’ ‘To tempt death,’ and ‘Just to show off.’” [GOLLER]

Perhaps these children sought to emulate their parents; driving cars dangerously is an Israeli tradition. Too many people in Israel drive their automobiles like maniacs, daring death on the highways. “Twice as many Israelis,” notes Lesley Hazeleton, “were killed on the roads during the Lebanon war as in the war itself. If a man was driving particularly recklessly, people would say that he’d just come back from reserve service in Lebanon. They were only half joking.” [HAZELETON, L., 1987, p. 214] From the founding of the Jewish state in 1948 to 1990, over 30,000 Israelis died in car accidents, more than twice the number of all the Jews killed in Israeli wars in the same period. In the years 1985 and 1986, a total of ten Israelis were killed by terrorists. Meanwhile, 893 people died in car crashes on Israeli highways. Although Israel is a country of only about six million people, between 1948 and 1990 nearly 630,000 people had been injured in car accidents. [STARR, J., 1990, p. 42] As Joyce Starr noted in 1990,

“If the present pace of accidents continues, two people in every Israeli family will be injured, and one person in every ten families will be killed. The number of children killed in auto accidents since 1967 is equivalent to almost a hundred grade school classes.” [STARR, J., 1990, p. 42]

By 1999, the New York Times wire services noted the concern in Israel that its collective aggressive psyche was beginning to run amuck: “Israel has always had a rough edge, it has always been a society where aggression and rudeness was accepted as by-products of life under siege … [But] after several exceptionally brutal crimes – two men killed their wives and children and set their bodies on fire – and new studies detailing the level of brutality in the schools, there has emerged an intense focus on violence among Israelis that has temporarily pushed aside the historic focus on conflict with the Arabs.” “We have to deal with it exactly as we have with terrorism,” said Ze’ev Friedman, “director of health, welfare, and social services for the city of Tel Aviv, “… because this is nothing less than an integral form of terrorism.” [BRONNER, p. 6] The same year a Tel Aviv Municipality study found that 12.5 percent of the homes in the
Tel Aviv-Jaffa area (the largest population density in Israel) were tainted by domestic violence. [FISHBEIN, 12-22-99]

In 2000, Israel’s National Council for the Welfare of the Child noted in its annual report the alarming rise in violence emanating from Israel’s youth. “Complaints of violence by children in educational institutions” rose by 227% from 1995 to 1999. There were 29,000 criminal investigations of minors in 1999 alone. Also between 1994 and 1999, the number of children under 12 seeking help from call-in hotlines because of sexual abuse rose from 143 to 603. “I have no other words to describe it than to say our society is undergoing a process of bestialization,” declared Dr. Asher Ben-Arye, the deputy-general of the National Council, and the editor of the disturbing report. By 2001, the Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz reported that “Israel, one of the world’s smallest countries, ranks eighth in the world in youth violence.” [HAARETZ, 4-18-01] That same year, Miss Israel, Ilanit Levy, wore a diamond-studded bullet-proof vest as a fashion statement at the Miss Universe competition. [WASHINGTON POST, 4-18-01]

In 2001, Great Britain’s online Telegraph newspaper noted:

‘Israelis – who take pride in being blunt and outspoken – are to teach children good manners in an attempt to cut the nation’s tendency towards violence. From the next school year, 12-year-olds will be taught how to behave politely, which knife and fork to use at table, and how to resolve arguments without shouting or coming to blows. Ronit Tirosh, director-general of the Education Ministry said:

‘We are a brutal and impatient society, and the delicacy learned through these lessons may reduce our society’s violent tendencies.’ Israelis are proud not to say thank you and relish the informality of life … Israeli life is a bruising contest of one-upmanship. The deepest fear is to be thought a ‘sucker’ who obeys the rules. Brusqueness has been cultivated by native-born Israelis as a reaction against the manners of Europe’s Diaspora Jews, who were seen as cringing and subservient … Educationalists have become worried about the level of playground violence.” [PHILIPS, A., 6-15-01]

In 1999 the mood in Israel was such that an Israeli court was expected to give a convicted Israeli murderer of a British tourist a reduced sentence because of flashbacks he had of his military work executing Arabs. Major Daniel Okev claimed he murdered Gentile hitch-hiker Max Hunter and wounded his girlfriend

“during a flashback to his days in a secret Israeli hit squad which targeted suspected Palestinian terrorists for summary execution … When he found himself at night in his car with two strangers, Okev said he believed he had a flashback to similar occasions on operations in Gaza. He looked down and saw his gun, sparking the murder.” [REES, M., p. 12]

Traditional Jewish “chutzpah” is of course an integral part of the Israeli identity. “To a large degree,” says Israeli professor Jay Gonen, “… Herzl’s impact [on Jewish nationalism] was due to a quality of chutzpah, or unmitigated gall, which became an integral part of Zionism and was subsequently elevated almost to an art form by native-born Israelis, or sabras.” [GONEN, p. 47] An example of how far this chutzpah can go was evidenced in an incident during the Palestinian uprising – known as the Intifada – that began in 1987 against Israeli occupation in Gaza and the West Bank. Of the hundreds of Palestinians shot and killed or wounded by Israeli troops in the Intifada’s first year, one young Arab teenager, Nasir Hawwash, was shot in the head and lay in a hospital, irrecoverably brain dead. One day Nasir’s brother received a telephone call from a Jewish Israeli citizen, an emissary for the family of a fellow middle-aged Israeli in the hospital with a serious heart condition. The stranger on the phone asked that the Hawwash family donate Nasir’s heart to save the Jewish man in the hospital who needed it.

“Nasir’s older brother,” notes Glenn Frankel, “was appalled that an Israeli would ask such a thing. She told him, ‘This is how we’ll make peace between Arabs and Jews.’ He was not buying it. ‘How can you make peace when you shoot someone and then you take the heart to give life to another Israeli?’ he told her.”

As the story for the heart request made the Israeli news, one Palestinian “radical” noted that “If we give the Israelis this heart, soon they’ll be shooting us for our organs.” [FRANKEL, p. 110-111] The Arab boy’s father was eventually offered “more money than [his] family would have seen in a lifetime” for his son’s heart, but he told the Israeli pleaders no. “What did they want from me?” he asked. “This was my son. They took him away, then they wanted his body. This I could not give.” [FRANKEL, p. 111]

In 1967, a landmark year in Jewish and Israeli history, the Jewish state began a self-described “pre-emptive” attack against Egypt, overcoming their Arab adversaries in six days. “The ideological and practical ramifications of the Six-Day War,” says Amnon Rubenstein, “were so all-encompassing in Israeli thinking and politics that there is justification for regarding it as a turning point in Zionist and Israeli history.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 76] This included the victorious Israeli army expanding Jewish-controlled territory into what has become known as the Occupied Territories: Gaza, the West Bank, and the Golan Heights. A pro-Israel euphemism is the “administered territories.”

Gaza is a thin strip of land on the Mediterranean Sea 4-8 miles wide and 30 miles long that is today the reservation for over 800,000 stateless Arabs. The West Bank is an area west of the Jordan River; the Golan Heights borders Syria in the north. Since 1967 Israelis have in these places “controlled every facet of Palestinian life.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 63]

In 1973, Syria and Egypt launched surprise attacks upon Israel on one of its holy days, Yom Kippur. Israel barely managed to avoid defeat; the United States’ supply of arms to Israel was “crucial.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 77]

In 1987 a popular Arab uprising against Israeli rule began, sparked by a car accident (driven by a Jew) that killed four Arab pedestrians in Gaza. Rioting quickly spread to other parts of the Occupied Territories – East Jerusalem and the West Bank; the grass-roots revolt dragged on for years. Largely expressed by the hurling of stones at Israelis, public defiance, and burning tires in the streets, the Palestinians called it the “Intifada.” Strikes were initiated against Israeli rule, some groups refused to continue to pay taxes. As rioting escalated, then-Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin called for “might, force, and beatings.” [PE-LEG, I., p. 170] The Jewish state also responded by establishing curfews, cutting off electricity and phone lines, and accelerating arrests. “In an effort to reduce the large numbers of shooting deaths,” says Amnon Rubenstein, “the IDF implemented a policy of beating demonstrators with the intention of breaking bones. This new approach was loudly condemned by the international community, and soon soldiers reverted to the more frequent use of live ammunition, supplemented by deadly plastic and rubber bullets.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 97]

In 1988 plastic bullets were provided to Israeli troops, but by January 1989 47 Arabs were yet killed with such ammunition. [GOLDSTEIN, E., p. 44] In the first 30 months of unrest, 837 Arabs were killed – 688 by gunfire, 61 by beatings, and 88 from tear gas inhalation; over 1,000 Palestinian homes were demolished.
90,000 Arabs sought medical treatment for wounds, broken bones, tear gas inhalation and other inflictions of Jewish occupation. Colleges and universities were shut down by Israeli authorities, various Palestinian administrative organizations were banned, tens of thousands of orchard trees were destroyed by Israeli troops, and both Gaza and the West Bank were placed under military curfew. [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 99-100]

Between 1987 and 1994, 2,156 Palestinians were killed, most by Israeli soldiers. Dozens were killed by Jewish settlers and vigilantes. Over 120,000 Arabs were imprisoned. [FRANKEL, p. 377] In the first thirty months of the Intifada 20% of the Arab dead were 16 years old or younger. [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 99]
The human rights group Middle East Watch wrote that despite the fact that Israeli law declares that “all news reports be submitted to the military censor prior to publication [GOLDSTEIN, E., p. 176] … hundreds of [news] correspondents have traveled extensively throughout the territories during the Intifada, their reporting on human rights conditions has provoked international sympathy for the plight of the Palestinians.” [GOLDSTEIN, E., p. 64] As Jewish author Marc Ellis noted in 1990:

“The resistance on the part of the Jewish community to what one might call the Nazi analogy [to Israeli violence against Arabs during the Intifada] is understandable and so strong as to virtually silence all such references. Yet during the brutal attempt to suppress the Palestinian uprising, in fact from the very beginning the Jewish struggle for statehood in Palestine in the 1940s and continuing to the present, the connection between the Jewish experience of suffering in Europe and the Palestinian experience of suffering at the hands of the Jewish people in Palestine and Israel has been, and continues to be, repeatedly made by Jewish Israelis.” [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 108]

Jewish American journalist Glenn Frankel noted the murder of Hani Elshami, “beaten to death for protecting his son from arrest,” his “limp body” beaten further after it was “dumped at a prison camp”; the much-publicized story of three soldiers who buried alive (with a bulldozer) four Palestinian stone-throwers; and the case of CBS News’ 45 minutes of footage depicting four soldiers beating two Arabs on the ground. “Such a beating,” noted Israeli soldier Saguay Harpaz, “was the norm. That’s the way it was. Every day.” [FRANKEL, p. 80, 81] Israeli soldier Omer Rasner noted what he told his parents about his activities against the Intifada: “They didn’t understand how their little child could become such a beast.” [FRANKEL, p. 85] Most of what Israeli troops faced during Arab unrest was stone-throwing. Yet, “for the first eighteen months of the Intifada,” wrote Frankel, “… [Israeli] soldiers killed a Palestinian a day. By contrast, the highly trained riot police of South Korea, faced with a steady barrage of firebombs and brutal attacks, killed a total of one person during a constant year of unrest.” [FRANKEL, G., p. 83]

In 1990 the Swedish branch of the Save the Children Fund estimated that between 50,000 and 60,000 Palestinian children had been treated for injuries; 6,500 of them were hurt by gunfire. The report, notes Victor Ostrovsky, “said most of the children killed had not been participating in stone-throwing when they were shot, and one-fifth of the cases examined showed that the victims were shot either at home or within thirty feet of their homes.” [OSTROVSKY, p. 333] “The Intifada and resultant breakdown of moral order and humanity [in Israeli society],” suggested Ostrovsky, “are a direct result of the kind of megalomania that characterizes the operation of the Mossad [Israel’s CIA] … It is a disease that began with Mossad and has spread through the government and down through much of Israeli society.” [OSTROVSKY, p. 336]

During the Intifada, noted Eric Goldstein, principal author of a 1990 report by Middle East Watch, “scores of Palestinians have been killed while fleeing [Israeli troops] … The conduct of the IDF, taken cumulatively, more closely resembles what would be appropriate to a situation of combat, with the result that many Palestinians are killed outside of life-threatening situations for [Israelis].” [GOLDSTEIN, E., p. 23] As the Intifada intensified, the Israeli army was issued guidelines that permitted soldiers “to use live ammunition to apprehend masked persons whether or not they were armed.” [GOLDSTEIN, E., p. 38] Among the tens of thousands arrested was Taher Shriteh, an Arab journalist in Gaza, who was working for CBS News. Accused of illegal use of a FAX machine, illegal publication of information about Palestinians killed by Israeli troops, and the like, Shriteh spent 38 days in prison – two and a half years later, his trial was still pending. [FRANKEL, p. 259-261]

Israeli Ilan Peleg notes that of the various human rights reports that were published about the Intifada in the occupied territories, they “paint a picture in which widespread abuse of human rights and violations of the norms of international law occur with relative frequency in the Arab territories under Israeli control [PELEG, I., p. 169] … Even the annual human rights report of the [U.S.] Department of State, usually a relatively mild document, is rather harsh in dealing with human rights violations in the territories. The report criticizes human rights practices, stating that Israeli troops ‘caused many avoidable deaths and injuries’ by using gunfire in situations that did not present mortal danger to the troops. The report also documents cases in which Palestinian detainees ‘died under questionable circumstances’ while in detention or ‘were clearly killed by the detaining officials.”” [PELEG, I., p. 170]

“I want to tell you the truth,” eventual Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin once admitted, “For 27 years the Palestinians … have risen in the morning and cultivated a burning hatred for us as Israelis and Jews. Every morning they awake to a difficult life and it is partly our fault … It cannot be denied: the continued rule of a foreign people who does not want us has a price. This is first of all a painful price, the price of constant confrontation between us and them.” [FRANKEL, G., p. 377]

During the Intifada uprising in 1987 and 1989, the American Jewish Committee sponsored surveys of American Jewry. Nearly two-thirds of the respondents, notes Penkower, agreed that “aside from a few regrettable incidents, Israel has used a reasonable and appropriate level of violence in the West Bank and Gaza (only 12% disagreed).” [PENKOWER, p. 331]

Matti Golan, an Israeli, notes with concern the Jewish-American moral bankruptcy in their complacent support of Israel’s mistreatment of Arabs:

“What the occupation is doing to us as human beings … [is] something that threatens to wreak irreparable damage to the fabric of our lives] while turning us into a brutal and insensitive society. Such a society is not one in which I would want to belong to. And yet [American Jews] don’t seem to particularly bothered by that … [For example, the] Israeli media revealed that the director of the GSS [General Security Service] had ordered two Palestinian terrorists killed without trial and had lied to an official committee of inquiry … In several of my talks in the United States, I expressed the opinion that, even if the episode damaged Israel’s image abroad, it was crucial to bring it to light, because in a democratic society not even the security apparatus should be allowed to be above the law. Not a single American Jewish audience enjoyed hearing that. The almost universal reaction to what I said was: Yes, but why wash our dirty linen in public? … When it comes to [Israel, American Jews] practically demand that I should say to hell with democratic principles. It’s not so terrible if Israeli officials and government agencies take the law into their own hands. It’s not good, but there are worse things. And one of these is a tarnished image. Indeed, I sometimes think that as long as Israel’s image in America remains decent and humane, you wouldn’t care if in actual fact we were a society of cannibals.” [GOLAN, M., p. 44]

As published in a report called “Captive Corpses” by the Israeli human rights organizations B’Tselem and HaMoked, even the Arab dead may be abused by Israelis – particularly the corpses of so-called “suicide bombers” who seek, in their last actions, to kill Jews. These Arab dead, notes Israeli professor Neve Gordon, “are not only buried in a demeaning and shameful manner, but … Israel refuses to return bodies to the bereaved families … Israel’s treatment of enemy corpses exposes an atavistic policy informed by vindictiveness instead of justice. Privileging nationalistic sentiments over democratic practice has led Israel to punish people – the perpetrator’s bereaved family – who are neither guilty nor even suspect. Not unlike other measures Israel takes, such as demolition of homes, holding corpses hostage constitutes collective punishment of innocent persons.” [GORDON, N., 1999]

In September of 2000 the second Palestinian uprising against Jewish oppression began. Russian/Israeli Israel Shamir noted its tenor:

“Another email comes into my laptop, this time from Gaza. An American girl, Alison Wier from San Francisco evades Israeli bullets, comforts the scared Palestinian kids, and writes: ‘The problem is when you know the truth, it is far too cruel, far too diametrically opposite what we used to think and what everyone thinks to express. The lie is too big, the repression too complete, the Palestinians’ lives too horrible to write about reasonably.’ Well, Alison is right. We face a huge lie, an anti-Moslem blood libel.” [SHAMIR, I., 2001]

Despite all this, the modern state of Israel frames itself as a democracy and Jewish American supporters are quick to proudly underscore its noble mantle as the “only democracy in the Middle East.” As Gabriel Sheffer notes,

“Early on in the history of the Jewish state, its leaders realized that maintaining a democratic polity is not only of great value in itself, but is also a potentially important asset in promoting Israel’s relations with Western states and especially with the United States … Consequently, Israel’s leaders promoted the notion that democracy was the cornerstone of its ‘special relationship’ with the U.S. and with other western democracies … This view has been repeated in countless speeches made by Israelis, Americans, and European politicians and officials and has become a significant element in justifying the level of political, military, economic, and financial support given to Israel.” [SHEFFER, p. 32]

The term “democracy,” when it comes to Israel, however, is a very relative term. The Israeli claim of democracy is drastically different than any other in western societies and must be stretched thinly to veil a range of extremely undemocratic, Judeo-centric principles to diffuse the hard reality: Israel is an expressly Jewish state created especially for Jewish citizens, with all the racism, injustice, oppression of non-Jews, and ethnocentrism this might be expected to entail. The crucial “truth” test of any so-called “democracy” are the formal policies towards, legal status of, and resulting condition of all a country’s citizens – a test Israel emphatically fails. Arabs and other non-Jews are systematically and institutionally marginalized, often humiliated, and exploited in all walks of life.

Israeli sociologist Sammy Smooha notes that “Israel’s ethnic nature is well evident today. The state claims to be the homeland of the Jews only. The dominant language is Hebrew, while Arabic is degraded to an inferior status. The institutions, official holidays, symbols, and heroes are exclusively Jewish. The major law of immigration [to Israel] admits Jews freely but excludes Palestinian Arabs. Israel confers a special standing on the [private international funding agencies] Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund which, by their own constitutions, cater to Jews only. Laws and settlement policies are geared to further the interests of Jews only ... [SMOOH, S., p. 326] It is part of the national consensus to keep Arabs a nonassimilating minority, just as it is to keep Jews a nonassimilating majority ... Independent Arab organizations are denied official recognition, and government and quasi-government offices refuse to deal with them directly.” [SMOOH, p. 331]

“The Law of Return,” notes Israeli author Avirama Golan, “gives every Jew [in the world] the automatic right to citizenship, and Israeli citizenship, therefore, is bound to halakhic definitions and the Orthodox monopoly and creates blatant, undemocratic discrimination.” [GOLAN, A., 2001] [Note, in another chapter, a range of questionable Israeli ethical/unethical activities]

“There remain unresolved issues of democracy in Zionist thought and certainly in the Zionist state,” says Zvi Gitelman, “Among them is the question of whether Israel can both be an ‘ethnic state’ – that is, a Jewish state – and a ‘civic state’ – one for all of its citizens, including the nearly 20 percent who are not Jews.” [GITELMAN, Z., 1997]

In 1980, Jewish author Ian Lustick wrote an entire academic volume about the ways that Israel’s Arab citizens are “controlled” in the Jewish democracy. “What explains the existence within Israel,” he asks, “of a substantial community [Arabs] with virtually no independently operated industrial, commercial or financial institutions, no independent political parties, and almost no command over the attention or interest of the mainstream [Jews] of Israeli society?” [LUSTICK, I., 1980, p. 24] His answer entails the three “components” that he identifies which “form a system’ which does result in control” – segmentation, dependency, and co-optation. Segmentation, Lustick says, “refers to the isolation of the Arab minority from the Jewish population and the Arab minority’s internal fragmentation.” Dependency “refers to the enforced reliance of Arabs on the Jewish majority for important economic and political resources.” Co-optation “refers to the use of side payments to Arab elites or potential elites for purposes of surveillance and resource extraction.” [LUSTICK, I., 1980, p. 77] Lustick also notes the institutionalized undercurrent of the Jewish police state:

“The regime’s fundamental distrust of the Arab minority has been reflected in the fact that five of the six men who have served as Adviser to the Prime Minister on Arab Affairs – Yehoshua Palmon, Uri Lubrani, Shmuel Divon, Rehavam Amid, and Shmuel Toledano – were recruited for that post from the secret services.” [LUSTICK, I., 1980, p. 66]

“Imposed legal measures,” noted Micheal Roman and Alex Weingrod years later, “institutional frameworks, and allocations of economic resources are all designed to consolidate the Jewish demographic, spatial, and economic dominance [over Arabs], and are often based upon ethnic differentiation [ROMAN/WEINGROD, p. 226] … Putting it succinctly, under the present structure of political and economic power the trend has inevitably been toward a system of ‘separate but unequal.’” [p. 228]

Israeli Bernard Avishai poses a troubling question to American Jews who everywhere herald and propagandize about the “democracy” of modern Israeli: “[Jewish] Israelis enjoy many civil liberties, but the state also enforces important laws and economic regulations which contradict democratic ethics. What American Jews, for example, would want to live in an America without civil marriage, or which only certified Christians were permitted to buy certain properties? … Some of the reasons for Israel’s failure as a democracy are internal to the logic of the Zionist revolution.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 9]

“From the very beginning of the Zionist endeavor,” says Israeli Jay Gonen, “most Zionists displayed a blind spot in their view of Arabs … The absence of Arabs from the Jewish visual field was sometimes total.” [GONEN, p. 182]

“Public opinion surveys in Israel,” add Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen, “regularly exclude non-Jews, even though they make up roughly a sixth of the population.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 24] “There are over 14,000 Arab graduates of Israeli universities,” says Keith Kyle, “but of some 5,000 academic posts only 20 are held by Arabs.” [KYLE, K., p. 253]

One of these few Arab academics is Majid Al-Haj, a senior lecturer in the Sociology and Anthropology Department at Haifa University. He notes that “It has been repeatedly emphasized that formal policy towards the Arabs in Israel is directed by three main considerations: the democratic principle, the Jewish-Zionist principle, and security considerations. While the first drives toward equality and integration of Arabs, the other two pull in the opposite direction. When these features are juxtaposed, it is clear that Jewish-Zionist and security considerations have gained the upper hand.” [Al-Haj, M., 148]

“To [Israeli political scientist Ze’ev Sternhall],” note Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen, “Israeli political culture rejects the basis of democratic thought – that ‘society and state exist in order to serve the individual … and are never ends in themselves.’ Sternhall traces Israel’s collectivist culture to the Jewish tradition, among other elements. He maintains that even the non-religious Zionists never really freed themselves from the traditions of their father’s home, and in one form or another they deferred to ‘Yisrael Saba.’ In this view of Sternhall and others like him, Israel needs urgently to overcome its inherent anti-democratic and anti-liberal Jewish identity.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 119]

“In recent years,” notes political scientist Arend Aijphart, “Israeli democracy has been subjected to frequent and increasing criticism, both by Israelis themselves and foreign berserkers … Many people believe that there is something seriously and fundamentally wrong with Israeli democracy.” [LIJPHART, p. 107] “What matters in the Israeli-Jewish perception,” says Liebman and Cohen, “is that liberalism – support for individual rights for minorities – offers the Jews no protection.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 118] “Israel is unique in the Western world,” says Sammy Smooha, “for remaining an ethnic state (i.e., a state identified to serve one of its constituent population groups). Such a structure is bound to clash with political democracy, which is based on the principle of equal rights and equal treatment of all citizens.” [SMOOHA, p. 325]

Smooha cites four central foundations of the systematic slighting of non-Jewish civil rights and injustice in Israel:

1) The lack of a formal Israel Constitution or Bill of Rights as final law.

2) The legal technicality that Israel continues to function in a perpetual state of emergency (per the threat of local Arab attack).

3) The central premises of the Jewish-Zionist nation is intrinsically discriminatory to non-Jews.

4) Jewish public opinion in Israel supports restrictions upon Arabs and privileges for Jews. [SMOOHA, p. 328]

The lack of a formal Constitution serves to avoid a formal expression of what exactly Israel’s intentions and goals are, thereby diffusing the issues of final Jewish state boundaries, the role of Jewish religious Orthodoxy in government, and the legal rights of non-Jews. Existing laws can be changed at any time. According to Noam Chomsky, “[Israeli prime minister] Ben Gurion wrote that ‘a Jewish state … will serve as an important and decisive stage in the realization of Zionism,’ but only a stage: the borders of the state ‘will not be fixed for eternity’ but will expand either by agreement with Arabs ‘or by some other way,’ once ‘we have force at our disposal’ in a Jewish state. His long term vision included Jordan and beyond, sometimes even ‘the land of Israel’ from the Nile to the Euphrates.” Another Israeli prime minister, Golda Meir, once said that “The borders are determined by where Jews live, not where there is a line on the map.” [CHOMSKY, N., p. 236]

Among the important discriminations against the Arabs of Israel (approximately 18% of the total population), are those veiled by laws that prohibit Arabs (with few exceptions) from serving in the army. “Army service is a major gateway to rights and privileges in Israel,” notes Adam Garfinkel, “and as a result, Israeli Arabs are saddled with major disadvantages.” [GARFINKEL, p. 105] Because of the focus on army service as the key to social and economic benefits, “the bulk of discrimination,” says Sammy Smooha, “is … covert.” [SMOOHA, p. 328] Not so terribly invisible were the revelations of an Association for Civil Rights in Israel study in 1999. Of the 13,000 people who worked for the Israeli Electric Corporation, six (0.00046 percent) were Arabs. Only five percent of all Israeli civil service jobs were filled by Arabs; most of these jobs could only be filled by Arabs as they served, intimately and in close quarters, Israel’s segregated Arab community. Of these Arab civil service workers, half did not have tenure in their positions, and one-third were doing temporary work. [DAYAN, A, 12-19-99]
By 1993, 60% of Israeli Arab children lived in what was officially considered poverty (three times the percentage of Jews). “Their parents,” notes Keith Kyle, “not having served in the IDF [Israeli Defense Force], get child allowances two or three times smaller than those available to most Jews with children.” [KYLE, p. 253] A more blatant discriminatory device is the Israeli national identity card, required of all citizens, which states whether the bearer is Jewish or Arab.

“Jewish landlords have often refused to rent their premises to Arabs,” notes Micheal Roman and Alex Weingrod, [p. 39] “… There can be little doubt that one of the major features of Jewish-Arab relationships is the predominant force of persistent, widespread segregation … Residential segregation has remained practically complete. No mixed Jewish-Arab neighborhoods have developed during the more than two decades of coexistence.” [p. 221] In 1999, a major Israeli legal case brewed when a prosperous Arab, Fathi Muhammed, sought to live in a home in Katzir, like most of the best living areas, a purely Jewish town. “The actions of Fathi Muhammed,” notes the Boston Globe, “set off a court battle that has drawn attention to Israel’s treatment of its Arab minority, who have full citizenship yet face discrimination in almost all areas.” [MARCUS, A., 8-5-99, p. A1] The hard details of the such a land/home purchase, however, are elusive; most land in Israel is leased – not purchased – for long terms from the Zionist government, thus insuring indefinite Jewish control of Israel’s physical terrain. In the Katzir case, the land is leased from the government by the gigantic Jewish Agency, an organization that has a singular Zionist interest in aiding Jews in Israel.

Traditional anti-democratic Jewish religious tenets are also an integral part of Israel’s “democracy.” There is little pretense of a “separation of church and state,” a mainstay in western democracies and a principle emphatically demanded, and enforced, by Jews in other countries. Among the examples of traditional Jewish, anti-universalist religious dogma in Israeli’s “democracy” is that it is illegal for a Jew to marry a non-Jew in the Jewish state. And because religious Jews hold the Sabbath (Saturday) to be a day of rest, this period of work shutdown is enforced by public institutions with repercussions upon everyone (Muslims, Christians, and other non-Jews). One consequence of this Jewish religious dictate, for example, is the nation-wide closing of public transportation on Saturdays. “There are few democracies in the world,” notes Zev Chafets, “where spiritual leaders are so blatantly involved in the action. Some of Israel’s most venerable rabbis are power brokers who cut deals with the secular pools over money, legislation, and patronage with all the restraint and dignity of Tammany ward heelers.” [CHAFETS, p. 153]

In 1988, the Minister of Interior for the Israeli government, Rabbi Yitzhak Peretz (head of the Shas party) visited a Bedouin community in Israel’s southern desert and took the occasion to remark that “It is written in the Torah that it is essential for each nation to preserve its character and breed. This is the guarantee for peace among nations. Intermixture leads to hatred, conflict, and war. Since I would like to live in peace, I do not hold with excessively close association between Jewish and Arab youth. At a tender age meetings of this type give rise to love; love leads to marriage. This is neither good nor healthy.” [HUPPERT, U., 1988, p. 37]

In recent years there has been growing support in some Israeli quarters for a government that is completely founded upon Torah and Talmudic dictates. As Rabbi David Bar-Haim noted in 1988:

“We have before us a very clear proposition: All human beings are equal, Jews and Gentiles. As we shall now see, this belief stands in total contrast to the Torah of Moses, and is derived from a total ignorance of and assimilation of alien Western values. It would not even merit comment had not so many people been led astray by it.” [ELIEZER, p. 27]

Knesset member Meir Kahane also declared in the 1980s that “[Democracy] is based on the idea that we are incapable of knowing the truth. And since nobody holds the truth, nobody can say what is true. Therefore the majority has to decide. It’s a practical deduction. Judaism is founded on the idea that we know the truth … You don’t vote on a truth … Democracy and Judaism are two opposite things. One absolutely cannot confuse them … These are two totally opposite conceptions of life.” [AVRUCH, p. 134]

The above two speakers may be framed by some as “extremists.” Yet, “all Orthodox Jews,” notes Livnet Eliezer, “irrespective of their political convictions, believe in the future establishment in Israel of a halachic state [a state directed by Jewish religious law], a Jewish theocracy. Though this state is expected to respect certain democratic principles, its system of government would not be democratic and would be founded on a totally different set of suppositions.” [ELIEZER, L., p. 290] “The situation in Israel,” adds Adam Garfinkle, “… is nearly the exact opposite of the situation in the United States today. Here, toleration of diverse beliefs and practices is accepted but public association with religion is not. In Israel, public association with religion is accepted but toleration of diverse belief and practice is not.” [GARFINKLE, p. 135]

“When asked if the Arabs of Judea, Samaria, and Gaza [the Occupied Territories] should be given the right to vote in the event of [Israeli] annexation,” notes Bernard Avishai, “only 31 percent of high school students said yes. Can this be unrelated to the fact that there is no legal apparatus for an Arab to marry a Jew in Israel? … Israeli schools have taught children more about the tribes of Israel than about the Enlightenment [AVISHAI, B., p. 304] … One poll by [newspaper] Ha’aretz during 1984 revealed that 32 percent of Israelis felt violence towards Arabs, even terrorism, was either ‘totally’ justified or had ‘some’ justification. Over 60 percent of young Israelis believe that Arabs should not be accorded full rights in the state.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 307]

As Simha Flapan notes:

“There is no intrinsic connection between Judaism and democracy. There always was an orthodox, fundamentalist current in Judaism, characterized by racial prejudice toward non-Jews in general and Arabs in particular. A substantial portion – perhaps even the overwhelming majority—of the religious movements [in Israel], and a growing part of the population in general, came to conceive of the West Bank not as the homeland of the Palestinian people but as Judea and Samaria, the birthplace of the Jewish faith and homeland of the Jewish people. Many people not only became indifferent to the national rights of the Palestinians living there, they did not even see the necessity for granting them civil rights.” [original author’s emphasis; FLAPAN, S., 1987, p. 240]

“Universalism,” notes Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen, “a central component in the American Jewish understanding of Judaism that extends to many Orthodox, is deliberately rejected by mainstream Orthodoxy in Israel. The triumph of Jewish particularism is evident with regards to relations between Jews and non-Jews.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 146] “Unfortunately,” says Yehoshafat Harkabi, “in recent years, the xenophobia [in Israel] has increased in intensity and extended to new areas. For some it is not merely an attitude but also the basis for deriving general principles of conduct—including proposals for laws against non-Jews and against their residence among Jews.” [HARKABI, p. 160]

The growth in Israel (and America) of perspectives like Meir Kahane are not tiny, nor are they aberrations. In 1988 a nakedly racist and brutal bill that “would in effect decriminalize acts of violence by Jews against Arabs” was introduced by nine Knesset members. [SEDAN, G., 12-2-88, p. 10] It did not pass, but what kind of “democracy” would America be considered if nine United States senators felt secure enough to sponsor such a bill here, a comparable one, say, that “decriminalizes white violence against Blacks?” What would it mean to this country if such a group of American congressmen could support such opinion openly, confidently, and freely as members of elected government?

Michael Jansen notes that

“According to Israeli sociologist Yoram Peri, ‘every Jewish generation born in Greater Israel becomes more and more like South Africa [under apartheid]’ and 1984 opinion polls in Israel ‘should alarm anyone who still has any humane feelings left.’ 15% said Palestinians should be deported, 43% said they should remain with no civil and political rights. Only one out of ten [older Israelis] favored deportation … while three out of four in the 18-22 age group supported this resolution.” [JANSEN, p. 13]

According to a 2001 survey of Israelis by the University of Haifa’s center for national security research,

“A majority [71%] of Jews in Israel believe that Arab citizens’ complaints of discrimination are unjustified, that Arabs excessively influence politics in the country [62%] and that Israeli Arabs are to blame for tensions between Jews and Arabs in the state [59%] … More than two-thirds (68%) of the Jewish respondents said they do not want Arabs to live in their neighborhoods.” [NIR, O., 12-12-01]

In 1985, Dr. Arik Carmon, chairman of Israel’s Committee on Education for Democracy, resigned, complaining that “the demands voiced by ministers and Knesset members to release the Jewish terror defendants [a group of Jews accused of terrorist acts against Arabs], the violence by Jewish lawbreakers, which has accompanied this demand, and the silence of political, spiritual, and social leaders in the light of this violence have created the conditions for an anti-democratic climate which is beginning to prevail in Israel.” [JEWISH WEEK, 7-12-85, p. 5] That same year the Jewish Week noted that the Israeli Defense Ministry “employs 58 civilian censors to scrutinize mail of persons under security clearances. The public was largely unaware of this until recent[ly].” [JEWISH WEEK, 7-26-85]

In a 1988 survey in Israel, notes sociologist Smooha, “43% of Israeli Jews favored the denial of Arabs the right to vote,… 74% were unwilling to have an Arab as a superior in a job. Informal, daily discriminations against Israeli Arabs abound.” [SMOOGHA, p. 329] “There is a feeling that the state of Israel is the state of the Jewish people,” says Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen, “in the narrowest meaning of the term, of which non-Jews are not really a part… Israeli non-Jews are not Israelis by natural right; they are something else, a something generally left unspecified and unclear.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 79] Reflecting the most ominous political undercurrents in the Jewish state, in 1990 surveys by the Israeli Democracy Institute found that “over 55% of the Israelis are willing to replace democracy with the rule of a ‘strong man.’” [SPRINZAK/DIAMOND, p. x]

In 1965, says Israeli Jay Gonen, Kalman Benyami, a psychology professor at Hebrew University, was so “shocked” by the results of his research “that he decided not to publish them. Benyami had discovered that the image of the Arab in the eyes of Israeli youth was very distorted and negative. After the Six Day War [in 1967] he repeated the study and found that Israeli youth viewed the Arab as even sicker, drunker, uglier. At the same time he found an overestimation of self on the part of the Israelis.” [GONEN, J., p. 187] “Following the Yom Kippur War,” says Zev Chafets, “army psychologists were astonished at how many [Israeli] soldiers involved in the first desperate days of fighting had imagined that the Syrian and Egyptian armies were Nazis, bent on carrying out mass murder.” [CHAFETS, p. 106]

In 1984, Israeli Uriel Tal wrote that “The equality of humanity and civil rights is a foreign democratic principle [in Israel]… A denial of human rights[is] because our existence in Eretz Israel is made conditional on the emigration of the Arabs from the country… The third issue of a non-Jewish person’s human rights is based on the Biblical commandment to annihilate the memory of Amalek, i.e., real genocide… The danger of this totality lies in the fact that it leads to a totalitarian concept of the political realm because within its framework there is no room for the existence of the human and civil rights of a non-Jew.” [TAL, p. 59-65]

In 1967 Zev Chafets moved from America to live in Israel. He recounts an early visit to Jerusalem: “As we lounged in the shade talking, I idly peeled an orange, tossing the skin on the ground. Suddenly, an enraged Arab shopkeeper emerged from his store and demanded that I picked up the peels. At first I was embarrassed to have littered so thoughtlessly, and I gathered up the refuse as he watched. Then, in a flash, it dawned on me: This was my country, my capital city. I tossed the peels back on the street and told the shopkeeper to pick them up himself.” [CHAFETS, p. 15-16] (Chafet’s self-described “Jewish guilt” led him to return to apologize to the shopkeeper the next day).

In the late 1980s, Yoram Binur, a Jewish Israeli, embarked on a project to learn what it was like to be an Arab in Israel. Fluent in Arabic and with a physical appearance that could be mistaken as that of an Arab, he began an elaborate—and dangerous—deceit to learn about Arabs’ lives in the Jewish world of his homeland. The results of his disturbing experiences were published as a book. He started out looking for work from Jewish employers, standing early in the morning at a well-known “slave corner” and secured a 16-hour a day job for kitchen work that paid a total of $10 a day, with free food and a place to sleep (on a mattress “one-third the length of a finger.” [BINUR, p. 11] Despite a different self-choice for an Arabic name, he was routinely, and disparagingly, called “Ahmed” or “Mohammed.”

Binur’s adventures led him to learn about the rape of two Arab girls by Israeli soldiers (“Until then I hadn’t believed that members of the IDF [Israeli Defense Force] were capable of such things; now one more naive belief was shattered.” [BINUR, p. 29] and to visit an Israeli officer training center where “I was able to witness corruption among the higher ranks at close hand.” [BINUR, p. 32] At a second job his Jewish boss goaded him to change his name from an Arab to a Jewish one (“I was outraged. It wasn’t enough that the man was paying me starvation wages, and this his people denied me the right to even aspire to freedom and independence. He also had the effrontery to suggest that I give up the little that remained to me, that I drop my name and assume the incongruous aspect of a Jew.” [BINUR, p. 54] During this job a boss once noted that, “I see our Arab is a little idle, so let him take out the glasses and wash them over again.” [BINUR, p. 68]

Among the most disturbing, humiliating experiences Binur felt as an Arab was when one of his Jewish employers backed up next to him with a lover as Binur was washing dishes in a cramped kitchen. “I lowered my eyes,” says Binur, “and concentrated on washing the dirty dishes in the sink, so I wouldn’t embarrass them with my presence… Then a sort of trembling came suddenly over me. I realized that they had not meant to put on a peep show for my enjoyment. Those two were not the least bit concerned with what I saw or felt even when they were practically fucking under my nose. For them I simply didn’t exist. I was invisible, a nonentity. It’s difficult to describe the feeling of extreme humiliation which I experienced. Looking back, I think it was the most degrading moment I had during my entire posing adventure.” [BINUR, p. 69]

Binur was also roughed up by Jews (merely for being perceived as an Arab) and was warned that a group of Jews were planning to attack him. [BINUR, p. 115-116] Eventually he found work on a kibbutz, the legendary socialist communal work/living experiment famed in pioneer Zionist folklore. Despite the fact that kibbutzim have a reputation for openness and liberality, Binur found serious problems for him as an Arab there too. “The kibbutzim,” he wrote, “are probably the best representation of the moderate left in Israel. With its liberal ideology which stresses equal rights for all members of the human race and its high regard for the dignity of labor… I quickly learned that fear, suspicion, and prejudice against Arabs existed no less around kibbutzniks than among other Israeli Jews.” [BINUR, p. 120] Here too he was warned by a friendly Jew that others planned on beating him up one night with the intention of driving him off the kibbutz. [BINUR, p. 134] Completely innocent, he was also accused of theft. [See also David Grossman’s account, in his The Yellow Wind, of similar tales of chronic exploitation and Arab degradation at the hands of Jewish employers].

(The anti-Arab racism in Israeli society stretches to all corners of Jewish society. In 1989, a Bedouin man formally converted to Judaism under prominent Orthodox Sephardic rabbi Ovadia Joseph. The Arab had served in the Israeli army and moved with his Jewish wife to a moshav—a [Jewish] agricultural settlement. When his original identity became known, he was driven out by the Jewish community, a community was not, by political standards, a “conservative” group; 83% of the moshav had voted for the liberal Labor party in the last election. [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 25])

Among Binur’s conclusions after his experiences posing as an Arab in Israel are that:

“[The Palestinian Arab] sees and recognizes the value of freedom, but is accorded the sort of treatment that characterizes the most backward dictatorial regimes. How can he be anything but frustrated?” [BINUR, p. 196]

“This book has sought to emphasize how, on the level of day-to-day interactions, Israeli Jews have exploited and humiliated their Arab neighbors.” [BINUR, p. 198]

“The Palestinians, employed as a cheap labor force, are forced into the role of active observers with respect to Israeli society, whereas Israeli Jews don’t even do that much and are satisfied to rule without exhibiting the least curiosity about how the other side lives.” [BINUR, p. 214]

These are long-standing perceptions in the Jewish state. “As I grew up [in Haifa in the 1930s and 1940s],” says Israeli Jay Gonen, “I took Arabs for granted. They were usually called Eṣma, which is a distortion of the Arab Isma, meaning ‘Hear! Hear!’… In the late forties the term Arabush (plural Arabushim) became more popular. A more demeaning term, it connotes the scorn that the efficient and strong feel toward the weak and inept… The Jewish conviction [was] that the Arabs understand only the language of force, a bias that persisted for many years and became especially pronounced after the Holocaust.” [GONEN, J., p. 180]

Lesley Hazeleton was raised in Great Britain, moved to Israel for over a decade, and had dual British-Israeli citizenry. “The racism [in Israel],” she wrote in 1987,
“is as crude as anywhere in the world. Sometimes it is familiar: ‘I was in the bank yesterday and this filthy old Arab comes walking in with a sack full of money. Cash. So where did he get his hands on all that money? What’s he got to complain about? He’s making plenty out of us.’” [HAZELETON, LESLEY, 1987, p. 106]

“[Israelis have] tolerance for government secrecy and selected abridgement of human rights,” notes Adam Garfinkle, “Most Israelis accept it as natural that some things should not be made public… Also, most Israelis realize, and accept as necessary, that the security services use physical and sometimes very harsh interrogative methods against Arabs in the occupied territories who have been arrested for security violations… The general view is that the security of Israeli society, especially when it comes to matters of life and death, overrides the individual rights of Arab suspects.” [GARFINKLE, p. 111]

In 1996 the Carmel Center for Social Research released the results of a study conducted under sponsorship of the Israeli Education Ministry. Over 35 percent “of Israeli youths said they hate Arabs.” Two-thirds of the high school students surveyed didn’t believe that Arabs should have equal rights in the Israeli state. [SEGAL, N., 11-27-96, p. 12] In 1993, the Israeli Institute for Military Studies released the results of a similar survey of 5,400 Israeli high school students. To the question, “Do you hate Arabs?,” 40 percent of the respondents answered yes to either the choices “all” or “most” of them. [DERFNER, L., 1-8-93, p. 8]

“I’ve seen and heard anti-Arab racism so many times,” wrote American immigrant to Israel Larry Derfner, “… that I know it exists… The bigotry quotient is… much higher than the nominal level I expected to find before moving here… I’ve heard not only countless right-wingers, but also Laborites and even a couple members of a left-wing kibbutz utter variations on, ‘The only good Arab is a dead Arab.” [DERFNER, L., 1-8-93, p. 8] The secretary, Massi Raz, of Peace Now (the best known Israeli group advocating Israeli concessions for peace with Arabs) noted the problem of “natural racism of almost all Israelis.” [ARNOLD, M., 1999, p. 72]

While serving in the Israeli army, Derfner found himself watching the activities of a group of Israeli Border Patrolman attack a number of waiting Arab taxi drivers in Gaza City. They smashed their cars and “one policeman walked up to a driver seated in his cab, and punched him in the face. Another policeman called over a young man sitting at the bus stop, and swung open the door of his jeep into the fellow’s face. Three or four of the policemen… took off after the departing taxis, throwing their batons at them. When they came back to their jeep, they pounded each other on the back, exulting like they’d just scored a goal in a soccer match. The soldier guarding the base with me, an immigrant from Denmark, watched the scene with his mouth literally hanging open, “They’re like Nazis,” he said. [DERFNER, L., 1-8-93, p. 8]

In the earlier years of modern Israel, the eminent British historian Arnold Toynbee (who once was supportive of the founding of a Jewish state in Palestine) wrote:
“In the German Nazis, and in the English ‘Black-and-Tan,’ I see the detestable dark side of the countenance of western civilization. I myself am an involuntary participant, and in the Jewish Zionists I see disciples of the Nazis. The Jews are, of course, not the only persecuted people that have reacted to persecution by doing as it has been done by; and, of course, too, the Jews who have reacted in this tragically perverse way are only one section of Jewry. Yet the spectacle of the Jews, however few, following in the Nazi footsteps is enough to drive a sensitive gentile or Jewish spectator almost to despair. That any Jews should inflict a third party some of the very wrongs that Jews have suffered at Western hands is a portent that makes one wonder whether there may not be something irredeemably evil, not in Jewish human nature in particular, nor again just in Western human nature, but in the human nature common to all men.” [TOYNBEE, A., in GOULD, p 455]

In 1995, Hebrew University professor Moshe Zimmerman found himself in trouble when he reportedly told an Israeli newspaper that “there is a whole sector of Israeli society, that without hesitation I would call a copy of the Nazis. Look at the [Jewish] children of Hebron. They are exactly like Hitler Youth. They are brainwashed from age zero that Arabs are bad and about anti-Semitism, making them paranoid and racist – just like the Hitler Youth.” “Zimmerman,” wrote the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, “said that his remarks had been misquoted and, in one case, fabricated. But he did not withdraw his opinion that some similarities exist between Nazi hate propaganda and the ways [Jewish] settlers indoctrinate their children to hate Arabs.” [SEGAL, N., 5-7-95, p. 7]

Zimmerman was probably referring to the likes of studies at Israeli high schools after the 1994 murder of nearly 30 Muslims at prayer by American-born doctor Baruch Goldstein. Many students supported the random slaughter (as high as 60% of one Jewish high school class in the southern Israeli city of Be’er Sheva). As Joe Kolodner, head of the Psychological Services department for Israeli public schools noted, “It worries me that young people here are growing up without being able to emphasize with the pain of others and identify with their suffering… We must undergo a soul-searching. We’ve failed to develop values and create a humanistic society.” [DERFNER, L., 4-1-94, p. 2]

Journalist Lesley Hazelton, living in Jerusalem, noted in 1984 a conversation she had with an anonymous Israeli newspaper editor. “I’ve been in this country for fifty years,” he told her,

“and in all that fifty years, I have never, been so saddened and so concerned about the state of the country and its future. It’s like 1984 from the other side. In the novel, it was Communist totalitarianism. Here, it’s heading for right-wing nationalist totalitarianism, mystical and fascist.” [HAZELETON, L., 1987, p. 110]

After fifty one years of Israeli statehood, only in September 1999 did the Israeli Supreme Court formally ban the use of torture by the government’s security departments during interrogations of (Arab) detainees. (Somehow twisting half a century of behind-closed-doors brutality into an expression of Jewish moral superiority, Jewish American newspaper columnist Anthony Lewis wrote that the Supreme Court decision “has turned Israel toward the role that… early Zionists saw for a Jewish state: to be a light unto other nations).” [LEWIS, A., 9-15-99, p. B3] Amnesty International was among those who appealed to the Court to forbid the violent shaking of prisoners, multi-day periods of sleep deprivation, forcing victims into difficult postures and oppressive environments for extended periods of time, extreme weather exposure, and other inhumane assaults. “Israel,” declared the group, “is the only country in the world to have effectively legalized torture by authorizing interrogators to use these methods.” [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 1-12-99] The Israeli human rights organization Betselem noted that 85 percent of the 1,000-1,500 Arabs detained by Shin Bet [the Israeli FBI] each year have been tortured. [TORONTO STAR, 5-21-98, p. A6] In 1998, an Arab-American citizen, Hashem Mufleh, was detained and tortured while traveling in the West Bank. The U.S. State Department had even posted a warning against Arab-Americans visiting that area. [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 11-9-98] Earlier, three other Arab-Americans (Anwar Mohamed, Yousif Marel, and Bashir Saidi) were detained, imprisoned and – according to their depositions – tortured. Saidi was imprisoned for 18 months, Mohamed for 40 days; all were eventually released to return to America. [BRISCOE, D., 8-26-99] The same year, an American born teenager, Hashem Mufleh, faced similar treatment, and a trial, after being accused of associating with the Islamic militant Hamas organization in the Occupied Territories. [KRAFT, D., 11-18-98] In 1999, human rights organizations charged that ten Arab prisoners have been killed while being interrogated over the past decade at Israeli prisons. [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 1-13-99] In 1980, during a prisoner hunger strike for better conditions, two jailed Arabs were essentially tortured and killed when, in a showdown of wills, their Israeli wardens attempted to force milk into their stomachs, instead flooding their lungs. By now torturously and terminally ill, they were not taken to a hospital until the next day. [GROSSMAN, D., 1990, p. 88] In Lebanon, the Israeli-trained Khiyam prison directors of the South Lebanon Army also tortures detainees. In September 1999 Israeli Major General Dan Halutz told an Israeli court that Shin Bet teaches those who run the Khiyam facility. [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 9-28-99]

The insertion of the modern Jewish nation of Israel and its oppressive policies into the heart of Arab lands has created a whole new dimension, and a new population of adherents, to the long tradition of “anti-Semitism.” Whereas for centuries the Jewish people in their ghettos disdained the Christian faith and its people, with the creation of a militant, garrisoned, exclusionist ghetto in what was once Palestine, they have now solicited yet another antagonist front: the outrage and hatred from Islam and its many millions of believers. “The Palestinian problem,” notes Jewish professor Maxime Rodinson, “created by Zionism and compounded by its logical triumph, has spread hatred of Jews into Arab countries where anti-Semitism was virtually unknown. The Zionists have very actively aided this with their incessant propaganda to persuade people that Zionism, Judaism, and Jewishness are equivalent concepts.” [RODINSON,
“No enemy of the Jewish people, throughout history,” said another Jewish scholar, Leonard Fein, “has had so powerful an argument or so plausible a position as the Arabs, and… Arab passions, at long last, are now coming to be seen as authentic, no less authentic than the Jews.” [FEIN, Israel, p. 8-9] “Many of the peoples of the world who have developed antagonism or suspicion about the Jewish people have no historical legacy of antagonism towards us,” argues Michael Lerner. “In the years since the second World War they have come to know us primarily through the activities of the state which calls itself the state of the Jewish people.” [LERNER, M., Goyim, p. 431]

Yet another group of the exploited under the racist norms of Israeli society are the so-called “foreign workers.” For decades, poorly paid and defenseless Arabs from the Occupied Territories (and Israel) have served as cheap labor sources for Jewish society. While the average per capita income in Israel is $16,000 a year, thanks to over $3 billion a year in U.S. aid to the Jewish state, the official “minimum wage” for foreign workers is about $3.50 an hour, although many are paid less. With increasing violent acts from Arabs against Jewish citizens in recent years, Palestinian labor was viewed as a security risk. Hence, in the mid-1990s, Arab labor for the Occupied Territories was drastically curtailed (in Gaza, employment rose to 60% of those desiring work), and cheap laborers from distant lands (particularly from Romania, the Philippines, and Thailand, but also South and West Africa, Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, Ukraine, and other places) were permitted to come to Israel to do the tasks for low pay that the Jewish strata is not interested in doing. And they usually have few, if any, benefits and rights in Israeli society: there is no overtime pay, for example, sick leave or paid holidays. [TROUNSON, R., 3-8-97, p. 16] By 1998, there were such 190,000 foreign workers living in Israel; less than half had legal work permits and Jewish public opinion was increasingly hostile to them. Foreign workers were blamed for “spreading disease, drug use, alcoholism, prostitution and violence.” Israeli police, however, note that “most foreign workers ‘respect the law’ and many, particularly those here illegally, are victimized in thefts and rapes.” [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 7-9-98] A 1999 survey noted that only 35% of those Israelis polled said “they would agree to have workers live near them.” [FISHBEIN, 12-23-99]

In 1998 the Romanian prime minister, Radu Vasile, and nine cabinet ministers journeyed to Israel. Estimates of Romanians working in Israel legally were about 30,000, illegally tens of thousands more. Among issues to be discussed with the Jewish government was “the treatment Romanian workers receive in Israel. Romania has repeatedly protested that its nationals working in Israel are harassed by police and humiliated and exploited by employers.” [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 6-28-98] The month before, the Ambassadors from Romania, Ghana and Nigeria complained about mistreatment of their citizens including “street arrests and harassment, non-payment of wages, appalling living conditions and lack of social rights” and employers’ refusal to return passports to workers who wished to leave the country. [DEUTSCHE PRESSE-AGENTUR, 6-24-98] In 1998, the Israeli government even ordered that, because of a shortage, gas masks and chemical protection kits (in case of chemical attack from Iraq) could not be sold to foreigners. [WALKER, C., 2-7-98]

In 1999, Thailand’s ambassador to Israel, Domedeg Bunnag, complained that “if the workers’ conditions were not improved, his government would no longer permit Israel to import Thai workers.” “I am almost moved to tears when I see the conditions of Thai workers in Israel,” he told an Israeli newspaper, “They live in sub-human conditions, and are constantly exploited by both the moshav [agricultural center] owners and the manpower agencies.” Bunnag also charged that Thai workers were faced with unhealthy working condition, were overcharged for rent, underpaid, and routinely cheated by Israeli employers. [BAR-MOHA, Y., 7-19-99]

Foreign workers coming to Israel are legally bound to their initial sponsoring employer, no matter what unjust, inhumane or exploitive conditions are thrust upon them. “This requirement of linking the [worker’s] visa to one employer creates tremendous potential for abuse and exploitation,” notes Hanna Zohar, founder of a worker aid organization. [FINANCIAL TIMES, 1-23-97, p. 4] “Israelis lately,” noted the Los Angeles Times, “have become uncomfortably aware of the inhumane living and working conditions forced on many of the workers by their Israeli employers… Some employers take away the workers’ passports and, toward the end of one-year or six-month contracts, have them deported without paying their final wages. Confiscating passports is illegal but common, workers advocates say.” [TROUNSON, R., 3-8-97, p. A16]

In September 1997 an international news report noted that “Israel’s foreign ministry pledged Thursday to ensure ‘humane treatment’ of foreign workers after a Romanian laborer died at a Tel Aviv construction site from a lack of medical attention.” Such workers are often required to work 12-13 hours a day. [AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, 9-2-97] “We came here to make money and support our families so our children have a chance for a better future,” one Romanian worker told a Los Angeles Times reporter, “But they treat us like animals.” [TROUNSON, R., 3-8-97, p. A16]

Jewish racism in Israel also impacts the “Black Hebrews,” the African-American community of immigrants (who are rejected as Jews) in the desert town of Dimona. In 1999, the Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz noted that the Dimona municipality and the Ministry of Religious Affairs continued to block the Black Hebrews’ attempts to get land for a cemetery. They have been forced to bury their dead in the local garbage dump. [ARBELI, 10-3-99]

Jewish racism in Israel does not screech to a stop at the wall between goyim and the Jewish people. Although anti-Gentile racism in Israel cannot be reasonably compared to the intra-Jewish dimensions of the problem, it very much exists within the Jewish community too. Israel has always had a discriminatory society. The Ashkenazim – Jews of European heritage – largely founded, and still run, the country. (In its early years, Zionism’s strongest hold among Jews was in Russia and Poland, and these people essentially founded the modern Jewish state). Later mass immigration to Israel included the Sephardim (“Oriental” Jews from Arab countries, Iran, India, et al). By 1992, Israel’s Jews consisted of about half Ashkenazi and half Sephardi, although over 90% of the rest of the Jews of the world – including those in America – were Ashkenazi.

Tainted by Arabic cultures, the Sephardim have never measured up to traditional western Jewish self-identity. “The great Hebrew poet Chaim Nachmann Bialik,” says Zev Chafets, “was supposed to have joked that he hated Arabs because they reminded him of Sephardic Jews.” [CHAFETS, Z., p. 118] “Israeli identity of immigrants,” says Yohan Peres, “is constructed on the perceived Ashkenazic identity.” [AYALA, E., p. 155] “Israel’s first prime minister (and Ashkenazi) David Ben Gurion remarked in 1960 that the Sephardim in Israel had “come from a society that was backward, corrupt, uneducated, and lacking in independence and self-respect” and they should seek to attain “the superior moral and intellectual characteristic of those who created the state.” [BEN GURION, in SELZER, p. 65]

A journalist in one of the major Israeli dailies, Ha’aretz, once wrote that the Sephardim were “the likes of which we have not yet known in this country. You will find among them dirty card games for money, drunkenness, and fornication. Many of these suffer from serious eye, skin, and venereal disease; not to mention immorality and stealing.” [SELZER, p. 69]

In his study of the Israeli kibbutz system, Melford Spiro noted that at the schools “immigrant [Sephardim] children bear the brunt of this out-group aggression. Many students, ideologically in favor of immigration, are hostile to the immigrants from the Middle East, whom they view as inferiors – they call them schnorim, the ‘black ones.’ They are the constant butts of verbal aggression, taunting, and teasing.” [SPIRO, p. 319]

In more recent years, Zev Chafets notes the time he witnessed the stir created by an Israeli Ashkenazi journalist at an American Jewish Committee conference in New York. As Chafets recalls, the woman proclaimed that the Sephardim in Israel

“are brutal, vulgar people, people who have introduced violence and intolerance. I hate their values, their attitudes. They have destroyed our [Israeli] dream. They’ve stolen my homeland and I feel like a stranger in my own country.”

“There was a shocked silence in the audience,” says Chafets, “I had heard this kind of diatribe a dozen times in Israel but it was a new experience for the American Jews. More than a few of them, I guessed, were remembering similar statements expressed about themselves only a generation ago by America’s bluebloods.” [CHAFETS, Z., p. 129-130]

In 1998 the BBC reported the controversial accusations of Knesset [Israeli Parliament] Member Ori Or: “Among other things, Or told the [Israeli] newspaper that it was impossible to hold a normal conversation with Oriental Jews, adding that they were not really Israeli. He called the Moroccan Jewish community the biggest and the most problematic group in Israel… Or accused Oriental Jews of portraying themselves as victims of exploitation.” [BBC, 7-31-98]

“With inadequate living space, schools, day-care centers, kindergartens, youth clubs, and cultural programs,” said Etan Levine by the 1990s, “it is small wonder that [Jewish] Moroccans account for 90% of Israel’s prison population.
And this is a community that in its native land was far from a criminal element. Crime was learned in Israel itself… There is real hostility in the Sephardic community today. The Ashkenazim are identified as responsible for every injustice – real or imagined – that the Sephardim suffered since arriving in Israel. This resentment has been expressed in Sephardic voting patterns, in violent demonstrations, and in a host of other less bellicose ways.” [LEVINE, E., p. 41, 42]

By 1990, 56% of Ashkenazim Jews born in Israel had a college education; comparably, only 16.5% of the Sephardim born in Israel had such schooling. [SMOOHA, S., Jewish, p. 162] “The most crucial material gulf between the two ethnic groups,” observed Israeli sociologist Sammy Smooha in 1992,

“lies in the quantity and accumulation of wealth… In the Jewish population the poor and working class are predominantly Oriental, the middle stratum is ethnically mixed with some Ashkenazi over-representation and the upper-middle class and elite are predominantly Ashkenazi… The mobility of Ashkenazim was… to a large extent predicated on the channeling of Oriental newcomers to the lower rungs of society… Ashkenazim still continue to stereotype themselves as superior westerners and to project Orientals as inferior, arabized Middle Easterners.” [SMOOHA, S., Jewish, p. 163, 164, 165, 168]

The Sephardim also represent a Jewish tradition of ghettoization even within the Jewish state. “It is clear,” wrote Shlomo Swirski, “that the majority of Orientals now live in neighborhoods, towns, and villages that are overwhelmingly Oriental.” [AYALA, E., p. 154]

For decades there have even been accusations that, in the early years of the new Israeli nation, Jewish Ashkenazim stole Sephardim children to sell to other Jews or raise as their own. Such wild stories had never been taken seriously by Israeli mainstream society until 1997, when it was biologically proven that a Jewish woman in California, Tzila Levine, was the daughter of an emigrant to Israel from Yemen. They were separated – and didn’t know for certain of each other – for nearly fifty years. Mother and daughter, noted the Los Angeles Times, “asked searching questions about why the state of Israel, in its early days, and in the years since, had all but dismissed the claims of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of immigrants that their babies had disappeared… Leaders of the Yemenite Jewish community here and in the United States have long suspected that the missing children did not die, as many parents were told, but were kidnapped and sold to childless Jewish couples of American and European descent… Most Israelis have long dismissed the stories as the fantasies of an undereducated group caught up in the chaos of mass immigration… The sensational case, which sparked hundreds of phone calls to radio talk shows, is expected to spur new demands for investigations into the decades-old claims and to intensify simmering racial tensions between Sephardic Jews, of Middle Eastern and North African origin, and Ashkenazim.” [TROUNSON, R., p. A6]

Of course the Sephardim are Jews, and despite Ashkenazi discrimination towards them, they ride securely above an entire class of people yet beneath them.
“Sephardim Jews,” says Amnon Rubenstein, “have also benefited since 1967 by the Palestinians to the West Bank and Gaza Strip taking the lowest manual work within Israeli society, allowing the Sephardim to move up a step on the socioeconomic ladder.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 61]

Yet another (very recent) level of Jewish underclass in Israel is the Ethiopians. In the 1980s and early 1990s the Israeli government began airlifting the Falasha (Blacks from Ethiopia who have a Jewish self-identity) to Israel. This was part of Israel’s standard “absorption” policy – using also large numbers of immigrant Jews from Russia, and others – to swell Jewish ranks in a country where the minority Arab birth rate is considerably larger. The “Jewish” link legislated by the state of Israel between Ethiopians and Russians, however, is peculiar. Russian and Ethiopian Jews are in no way similar: their “race,” their language, their culture, and their religion are all drastically dissimilar. (Russian Jews, for example, raised under communism, have become largely atheist and exemplify the mores of western civilization; Ethiopians practice some religious rituals that are unknown otherwise in Israel and are, upon arrival to Israel, emphatically Third World in worldview). All that binds the two groups together are the ancient legends and religious convictions about the “seed” of Abraham-Isaac-Jacob, a “lost tribe” of Jews, and its legendary addenda. As Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen note, “the myth of common ancestry implies both common biological traits and a common history (it matters not whether the myth is true, only that those who share the same culture believe it to be true).” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 13] Ironically, much of the Ethiopians’ traditional Third World culture is closer akin to the indigenous Muslim Arab Bedouin (some too, who are of African origin) of the Jewish state. The influx of a Third World psychological temperament was also in marked difference from the predominant Israeli machismo; “Several Israeli newspaper commentators,” says Adam Garfinkel, “have remarked that the gentility of the Ethiopians is a welcome antidote to the brashness and hard-edgedness of Israeli culture.” [GARFINKEL, A., p. 102]

Allowing Black Jewish Ethiopians to migrate to Israel also has some international political expediency, in particular public image-making, i.e., helping to diffuse the 1975 United Nations General Assembly resolution (repealed under heavy Jewish lobbying pressure by 1992) that “Zionism is racism.” “The predominant interest in putting the spotlight on the Falashas and keeping it there,” says Virginia Dominguez, a non-Jewish scholar in Israel, “seems to have come from certain sectors in the American Jewish community. [DOMINGUEZ, V., p. 73]

Ethiopians as Jews has long been a controversial issue. Only in the mid-1970s did Israel’s Sephardic Chief Rabbi Ovadia Josef finally proclaim them officially to be real Jews. In the late 1970s Ethiopian males who made it to Israel were forced to surrender blood from their male organs in a circumcision ritual, a little understood expression of rabbinate doubts about, and an impugning of, their own Jewish identity. Other Jewish immigrants to Israel have met similar affronts about their identity. Virginia Dominguez cites the case of Jewish immigrants from India: “Members of the Bene Israel community who moved to Israel after the establishment of the state in 1948 found that most rabbis in Israel questioned their Jewishness and that they were not allowed to marry non-Bene Israel Jews without first undergoing at least nominal rituals in conversion to Judaism.” [DOMINGUEZ, p. 176]

The Ethiopian Jews in Israel have, of course, discovered at first hand the nature of enduring Jewish racism. In an Ashkenazi-Sephardim-Ethiopian Jewish hierarchy, the blacks find themselves at the bottom of Jewish society (although above Arabs). Among the most publicized Ethiopian protests about racist treatment occurred when Ethiopian-donated blood (a word which has connotations to the word “soul” in their Amharic language) was dumped by the Israeli health establishment in 1996 for fear of AIDS contamination. 10,000 Ethiopians rioted in outrage near the Prime Minister’s Office in Israel; scores of police and demonstrators were injured.

By 1996 too, governmental policy had directed about 80 percent of Ethiopian children into vocation-directing Youth Aliyah boarding schools, [SCHOFF-MAN, S., 1996] guaranteeing a future Black Jewish economic underclass (although again, as Jews, still above Arabs) in Israeli society.

In Israeli society, even recent Russian immigrants are discriminated against. Their Jewishness is often held suspect (anywhere between 5-30% of them are accused of being non-Jews. In 1990 the head of the Ministry of Absorption declared that as many as 30% were not Jewish, while at the same time the Israeli Interior Ministry cited a 5% figure). [FRANKEL, p. 176] Those suspected of not-being Jewish must face traditional Jewish animosity towards them as “goyim.” As the Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz noted about the situation, concerning two parents who lost a daughter to a Palestinian “suicide bomber”:

“In addition to being immigrants from Russia [Tatiano and Viktor Madbaneko’s Jewishness is ‘in doubt’ and they are forced into hopeless shadowboxing with a society that is practiced in ‘hating gentiles.’ They so much want to find a way to the heart of this society, with all its prejudices.” [USHPIZ, A., 2001, 6-8-01]

Most Russian Jewish were atheists under communist rule and few followed traditional Jewish religious dictates. Over 30,000 Russian-born men have been ritually circumcised in Israel. Glenn Frankel notes the case of an Israeli rabbi who “ordered a circumcision performed on the corpse of a Russian immigrant killed in a traffic accident before the rabbi would allow it to be buried in a Jewish grave. Later it turned out that hundreds of other corpses had been similarly mutilated at cemeteries throughout the country.” [FRANKEL, p. 168]

The Russians are a very educated community. By 1990 more than half of all immigrants from the Soviet Union to Israel had university degrees, a fifth had at least two degrees. [KYLE, p. 236] Reflecting serious problems in assimilating into Israeli society, “the Russians,” noted Yoram Peri, editor of the Israeli daily newspaper Davar, “say the Israelis treat their men as mafia and their women as prostitutes.” [FRIEDLAND, E., 6-29-95, p. 10] Russian immigrants to Israel are widely perceived to be a criminal element, particularly promoting prostitution. “Russian women,” notes Glenn Frankel, “with the light colored skin and blonde hair were known to locals as ‘white meat.’” [FRANKEL, G., p. 174]
In 1977, two Soviet Jews in Vienna, claiming to represent 700 others, held a news conference decrying “Zionist propaganda” that enticed them to move to Israel; they wanted to return to Russia. [ASSOCIATED PRESS, 4-28-77] In 1991 the Netherlands denied political refugee status to 50 Russian Jews who had fled Israel, unhappy with conditions in the Jewish state. Another 230 Russian Jews in the same situation were expected to be deported soon after from Germany. [TASS, 12-17-91] “In August 1995 the Federal Court of Canada upheld an immigrant panel’s denial of asylum to Russian émigrés who had left Israel were they had been citizens, claiming harassment and persecution. Israel was troubled that Canada had even considered such a claim concerning the nature of Israeli society.” [SINGER/SELDIN, 1997, p. 247] By 1993, 5-10% of Russian immigrants to Israel were disillusioned enough to go back to the country of their birth. A 1993 survey of 1,200 Russians revealed that 75% considered their economic situation to be worse in Israel than Russia. [FRANKEL, p. 183]

So what holds all these disparate Jews in Israel together, despite the serious strife, animosity, huge social and cultural differences, and conflict between them? The ancient theme, configured as government policy – the bond that has held Jewry tightly together in its ghettoes throughout history. The perceived threat of non-Jews.

Terrorism these days is generally defined as the random murder or harassment of the innocent towards a political goal; most agree that terrorist acts are cowardly deeds of violent desperation. In modern western society, the best known terrorists are those of Islamic and/or Arab origin, usually rooted in reaction to political conditions in the Middle East, particularly regarding Israel. The accusation of “terrorism” is, of course, a very relative term. It is an old adage that one person’s “terrorist” is another’s “freedom fighter.” Israelis are routinely spared the accusation of terrorism today despite the fact Israeli history has included brutally random violent activities. Menachem Begin, for instance, became the prime minister of Israel in 1977. In his younger years the British labeled him a terrorist for his leadership role in the underground IRGUN organization and its attacks against the British and Arabs in then-British controlled Palestine.

Begin took the heal of IRGUN in 1943. “Israel was,” wrote William Zukerman, “in part at least, a child of an underground terrorist movement – the Irgun Zvai Leumi (now named the Herut Party) which conducted one of the most ruthless terrorist campaigns against the British Mandate government.” [ZUKERMAN, W., p. 163] Under Begin, IRGUN membership numbered 50,000 Jews; “they carried out operations resulting in the death of some 300 British personnel.”

In 1946 Begin’s IRGUN group bombed the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, randomly killing 82 people, including 17 Jews. The British executed three captured IRGUN terrorists accused of the crime a week later. Begin responded by hanging two randomly captured British sergeants in retaliation. [AVISHAI, B., p. 174] “We’re guilty of nothing,” said Clifford Martin, as his murderers wrapped a kerchief over his eyes. His swinging body was even booby-trapped and hung upside down with the other to maim or kill those who came to cut it down. [HABER, E., p. 188; HERSH, S., p. 259] Begin later made his first visit to England in 1972. “Members of the families of the two sergeants,” notes Eitan Haber, “staged demonstrations against him. The communications media asked uncomfortable questions and got the by now well-known response: ‘I understand too well the feelings of the two families, but what choice did we have? We were in the midst of a war for our liberation.’” [HABER, E., p. 190]

“Individual IRGUN units,” notes Jewish historian Walter Laquer, “in response to the killing of Jews, began to attack Arabs passing through Jewish quarters. There was also indiscriminate bomb throwing in Arab markets and at bus stations.” [LAQUER, p. 375]

In 1964 Begin responded to those who called him a terrorist: “Our enemies called us terrorists… People who were neither our friends nor our enemies… also used this Latin name… [The British] called us ‘terrorists’ to the end… And yet, we were not terrorists… The historical and linguistic origins of the political term ‘terror’ prove that it cannot be applied to a revolutionary war of liberation… Fighters for freedom must arm; otherwise they would be crushed overnight… What has a struggle for the dignity of man, against oppression and subjugation, to do with ‘terrorism?’” [BEGIN, p. 59-60]

Noble words of a Jewish freedom fighter, but this exact text could of course be equally wielded as a justification to defend the Palestinian peoples’ own “war of liberation” for the “dignity of man, against oppression and subjugation” against the modern state of Israel. In the 1930s and 1940s, during Jewish efforts to throw the British out of Palestine, before Jews became much publicized as innocent victims of random Palestinian attacks, the nomer of “terrorist” was not so completely negatively charged. Later books exploring Jewish terrorism in Palestine (without complete condemnation) include the likes of The Lady was a Terrorist (1953), Woman of Violence: Memoirs of a Young Terrorist (1966), Memoirs of an Assassin (1966), and Terror Out of Zion (1977). In 1996 convicted Jewish terrorist Era Rapaport’s justification of his murderous deeds (Letters From Tel Mond Prison. An Israel Settler Defends His Act of Terror) won the National Jewish Book Award. (Can we imagine such a justification of the 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center winning a National Muslim Book Award?) The charge of terrorism, and its meaning, in the Israeli-Palestinian context, is, it appears, entirely relative to who is talking. Menachem Begin once called Palestinian guerillas – his liberation-oriented mirror image – “two-legged animals.” [JANSEN, M., p. 15]

We hear alot about “terrorists in Palestine” these days, but, apparently, when these terrorists were Jews – not Arabs – it was cool. Ben Hecht was a successful Hollywood screenwriter. And Irgun activist. Here’s what he says about a newspaper ad he wrote for that terrorist group:
“The ad carried the headline: ‘Letter to the Terrorists of Palestine.’ It read: ‘My Brave Friends. You may not believe what I write you, for there is a lot of fertilizer in the air at the moment. But on my word as an old reporter, what I write is true. The Jews of America are for you. You are their champions. You are the grin they wear. You are the feather in their hats. You are the first answer that makes sense – to the New World. Every time you blow up a British arsenal, or wreck a British jail, or send a British railroad sky high, or rob a British bank, or let go with your guns and bombs at the British traitors and invaders of your homeland, the Jews of America make a little holiday in their hearts ...” [HECHT, B., 1985, p. 615]

“The ad,” continues Hecht, “appeared in a few days. Some fifteen newspapers printed it at their ‘usual advertising rates.’ Hundreds of other newspapers in the U.S., Mexico, South America and France ran the ad gratis. It appealed to them, apparently, as news.” [HECHT, B., 1985, p. 617]

From the position of today’s empowered Israeli state, another eventual prime minister of Israel, Benyamin Netanyahu, offered an official definition of terrorism created by an Israeli-sponsored conference in Jerusalem in 1979: “Terrorism is the deliberate and systematic murder, maiming and menacing of the innocent people to inspire fear for political ends.” [NETANYAHU, p. 9] In 1986 Netanyahu edited an entire volume about containing terrorism against Israel and the West, (none of the volume’s 41 authors mentions Jewish-inspired terrorism) saying, “For the terrorist... legitimacy is derived from whatever cause he is fighting for or professes to be fighting for. There is no need to ask the people. He, the terrorist, is the self-appointed arbiter of what is just and necessary.” [NETANYAHU, p. 5] Although Netanyahu didn’t have Menachem Begin and the founding of Israel itself in mind, Begin even argued, in justifying his own terrorism, that any kind of resistance to oppressive political authority must ultimately result in violence: “All civil disobedience, if it has serious purpose, must inevitably, by iron laws of events, bring on an armed uprising.” [BEGIN, p. 198]

Another such Jewish terrorist/freedom fighter who rose to become the Israeli foreign minister and later prime minister (succeeding Begin in 1983) was Yitzhak Shamir. Among other accomplishments, Shamir headed a group of underground Jewish terrorists (LEHI) who assassinated a United Nations peace representative in 1948, Count Folke Bernadotte, a Swedish diplomat. [COCKBURN, A.; L., p. 35] As the prime minister of Israel, says Glenn Frankel, “he would cut any corner, shade any truth, anger any friend, defy any foe, to secure the land of Israel.” [FRANKEL, G., p. 286] The founder of LEHI (also known as the “Stern Gang”) was Abraham Stern.

In 1944 the Stern gang also assassinated Walter Guinness (Lord Moyne) in Cairo, Egypt. Guinness, “was, nominally at least, the key figure in British policy in the Middle East” and “the only British minister to have been assassinated in this century.” Two Jewish murderers were captured – Eliahu Hakim and Eliahu Bet-Tzuri. “Our deed,” the two declared before the were hung, “stemmed from motives and our motives stemmed from our ideals. And if we prove our ideals were right and just, then our deed was right and just.” A third Stern gang member, Raphael Sadovsky, involved in the Guinness murder, was later captured and his “50-page confession… includes names, dates and places and led to the wholesale arrests of suspected Sternists in Egypt and Palestine.” [BLACK, I., 11-5-94,
p. T39]

In 1963, Jewish author Gerald Frank heroized the Guinness terrorist act in a volume called The Deed. “When The Deed was published,” notes Ian Black, “the New York Times wrote an editorial condemning it as a glorification of terrorism.” In 1975, continues Black,

“the Israeli government… negotiated with the Egyptian government, via [Jewish American Secretary of State] Henry Kissinger, to allow the bodies of the two Eliahus to be exhumed and brought to Jerusalem, where they were reburied with full military honors.” [BLACK, I., 11-5-94]… James Callaghan, then [British] Foreign Secretary, ordered a formal protest ‘to make it clear to the Israeli government that an act of terrorism should not be honored this way’… Under the premiership of the former Irgun chief, Menachem Begin, postage stamps were issued honouring the two Eliahus and guaranteeing them an honoured place in the martyrology of the ‘fighting family.’” [BLACK, I., 11-5-94]

In another well-documented, and larger scale, atrocity, on April 9, 1948, members of terrorist IRGUN and LEHI squads murdered two-thirds of the inhabitants of the Arab village of Deir Yassin. In 1953 Israeli general Ariel Sharon headed a group of soldiers who murdered 70 Jordanians in the border village of Kibiya. “A statement was issued,” notes Seymour Hersh, “in [prime minister] Ben Gurion’s name blaming the atrocity on the inhabitants of nearby Jewish border settlements.” [HERSH, S., p. 78]

In more recent times, in October of 1985 Israeli jets bombed targets in the sovereign nation of Tunis, killing at least 12 Tunisians and 60 Palestinians. “This too was an act of terrorism,” argues Israeli Amnon Rubenstein, “for its intent was not only to assassinate Yassir Arafat and retaliate for the killing of three Israelis in Cyprus, but to promote a sense of fear and intimidation among all Palestinians. In short, none of the parties to the current [Arab-Jewish] conflict has a monopoly on the use of terror.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 156-159] Israeli Gideon Levy also noted, in the midst of the slaying of hundreds of Palestinians in the 2000-2001 Intifada against Jewish occupation:

“Who’s a terrorist? Aida Fatahia was walking down the street. Ubei Daraj was playing in the yard. She was the mother of three; he was nine years old. Both were killed last week by Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) bullets, for no reason. Their killing raises once again, in all its horror, the question of whether Palestinian violence is the only violence that should be called terrorism. Is only car bombing terrorism, while shooting at a woman and child is not? Is only car bombing terrorism, while shooting at a woman and child is not? Fatahia and Daraj join a long list of men, women, and children who were innocent of wrongdoing and killed in the past five months by the IDF. In the Israeli debate, their deaths were not a result of ‘terror actions’ or ‘terrorist attacks’ and the killers are not ‘terrorists.’ Those are terms used only for Palestinian violence… IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, commander of an army that has killed almost 90 children in the last five months, calls the Palestinian Authority (PA) a ‘terrorist entity,’ and totally ignores the actions of the army – and the results of those actions. But the questions must be asked: Aren’t massive land expropriations, systematic house destructions, the uprooting of orchards and groves, also a form of violence? Isn’t cutting off entire towns and villages from their source of water a type of violence?” [LEVY, G., 3-11-01]

In a later 1960s Israeli government-sponsored terrorist act against the United States government, Jewish critic Daniel Bell notes the case of the notorious “Lavon Affair”:

“The Lavon Affair is a striking instance. Some years ago, Israeli intelligence agents in Cairo set fire to a United States Information Agency building, in order to blame the Egyptians for the act and arouse anti-Nasser [then the head of Egypt] sentiment in the United States. When the plot miscarried, members of the Israeli service forged papers to demonstrate that Pinchas Lavon, then Minister of Defense, had approved the action. Lavon was then forced to resign… The Lavon Affair poses a painful question on the relationship of morality to political expediency.” [BELL, Alphabet, p. 307]

In the 1970s, American-born Israeli Joel Lerner headed a secret group that planned to blow up the Dome of the rock, the third holiest site for the world’s Muslims. “Others included,” noted Uri Huppert in 1988, “the present Chief Rabbi, Mordechai Eliyahu, and a leader of the ultra-Orthodox Sephardic community.” [HUPPERT, U., 1988, p. 107]

In 1982, another Jewish American (also with Israeli citizenship) Allen Goodman killed two Arabs near the Dome of the Rock. Resultant Arab riots resulted in another 11 Muslims slain by Israeli soldiers and police. Goodman was pardoned by Israeli authorities for his murders in 1997, on the condition that he returned to America. Still unrepentant, he declared that “what I did was politically correct.” Arab Americans in Baltimore, where Goodman was returning, expressed worry and outrage that such a man would be living in the Maryland community. “If I was a member of the Baltimore Muslim community, I’d watch my children after [Goodman’s] arrival,” noted Ibrahim Hooper of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, “As Congress enacts legislation against terrorism, it is accepting a terrorist.” [LOVIGLIO, J., 10-28-97]

In 1984 a cache of guns and explosives were found in the same Dome of the Rock area. [HUPPERT, U., 1988, p. 109] Four more Jews were arrested. On October 8, 1990, two months after Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait, thousands of Muslims gathered to resist a planned march in the area by Jewish nationalists; Israeli soldiers killed 19 Arabs and wounded 150 people in a subsequent riot.
In the 1980s a sensational plot by a group of apocalyptic messianic Zionists to blow up the Dome of the Rock (built where the ancient Jewish Temple is reputed to have existed) was uncovered by Israeli police. Some of the members of the plot were officers in the Israeli army reserves. Aviezer Ravitzky describes the plan: “It was a mystical attempt to cut off the forces of impurity, the ‘husk of Ishmael [Arabs],’ from the source of their vitality on the holy mountain. For some, however, it was also an apocalyptic move to bring about a historic turn, to force the hand of the Master of the Universe by bringing a catastrophe. By precipitating a great holy war against Israel, they would ‘oblige’ the Redeemer of Israel to wage a great and terrible campaign on their behalf. By facing the End below, they would activate the higher powers above.” [RAVITZKY, A., p. 133]

The identities of the 27 people involved in the arrested terrorist Jewish underground included “war heroes, teachers, graduate students, scholars, and respected builders of pioneer towns… they cited the Bible and the opinions of contemporary rabbis to justify their actions.” [RAPAPORT, E., 1996, p. 3] “Several members of the same loosely-tied West Bank Underground Movement killed several students at random in an Islamic college. They also planned to place bombs under civilian Arab buses.” [RAPAPORT, E., 1996, p. 9]

In a 1983 peace march by liberal Jews in Jerusalem, Emil Grunsweig was even killed by a grenade thrown by a fellow Jew. And in 1989 the Jewish Week reported that “two Jews were arrested [in Israel] on suspicion of throwing the bombs [into a Jewish home] in order to create an atmosphere of hostility against Arabs. Their intention, police said, was to discourage the presence of Arabs in this town where three Arabs were burned to death recently in the hut where they slept.” [ROTEM, 9-2-89, p. 6]

There is nothing, of course, that should shield the possibility that truckloads of men dressed in military fatigues may be terrorists too. In 1982 Israeli troops invaded Lebanon, eventually surrounding the capital city, Beirut. The announced objective was to drive the there entrenched PLO out of artillery range of Israel. Prime Minister Menachem Begin “compared Arafat to Hitler and the PLO’s stand in Beirut to that of Nazi Berlin in 1945.” “An estimated 15,000 to 20,000 Palestinians, Lebanese, and Syrians, the majority civilians, were killed during the three months of the war.” [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 88]

Among the disturbing results of the invasion was the notorious Shabra-Shatila massacres, much reported in the world press. In an area under Israeli military patrol, members of the Lebanese Phalangist militia were allowed into Palestinian refugee camps. Over 1,000 men, women, and children were slaughtered over a 40 hour period. In response to worldwide outrage, Begin brushed off criticism directed his way, saying that “Goyim kill goyim, and they come to hang Jews.” [PENKOWER, p. 326] Yet an International Commission of Inquiry announced that “the Commission concluded that the Israel authorities bear a heavy legal responsibility, as the occupying power, for the massacres at Sabra and Chatilla. From the evidence disclosed, Israel was involved in the planning and the preparation of the massacres and played a facilitative role in the actual killings.” In Israel itself, a commission headed by Supreme Court Justice Yitzhak
Kahan found Israeli General Ariel Sharon “guilty of indirect responsibility” for the carnage in the refugee camps. [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. 87]

In defense of Israeli policies in Lebanon, Begin said, “If Hitler were hiding in the building along with twenty innocent civilians would you not bomb the building?” In response, Israeli novelist Amos Oz, wrote that “No, sir. Your parable is invalid. Adolf Hitler died thirty-seven years ago. He is not hiding in Nabatiyah, Sidon or Beirut. He is dead and burned to ashes. Time and time again, Mr. Begin, you betray a weird urge to resurrect Hitler, only to kill him over and over again… You must remind yourself that the people of Israel have a state whose existence is now under a double threat, not only from an enemy that seeks its extraction, but also from our own well-known tendency to extreme hysteria tinged with messianic madness, a tendency that has brought catastrophe and destruction upon us before in our long history.” [BLOOMFIELD, I., p. 31]

To Israeli credit, popular condemnation of Begin and general Ariel Sharon was enormous: an estimated 400,000 people [RUBENSTEIN, A., p. xiv] rallied against the Lebanon war, about ten percent of Israel’s Jewish population.

So what is and is not “terrorism?” However one views the term, there is an underlying double standard always applied in the West towards Jews and their combatants in the Middle East — especially Muslim Arabs and Iranians, each populated with “terrorists,” while their mirror-image Jewish equivalents are usually honored as “freedom fighters.” The famously accused Saudi-born terrorist living in Afghanistan, Osama Bin Laden, is a case in point. As Fisk observes:

“The use of the word ‘terrorist’ – where Arabs who murder the innocent are always called ‘terrorists’ whereas Israeli killers who slaughter 29 Palestinians in a Hebron mosque or assassinate their prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, are called ‘extremists’ – is only part of the problem. ‘Terrorist’ is a word that avoids all meaning. The who and the how are of essential importance. But the ‘why’ is something the West usually prefers to avoid. Not once yesterday – not in a single press statement, press conference or interview – did a US leader or diplomat explain why the enemies of America hate America. Why is Bin Laden so angry with the United States?… The reason almost certainly lies with US policy – or lack of policy – towards the Middle East… Bin Laden himself was obsessed for many months with the massacre of Lebanese civilians by the Israelis at the UN base at Qana in south Lebanon in April 1996. Why had Bill Clinton not condemned this ‘terrorist’ act? he asked. (In fact, Bill Clinton called it a ‘tragedy,’ as if it was some form of natural disaster – the Israelis said it was a ‘mistake’ but the UN concluded it wasn’t.” [FISK, R., 8-22-98, p. 3]

As Israeli scholar Simha Flapan notes about the double standards of Jewish and Arab “terrorism”:

“Diaspora Jewry and friends of Israel abroad must realize that present Israeli policy is doomed to reproduce over and over again the cycle of violence that shocks our sensibilities every time we read or hear of wanton murder and bloodshed, whether the hand that perpetrates it detonates a bomb or fires a pistol. The collective revenge of an army for the murder of one of its citizens is no more righteous or admirable than the individual revenge of a desperate youth for the murder of one his people. It is only propaganda and distorted vision that labels one ‘terrorism’ and the other ‘national defense.’” [FLAPAN, S., 1987, p. 243]

Among the many things the Zionist pioneers of modern Israel have to be ashamed about was what became known in infamy as the “Transfer Agreement.” In the early 1930s, while worldwide Jewry and others spearheaded an economic boycott of the growing threat of Nazi Germany, the Jewish leadership in Israel (then Palestine) made a secret deal with the Hitler regime to get both German products to help build their developing Jewish nation, and a number of immigrant German Jews – some who were particularly committed to the philosophy of Zionism. By 1935, the Palestine economy “was saturated with German goods.” [BLACK, E., p. 373] (Peter Novick notes the “paradox” in later years that “American Jews shunned Volkswagens and Grundig radios at a time when Israel, as a result of [German post-war] reparations payments, was awash in German consumer durables”). [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 109] Between 1933-1941 perhaps $100 million went to Israel from Germany and “some of Israel’s major industrial enterprises were founded with those monies.” Some 60,000 German Jews were able to emigrate to Palestine from Hitler’s regime, most because of the “agreement,” and many with much of their wealth intact. [BLACK, E., p. 379] One such immigrant to Israel (from Hungary), Rudolph Kastner, was assassinated in Israel in 1957 for his role in dealing with the Nazis. As Nazi leader Adolf Eichmann later testified: “This Dr. Kastner was a young man about my age, an ice-cold lawyer and a fanatical Zionist. He agreed to keep the Jews from resisting deportation – and even keep order in the collection camps – if I would close my eyes and let a few hundred or a few thousand young Jews emigrate illegally to Palestine.” [BRENNER, L., p. 152] As the clandestine Zionist dealings with the Nazis became better known, there was worldwide outrage, especially in Jewish circles.

In 1933, for instance, a prominent American rabbi, Abba Hillel Silver, decried the Zionist-Nazi dealings: “Why, the very idea of Palestinian Jewry negotiating with Hitler about business instead of demanding justice for the persecuted Jews of Germany is unthinkable. One might think that the whole affair was a bankruptcy sale and that the Jews of Palestine were endeavoring to salvage a few bargains for themselves.” [BLACK, p. 320] Zionists had a very special interest in Jews who subscribed – or at least could be pulled – to their own political philosophy, and a dedication above all else to the practicalities of building a Jewish state. As David Ben Gurion once said in a closed meeting of the Jewish Agency: “If I knew that all the Jewish children of Europe could be saved [from Hitler] by settlement in Britain and only half could be saved by settlement in Palestine, I would choose the latter.” [AVISHAI, B., p. 152] “Labor Zionism desired the many, but not the multitudes,” explains Edwin Black, “Mapai’s [Labor’s] Israel would be not for every Jew – at least not in the beginning. At first Israel would be for the approved cadre of pioneers.” [BLACK, E., p. 142] “From the beginning of Hitler’s regime,” notes Peter Novick, “Ben Gurion, guided by what his biographer terms ‘his philosophy of… beneficial disaster,’ had insisted that ‘it is in our interest to use Hitler… for the building of our country’; “the harsher the affliction, the greater the strength of Zionism.” [NOVICK, P., 1999, p. 77]

“When the Zionist organizations,” says Hannah Arendt, “against the natural impulses of the whole Jewish people, decided to do business with Hitler, to trade German goods against the wealth of German Jewry, to flood the Palestinian market with German products and thus make a mockery of the boycott against German-made articles, they found little opposition in the Jewish National Homeland, and least of all its aristocracy, the so-called kibbutzniks.” [ARENDT, in SELZER, p. 222]

A Jewish author, Edwin Black, wrote an entire volume, The Transfer Agreement, about this dark side of Zionist history. “For months,” he wrote, “the information confounded me. Nothing made sense. There were so many contradictions. Nazis helping Jewish nationalism. American Jewish leaders refusing even to criticize the Third Reich [BLACK, E., p. xiii]… Zionists leaders, during April 1933, sought to cooperate with the Nazi Reich to arrange the orderly exit of Jewish people and wealth from Germany. [BLACK, p. 104]… In the minds of Zionists, Jewish life in Germany could not be saved, only transferred. Even if Hitler and the German economy were crushed, Jewish wealth in Germany would be crushed with it. The wealth had to be saved [BLACK, p. 226]… The Nazi Party and the Zionist organization shared a common stake in the recovery of Germany. If the Hitler economy failed, both sides would be ruined [BLACK, p. 253]… It soon became impossible to distinguish between the unhappy burden of doing business with the Third Reich to facilitate immigration [to Israel], and the gleeful [largely Israeli] rush of entrepreneurs frantic to cash in on the captive capital of Germany’s Jews.” [BLACK, p. 310]

“Both Nazis and Zionists had something in common,” notes Lenny Brenner… “It was shared belief [counter-Chosen people; counter nationalisms; agreement that Jews could not assimilate into German society] which made the Transfer Agreement possible… For a propagandist who seeks to strike at the very core of Jewish sensibility, awareness of the Transfer Agreement is like a dream come true.” [BRENNER, p. 164] Edwin Black wrote about the problem he had in writing his book about the limited Nazi-Zionist collusion: “My greatest worry is that the revelations of this book might be used by enemies of the Jewish people. For those who seek to besmirch the Zionist movement as racist and Nazi-like, this agreement might seem to be perfect ammunition.” [BRENNER, L., p. 164]

One especially radical branch of Zionism had even deeper interests in German fascism. As Anthony Heilbut notes, “There is no denying that members of the Stern Gang, like [former Israeli prime minister] Yitzhak Shamir, had in 1940 sought an alliance with Hitler, while advocating a national and totalitarian Jewish state.” [HEILBUT, p. 345]

Since its early dealings with Hitler’s Nazi’s, the Zionist cause has expanded into economic relationships with many other totalitarian regimes, for decades deeply involved in weapons dealing and military and police training, often with brutal dictatorships and repressive military juntas throughout the Third World. By the 1990s, Israeli arms dealing accounted for nearly 40% of the country’s export earnings, about $1.5 billion a year. [COCKBURN, A, p. 7] By 1987 between 20-40% of Israel’s “industrial labor force” was employed in arms making. [HUNTER, p. 13] Sometimes Israelis (both governmentally-sponsored and as private entrepreneurs) act as a clandestine force to expedite the morally distasteful “dirty work” of United States foreign policy; more often Israel and its functionaries are maverick international predators engaged in state and personal self-interest. It is an insidious role of profiteering upon the death, destruction, and misery of people the world over, a modern revival of one of the old Jewish entrepreneurial bases: war contracting. “Zionism,” notes Israeli Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, “has clear, inescapable ideological implications, in terms of dealing with the Third World. Zionism meant the creation of a Jewish sovereignty in Palestine through settlement and political domination. Thus, by definition, it entails an attack on the indigenous populations, and a confrontation with the Third World.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 229]

“In 1993,” notes Alan Vorspan, “the CIA testified before a Congressional committee that Israel is involved in a major arms deal with China and providing China with advanced technology that the United States and other western powers will not supply. In the past, Israel has sold arms to unsavory ‘right wing’ dictatorships operating death squads in Central America at a time when Congress sought to cut off arms shipments to human rights violators. Israel was the primary provider of arms – perhaps even nuclear technology – to apartheid South Africa at a time when the racist regime was held in contempt by the rest of the world. Israel played a role in the tragi-comic IranGate debacle. Among western-style democracies… Israel’s track record makes it one of the world’s most promiscuous arms dealers.” [VORSPAN, p. 23]

The best known incident in recent years of underhanded military dealing was the so-called Iran-Contra scandal in the 1980s when the state of Israel – at the request of the Reagan administration – circumvented existing United States laws to get weapons to American-supported “Contra” rebels fighting the Marxist government of Nicaragua. Arms were also provided to Iran by Israel in secret efforts to free American hostages in the Middle East. But this much-publicized escapade is only the tip of an ominous iceberg. Less widely known, for example, is a 1994 State Department ban on all United States trade to two Israeli companies owned by Nachum Mamber. Mamber is alleged to have sold materials to Iran that have use in the manufacture of chemical weapons.” [HIRSCHENBERG, p. 13]
Earlier, Israel had been a prominent exporter of weapons to Nicaragua during the dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza García “until the defeat of Somoza by the Sandinistas.” [ELKIN, p. 245]

“The extent of Israeli activities in the Third World is baffling to both friends and foes of Israel,” wrote Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, a professor at Israel’s University of Haifa, in 1987, “…. Mention any trouble spot in the Third World over the past ten years and, inevitably, you will find smiling Israeli officers and shining Israeli weapons on the news pages… We have seen them in South Africa, Iran, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Namibia, Taiwan, Indonesia, the Philippines, Chile, Bolivia, and many other places… [HALLAHMI, p. xii]…. Most of the details of these involvements are not known while they take place. So that reliance on open sources will inevitably lead us to underestimate the extent of the involvement. Consequently, present Israeli activities are probably much wider and deeper than what we have been told in public forums or the media.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. xiii]

“The main markets for Israeli military goods and services have shifted over time,” says R. T. Naylor, “from sub-Saharan Africa to Iran to Central America to South Africa and Latin America today. But the nature of the favoured customer has changed little. Where there is a particularly thuggish regime in power, especially one so ostracised from the rest of the international community, that it is willing to pay premium prices, Israel is likely to be there, energetically peddling its wares.” [TAYLOR, p. 135] “Every time there’s a television show dealing with the seaminess and underside of American foreign policy, a “pro-Israel” Congressional aide told the Jerusalem Report, “and you see an Israeli arms dealer sitting there, it hurts Israel.” [GOLDBERG, J.J., 6-11-1991, p. 26]

“New reports,” says Adam Garfinkle, “noted Israeli weapons were even ending up with the Serbs in 1995.” [GARFINKLE, p. 194] That year a Jewish immigrant to Israel from what was formerly Yugoslavia, Igor Primoract, a professor of philosophy at Hebrew University, also wrote an article charging that Israel’s Mossad was funneling weapons to Serbia despite a world-wide arms embargo. “The Israeli government,” said Primoract, “has been at odds with most of the rest of the world since Yugoslavia began disintegrating. In… 1991, when Serbia’s onslaught on Croatia was in full swing and Serbian atrocities were receiving worldwide coverage, Israel accepted Belgrade’s offer to set up diplomatic relations.” [CURTISS, R., 5-1-95]

“In today’s Israel,” noted Dan Raviv and Yossi Melaman in 1990, “… making money has become a Golden Calf before which much of the society – including its intelligence and military circles – kneels… [RAVIV/MELMAN, p. 347]… The new symbols for Israel in the international community have become the arms merchants and other ‘formers’ [i.e., former military men in the private arms business].” [RAVIV/MELMAN, p. 359]

Reflecting the kind of society Israel has become, Hirschberg wrote that “Israeli private security firms are active ‘in every country imaginable,’ says one leading expert. They’ve trained anti-terrorist units in the jungles of South America and security officers at Mexican power plants. For years, an Israel-run firm guarded the Presidential palace in Nigeria. Since 1993, the Israeli firm Levron… has been setting up an army from scratch in the Congo… The Tel Aviv Golden Pages classified phone book has ten full pages listing private investigation firms, offering everything from personal protection and domestic investigations to debt collection, lie detector tests, electronic surveillance and debugging, and recovery of stolen property… The Jerusalem Report contacted about two dozen of the hundreds of firms listed. All confirmed that their top staffers were veterans of some branch of the government security services of the police. And their field workers were all recent graduates of army elite combat units.” [HIRSCHBERG, p. 14-16]

Israeli involvement in fueling bloody Third World struggles is long standing. During the dictatorship of the Shah of Iran, Israel was only second to the United States in military support to him.” In some areas such as domestic intelligence [the training of Iran’s dreaded secret police],” says Beit-Hallahmi, “Israel’s involvement was even greater.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 9] A political scientist observed in 1965 that the Shah’s Iran “supplied much of Israel’s oil needs during the Arab [oil] boycott [of Israel]… Although not generally known, Iran maintains a close military liaison with Israel’s army staff… The magnitude of the Iran-Israeli program remains generally secret.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 10]

In eleven visits to Iran in the 1970s by Israeli prime ministers, a foreign minister, and a defense minister, “the man who hosted all these visits was Nem-atollah Nasri, deputy prime minister and head of SAVAK, the Iranian secret police.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 10] was internationally notorious for its kidnapping, torture, and murder of Iranian citizens, well documented by Amnesty International and other human rights groups. The Washington Post reported a source who claimed during that era that “innumerable Iranians, including many in a position to know, told me that the Israelis oversee the SAVAK technique.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 11] A 1976 CIA report noted that “Mossad has engaged in joint operations with SAVAK over the years since the late 1950s.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 183] Israel also helped the Shah put down a revolt of dissident tribesmen in southern Iran in 1963 and was working with the dictator in developing a missile that could deliver nuclear war heads when the Iranian revolution toppled him. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 11]

In Turkey, the Israeli international spy organization – Mossad – has had a station since the 1950s and helped train the Turkish secret police. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 16] Citing a CIA report, Ian Black and Benny Morris note that “the Mossad set up a triangular organization with the Turkish National Security Services (TNSS) and the Iranian SAVAK.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 189] “There is one well-publicized aspect of the unpublished contacts between Israel and Turkey,” says Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, “The Israeli government forbid any mention of the Turkish genocide of Armenians in 1915 in any government-controlled media or government-sponsored activities… It has taken actions against any mention of the Armenian case.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 17] In 1998, Neil Lochery noted that “The Turkish alliance [with Israel] is ideal given the Turkish military’s eagerness to undertake a programme of modernization of its large armed forces using primarily Israeli companies. In simple terms, [military] orders placed by the Turks have prevented [Israeli] job losses and helped secure projects which may have otherwise been in jeopardy.” [LOCHERY, p. 58]

In 1999 Israeli security guards at the Israeli Consulate in Berlin opened fire on a crowd of 100 rioting Kurds, killing two men and a woman and wounding fifteen others. The protesters had gathered in outrage of the Mossad’s alleged role in capturing Kurdish rebel hero Abdullah Ocalan in Greece for Turkey. [WILLIAMS, C., p. A1] Earlier, in 1998, two Israelis were captured in Cyprus, under suspicion that they were spying for Turkey. “The Israeli media,” noted Agence France Presse, “accepted that the men were Israeli agents but varied widely over what they were doing.” [CHARLAMBOUS, C., 11-8-98]

In 1991 four Israeli agents were also caught attempting to bug the Iranian embassy in Cyprus, in 1998 Mossad members were caught bugging the home of Swiss citizen of Lebanese origin, and in 1996 two Israeli agents were captured in a failed attempt to murder a Hamas leader in Jordan. [CHARLAMBOUS, C., 11-8-98]

Israel has long aided the dictatorial dynasty of Sultan Qaboos ibn Said in Oman. Mossad has also helped stir Kurdish revolts in Iraq beginning in 1958 and has long supported minority Christian groups in Lebanon to secure an Israeli buffer zone against hostile Muslim areas. This included Pierre Gemayel’s fascist Phalangist party, founded in 1936. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 18] The 1976 creation of the South Lebanon Army has also long functioned as a “puppet organization” for Israeli interests.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 19]

Mossad’s main clandestine station in Asia is in Singapore, from which Israel has maintained military ties with South Korea and Taiwan. “Particularly sensitive,” says Joel Kotkin, “… are Israeli arms traders and elite military training teams who, for the purposes of mollifying Muslim public opinion both inside Singapore and in neighboring countries, pass themselves off as ‘Mexicans’ to the local citizenry.” [KOTKIN, p. 39] “It has been reported,” notes Beit-Hallahmi, “that Israel has transferred to Taiwan both nuclear technologies and chemical-warfare technology and a CIA report [says that Israel] has provided intelligence training to the Taiwanese secret services.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 28] Not far away, “Indonesia and Israel have a long-standing military relationship.” [PARIS, p. 112]

In 1999, USA Today headlined a story “U.S. is concerned, but unable to stop Israel-China deal.” The Jewish state ignored American concerns despite the billions of dollars in aid it receives from America. The deal with mainland China was for high-tech AWACS radar systems to be installed on Chinese jets, elevating them to new thresholds of warfare capabilities. “The United States has banned military sales to China since that country’s 1989 crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrators in Tiananmen Square,” noted USA Today, “But Israel, though it has received billions of dollars worth of U.S. military aid, is under no such limitation, provided that the technology it sells has no U.S. content.” [SLAVIN, B., p. 17A]
In the Philippines, dictator Ferdinand Marcos “was protected by Israeli bodyguards who had served in elite Israeli commando units. The wealthy friends of the President also enjoyed such services.” Entire “private armies” in the Philippines were trained by Israeli advisers. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 28-29]

The distinction between the Israeli government itself and Israeli private citizen entrepreneurship in supporting brutally repressive regimes against freedom and justice movements worldwide is blurred. Former Israeli military officers, and even rank and file soldiers (usually from “elite” units), invariably remain active in the army as “reserves” to age 55 and still well-connected thereafter. Private exploitation of worldwide disaster is often indivisible from the clandestine policies of the Israeli government. An example of this private enterprise-Israeli government symbiosis is the Tel Aviv-based Tamuz Control Systems, an organization owned by a retired general who “offers Third World regimes assistance in solving their security problems.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 30]

Israeli governmental enterprise and private military business exploits are so entwined that when two private citizens, employed by Tamuz, passed along classified military material to the Philippines in 1984, despite some attention in the Israeli press, it was ultimately deemed to be inconsequential. The reason? The two Tamuz employees in question had worked – and still had contacts with – an Israeli anti-terrorist unit. As an Israeli newspaper reported: “[Tamuz] is headed by former generals and the transfer of material to Third World companies is coordinated with senior defense officials.” Another reporter wrote that, “The offense is only technical because, as is known, [Tamuz] is directed by former generals who are in constant contact with SHABAK and MOSSAD [Israeli secret police organizations].” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 30] As Beit-Hallahmi sees it:

“Israeli mercenaries… arrive at their destinations through a system that has much to do with the Israeli state, and most of them are emissaries of the state, not soldiers of fortune. There is a connection and a similarity of oppression in one particular situation and oppressions in other situations, geographically and culturally remote. How does an Israeli officer feel in Namibia or while training South Africans in counter-insurgency? The answer is ‘right at home.’” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 233]

Israel also has a MOSSAD station in Jakarta, Indonesia, fronted as a commercial company; Israeli advisers also helped Sri Lanka in its ongoing efforts to quell the rebellious Tamil minority. Israeli weaponry or personnel has also found its way to Afghanistan, Thailand, and China. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 32-36]

In Africa, Israelis helped train the armies of the Ivory Coast, the Central African Republic, Dahomey (Benin), Cameroon, Senegal, Togo, Tanzania, Uganda, Ethiopia, Nigeria, and Somalia. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 38] “In several African countries,” notes Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, “we can observe a pattern in which, without formal relations, our Israeli agent manages to get very close to the head of state, becoming known as the President’s personal adviser, his right hand man, or his best friend. Such patterns were in evidence in Senegal, Zaire, Liberia, the Ivory Coast, and other places. The MOSSAD agent performing his task is typically charming.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 73]

In 2001, the Democratic Republic of Congo “revoked the monopoly of the Israeli company International Diamond Industries.” A United Nations report had documented that the Congo was being cheated by the company and that it was the African nation’s desire for “access to Israeli military equipment and intelligence, that sealed the original deal for the monopoly.” [AVNI, B., 4-27-01]

For years, the Israeli Mossad has also had worldwide assassination teams to eliminate Palestinian leaders who violently struggled against Israeli “occupation” of their homeland. It is even believed to have assassinated Gerald Bull, a Canadian scientist who had in recent years helped Iraq in one of its weapons program. “The full truth about Israeli hit squads,” note Ian Black and Benny Morris, “will probably never be known. The basis of all such operations is complete deniability, however implausible these denials may be. In [one such] case, the need for operational secrecy was twofold: to guarantee the safety of the killers and their back up teams; and to prevent the expose of any official [Israeli] connection to the assassinations.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 272] Among the most publicized Israeli-backed assassinations was the 1973 murder of an Arab worker in a small town in Norway, a case of mistaken identity. Six Israeli Mossad agents were captured, five received prison terms, the longest sentence was only five years. [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 276] More recently, in a bungled attempt, a group of Mossad agents were captured when they tried to murder a Hamas leader in Jordan by throwing poison in his ear.

Close Israeli attachment to the apartheid regime of South Africa was often questioned, even in the world media. In 1963 a United Nations Security Council resolution called upon the nations of the world to boycott South Africa militarily; in 1977 a second resolution made the boycott mandatory. Israel ignored both completely. [BEITH-HALLAHMI, p. 117] Israel is even believed to have conducted joint nuclear tests with South Africa in 1979, 1981, and 1985. [HUNTER, p. 36-38] Among Israeli activities in support of South Africa was financial investment in the apartheid regime, including, notes Jane Hunter, “a rapacious ‘private enterprise’ interest in the Bantustans, the barren pseudo-states that warehouses much of the black majority… [HUNTER, p. 71]… No government in the world recognized the benighted Bantustans as the independent countries the racist regime has declared them to be.” [HUNTER, p. 74] Israelis were even employed to guard casino tables at Sun City, a gambling resort linked to the Bantustan of Bophuthatswana. By 1985 there were 200 Israeli advisers, technicians, and entrepreneurs in the Bantustan of Ciskei alone (near Cape-town), an area described “as one of the most economically underdeveloped areas in the world.” [HUNTER, p. 71] That year a series of scandals and scams by Israeli investors resulted in their expulsion from the area. [HUNTER, p. 72]

“I cannot understand,” remarked South African Black leader Bishop Desmund Tutu in 1987 to a Jewish audience, “how people with your history would have a state that would collaborate in military matters with South Africa and carry out policies that are a mirror image of some of the things from which your people suffered.” [JEWISH WEEK, 3-20-87, p. 17] An American journalist could understand the link. In 1972 J. Hoagland noted that “to Afrikaners, the parallels [between them and the Israelis] are as obvious as they are embarrassing to the Israelis. They and the Israelis are essentially white, Europeanized peoples who have carved their own nations out of land inhabited by hostile, non-European majorities that would destroy the two nations if the Afrikaners and Israelis listened to the United Nations or world opinion. Their religions are similar, each being a ‘chosen people.’” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 160]

During the Algerian war for independence to break from French colonialism, Israel supported the ultra-right wing French OAS settler community. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 44] Indigenous Jews in Algeria (a community of about 100,000 people) also provided information to the Mossad about Algerian revolutionary activities against French control of the country; this information was passed along to the French (Israel was at the time seeking French good graces for joint research in the creation of a nuclear bomb). [HERSH, p. 36]

In Morocco, by 1965 Israelis had “set up [King] Hassan’s internal security system, including the personal guard unit to the King himself.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 46] Israeli aid in helping the Moroccan government murder a dissident, Medhi Ben-Barka, on French soil which caused an international incident. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 46] “Since King Hassan’s succession to the throne of Morocco in 1961,” note Ian Black and Benny Morris, “Israel’s intelligence had enjoyed a special relationship with his security services… Israeli operatives helped the new king to reform his secret service and trained its agents on a regular basis.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 203] During Tunisia’s struggle against French colonialism, there was fighting between French and Tunisian troops in 1961 over a French naval base near the town of Bizerte. “Hundreds of Arabs died. The 1,200 strong Jewish community was accused of collaborating with the French. Many of the Jews worked in the base or serviced it.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 181]

In Sudan, Israelis discreetly aided Anyanya rebels in its South. Also, “by the mid-1980s,” notes Jacob Abadi, “Israel became increasingly concerned over the fate of the Falasha Jews in Ethiopia and in the refugee camps of Sudan. Besides, Israel had other grandiose schemes, which required Sudanese cooperation. Israel sought to establish a huge arsenal on Sudanese territory. In addition, Israel explored the possibility of using Sudan as a base of operations, aimed at helping the son of the deposed Shah of Iran to return to Iran and topple Ayatollah Khomeini’s regime.” [ABADI, 1999]

In Ghana “military and intelligence cooperation… [and] training was given by MOSSAD.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 49] In Ethiopia, Israel joined with the United States and Britain in trying to prevent the collapse of the Haile Selassie regime to the Eritrean Liberation Front. Israelis had earlier helped train the Ethiopian secret police. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 51-52] “INCODA, a wholly-owned company that exported Ethiopians beef was a useful commercial front for intelligence activities… In December 1960 the Israelis helped [Emperor] Haile Selassie crush a coup attempt.” [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 186-187]
“In Zaire,” says Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, “the regime of Mobuto Sese Seko... can only be described as a murderous tyranny... When we look at the record carefully, we discover that Israel has played a continuous role for twenty-five years in keeping Zaire under western control and under Mobutu’s.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 55] MOSSAD agent Meir Meyohas was even “Mobutu’s personal right hand man for over twenty years.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 60] Mobutu believed “in the great power of the Jews to influence governments and the press, especially in the United States.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 57] To pander to this conviction, it was arranged for Kenneth Bialkin, chairman of the President’s Conference on American-Jewish Leaders, “to represent Mobutu in the United States.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 57]

In Uganda, the notoriously ruthless ruler Idi Amin was installed by Israel, the United States, and British intrigue; “the Israeli advisers in Uganda were especially close to Colonel Idi Amin.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 61] “The Israelis,” observed two scholars on the area, “... were disturbed by [the former head of Uganda and his] growing anti-Zionism... Amin they thought would be a useful puppet and come to rely on a large military presence for his survival.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 62] When Palestinians hijacked an Air France jet to Israel in 1976, in the famous Entebbe airport incident in which Israeli troops clandestinely flew to Uganda and freed Jewish hostages in a shootout, it helped in siege plans that the Entebbe airport had been built by an Israeli company, Solel Bonch, which provided Israeli rescuers with information about airport terrain. [BLACK/MORRIS, p. 340]

In Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) Israel supported the colonial white minority regime in various ways, including the construction of a 500-mile long mine field along the Rhodesian border with Mozambique and Zambia. There were even Israeli mercenaries in the Rhodesian army. [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 63]

In Mozambique and Angola, Israelis had militarily equipped Portuguese colonial regimes against indigenous liberation movements; in Kenya Israel supplied arms, in Chad advisers and weapons during its civil war. In 1984 five Israelis were arrested in England as they tried to smuggle a drugged former Nigerian senator, Umaru Dikko, in a box out of the country and back to Africa to a new regime. Conspirators included an Israeli doctor, Lev Shapira. At their trial, they said they worked for the Israeli secret service, the Mossad. [RAVIV, p. 357]

In Latin America, formal and informal Israeli support of murderous military dictatorships has been widespread. As one commentator put it: “Many former [Israeli] officers have been traveling through Central America offering their services as anti-terror consultants, personal advisers, trainers, and even simple bodyguards.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 78] Yair Klein, for instance, helped train Colombian drug cartels in paramilitary techniques. “A videotape broadcast in August 1989,” note Dan Raviv and Yossi Melman, “show Klein and other Israelis training armed Colombians who were identified as assassin squads for the cocaine barons of Medellin.” [RAVIV/MELMAN, p. 355] And “ex-Mossad man Mike Harari,” says Hirschberg, “a close aide to Panama’s in-international drug-dealing President Manuel Noriega, reportedly obtained weapons systems and bugging devices for the dictator.” [HIRSCHBERG, p. 13]

By 1975 Israel had become a major arms supplier to the region. “Central American generals,” notes Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, “often say they admire Israel because they view the Israelis they know as practical, efficient, and tough, and because they see Israel ‘unencumbered’ by issues of human rights.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 77-78] “The Israelis do not let this human rights thing stand in the way of business,” one Guatemalan politician told Reuters, “You pay, they deliver. No questions asked. Unlike the gringos.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 78] Another reason the Israelis are appreciated by military juntas, says Beit-Hallahmi, is because of “the strong pro-Israel lobby in the United States, which is believed to be able to do wonders for a reactionary regime in the dangerous waters of United States public opinion.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 78]

Latin America has been home to some Jews for centuries. In 1987, during bloody turmoil going on throughout the area, the Jewish Week noted that:

“In several Latin American nations – including Cuba, Chile, and Nicaragua – individual Jews have been identified with both left-wing and right-wing regimes. Nonetheless, most observers interviewed agreed that Jews, when forced to chose, fared better with right-wing regimes simply because Latin American Jews tend to be upper-class and suffer from the economic policies of left-wing reformers... One veteran Latin American Jewish leader, Dr. Gil Sinay of Chile, said Jews do not necessarily need to fear right-wing military dictatorships.” [GOLDBERG, JJ, JEWISH WEEK, 6-31-87, p. 4]

Among the various profitable areas of suffering in Central America is Guatemala. “Even in the midst of the endless misery and cruelty of Central America,” observes Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, “Guatemala stands out as a country where those in power have been fighting the powerless with an unusual degree of ruthlessness and bloodiness. Over the years reports of the horrible realities of Guatemala have been numerous and the judgements harsh. What is unique is the extent to which those who carried out the deliberate policies of endless killings have proclaimed their indebtedness to Israel, as the source not only of their hardware, but of their inspiration. Israel became the main support of the Guatemalan regime.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 79] In merely one incident there was “the discovery by the Greek authorities of an Israeli arms consignment on board a ship bound for Central America. The cargo included eighty tons of ammunition, twenty tons of explosives, and a helicopter which, according to crew members, were going to Guatemala for delivery to neighboring countries.” [KLIICH, p. 38]

The Israeli presence in Guatemala has been deep, from military advisers to corporate arms dealers. Some have, unusually, even personally engaged in killing expeditions. “Israeli soldiers are not just instructors,” noted Beit-Hallahmi, “Israeli advisers – some official, others private – helped Guatemala internal security agents hunt underground rebel groups. They have been directly engaged in counterinsurgency campaigns against the Indian communities.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 84] “Israel not only provided the technology for the reign of terror,” observes
Jane Hunter, “it helped in the organization and commission of the horrors perpetrated by the Guatemalan military and police.” [HUNTER, p. 111] By 1987 at least 45,000 people were killed and a million exiled within their own country.

In El Salvador, even during the Carter Administration’s sanctions against the country as a major human rights violator, Israel maintained its usual ruthless presence there too, involved in “anti-guerilla assistance.” “During 1977-79,” says Beit-Hallahmi, “when Israel was most active [in El Salvador], it was also training counterinsurgency teams less elegantly known as death squads.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 86] During the Carter sanctions, “Israel supplied the military regime of El Salvador with over 80% of its weaponry for the next several years, including napalm for use against the Salvadoran civilian population.” [MARSHALL/SCOTT/HUNTER, 1987, p. 89]

Israel’s undercover secret police and military assistance has also been provided to the dictatorial regimes of Honduras and Nicaragua. With the collapse of the Somoza dictatorship in the latter, Israelis joined United States efforts to topple the new Marxist regime. In the resulting Civil War, the Israeli press reported that “on June 26, 1979… Israeli-made Arava planes were being used to bomb the poor neighborhoods of Managua [the capital of Nicaragua].” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 91] Prominent “private” Israeli arms dealers and their agents funneling weapons to the anti-government Contras included Ya’acov Nimrodi, Pesakh Ben Or, Pinhas Dagan, Amos Gil’ad, Michael Kokin, Emil Sa’ada, Yehuda Leitner, and David Marcus Katz. [MARSHALL, SCOTT, HUNTER, 1987, p. 115-116]

“Pro-Israel groups in the United States,” says Benjamin Ginzburg, “cooperated closely with the [Reagan] administration’s efforts to undermine support for the [leftist Nicaraguan] Sandinista regime… Jewish groups, including the Anti-Defamation League, obliged… They worked with White House officials… to publicized charges that the Sandinista government was anti-Semitic.” [GINZBURG, p. 210] (In 1983 the U.S. Embassy in Nicaragua noted that it had “no verifiable ground” to charge the Sandinista government with anti-Semitism. The Associated Press even noted in 1986 that most Jews fled Nicaragua when its dictator was toppled, and that perhaps as few as five Jewish families remained in that country. [NOKES, R., 3-20-86]

In March 1988 the Jewish Week reported that “[President] Reagan accused the [leftist] Sandinista regime of rampant anti-Semitism and of cooperating with the Palestinian Liberation Organization. Behind the scenes, the President’s remarks were, in part, the result of research provided by the National Jewish Coalition (which began life as a committee of the 1980 Reagan-Bush campaign) and brought to the president’s attention by the White House liaison to the Jewish community, Max Green.” [BESSER, p. 9]

In the 1980s, Panama military strongman Manual Noriega ran the country and its links to Colombian drug rings, assassinations, and frauds with the help of right-hand man Mike Harari, an Israeli Mossad officer. For a time, a Jew, Eric Arturo Delvalle, was the formal President of Panama; his brother-in-law was the publisher (Robert Eisenman, a convert to Judaism) of Panama’s major daily newspaper, La Prensa. [GOLDBERG, JW, 6-31-87, p. 4]
In Haiti, Israelis were army suppliers and advisers to dictator Jean-Claude Duvallier, and in Chile “Israel became a major arms supplier… after the Carter Administration suspended all United States aid to the Pinochet regime in 1977.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 99] Israelis were also involved in varying military degrees with regimes in Argentina, Paraguay, and Bolivia. “Israel continued the selling armaments to Argentina during [its] Dirty War,” notes Judith Elkin, “Some Israeli weapons bought by the junta were undoubtedly used for repressing civilian populations, Jews and non-Jews alike. Critics (including Rabbi Marshall Meyer, a principal defender of human rights during the proceso) condemned Israel’s readiness to sell weapons to morally indefensible regimes.” [ELKIN, 1998, p. 144]

Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, in his 1987 volume, The Israeli Connection, underscores what he believes to be some of the disturbing foundations to all this Israeli profiteering in blood and gore throughout the world. In this view, such deep Israeli activism in the suppression of liberation and human rights movements everywhere in the Third World has a close echo to the situation in their own backyard: the Palestinians. To accept any movement for human justice against imperialism and colonialism across the globe is to be forced to inevitably recognize and uncomfortably face the profound injustices Israel inflicts upon the Arab community in, and around, its own territory. “The idea of liberation for Third World groups,” says Beit-Hallahmi, “threatens the very existence of Zionism. Concepts of human rights are too dangerous for the Israeli political system… The injustice done to the Palestinians is so clear and so striking that it cannot be openly discussed, and any discussion of what Israel has been doing in the Third World is certain to lead to an examination of the rights of the Palestinians.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 236] To allow the many dictatorships of the world to collapse and be replaced by political liberation movements would be to increasingly isolate the oppressive state of Israel as an extinct breed, and grievously endanger it.

Beit-Hallahmi, himself an Israeli citizen, addresses the disturbing issue at stake here succinctly:

“Israeli activities in the Third World are significant reflections of the basic nature of Zionism and the state of Israel, and the resulting Israeli society and worldview. From Manila in the Philippines to Tegucigala in Honduras to Windhoek in Namibia, Israel’s emissaries have been involved in continuous war which is truly a world war. And what enemy is Israel fighting? It is the population of the Third World, which cannot be allowed to win its revolution. The only thing that guarantees the continuing rule of Third World oligarchies is the suppression of any spark of independence or power among their peoples. Israeli advisers have much to offer in the technology of death and oppression and that is why they are so much in demand.” [BEIT-HALLAHMI, p. 243]

But the Israeli marketing of death does not stop suddenly at the doors of the Third World. For all the billions of dollars the United States government continues to pour into Israel and its military foundation in search of Jewish “security” in the Middle East, there is even a disturbing payback form the Jewish state in helping to make the streets of America as dangerously insecure as possible.
Israeli arms profiteering, after all, knows no moral compulsion and must seek any selling opportunity. In September 1997 the Los Angeles Times noted that:

“Thirty United States senators urged President Clinton to suspend the importation of thousands of assault weapons that have come to symbolize the ineffectiveness of laws designed to staunch the spread of such rapid-fire weapons… Specifically, the lawmakers asked Clinton to block the importation from Israel of semi-automatic Uzi and Galil firearms that have been modified to avoid restrictions placed on them and other assault weapons in 1994… [Senator Robert G. Torricelli of New Jersey], a strong supporter of Israel, said he had never envisioned he would be part of a campaign critical of that country’s government, which owns the company exporting the contested weapons. ‘If there is any country in the world that should understand the problem of dangerous weapons and the damage they can do in a civil society,’ Torricelli said, ‘it is Israel.’ He said he could not let ‘an obvious evasion of the law’ exist without adding his voice.” [BRAZIL, 9-28-97, p. A28]

With all the evidence of chronic racism, injustice, inhumanity, brutality, ruthlessness, exploitation, oppression and aggregations of all manners of expressive evil noted in this chapter, what may we conclude about the continued, widespread Jewish American effort to stick their collective heads in the sand and stifle much-merited criticism of their hallowed “homeland?” What planet, for instance, was Eugene Borowitz on when he declared twenty years ago that “most diaspora Jews are proud of the state of Israel for what it has done to transform the normal dictates of politics to a more humane style of using power.” [BOROWITZ, p. 127] For many American Jews, of course, endlessly absorbed in identity myth-making, trying to salvage Jewish “chosenness” in a democratic context, the contradictory avenues of Jewish ethnocentric “particularism” and pan-human “universalism” are, as always, forcibly entwined like a band-aid to an oil slick in cushioning Jewish-American conscience. Israel, claims Leonard Fein, “was – and is – an effort to produce a society parochial in structure but universal in ideology.” [FEIN, p. 6] “The primary concern… of Zionism,” insists Steven Katz, “is justice.” [KATZ, in STALLSWORTH, p. 99] “I’ll tell you what Zionism is,” said New York politician Bella Azburg, “It’s a liberation movement for a people who have been persecuted all their lives throughout human history.” [POGREBIN, L., p. 48]

Not surprisingly, in the widely held Jewish view, criticism of Israel is merely a disguised version of irrational anti-Semitism. “According to an unpublished survey in 1986 by the political scientist Asher Arian,” notes Charles Liebman and Steven Cohen, “58% of all Israeli Jews believe that criticism of Israel heard in the world stems from anti-Semitism.” [LIEBMAN/COHEN, p. 62] “Since 1967,” says Israeli Meron Benvenisti, “[Israel] has become one of the pariah states in the international system. Israelis do not try to explain their isolation in rational terms such as opposition to their holdings in the occupied territories or international power politics. For them it is a recurrence of anti-Semitism directed now towards the new Jewish state instead of towards individual Jewish communities in the Diaspora. This being the case, all criticism can be dismissed as anti-Semitic and unfavorable actions perceived as an added instance of persecution.” [BENVENISTI, p. 77]

In America, in one survey six out of ten American Jews agreed in 1993 that ‘the criticism of Israel that we hear about derives mainly from anti-Semitism.” [LIPSET/RAAB, p. 126] “It always astounds me,” wrote Letty Pogrebin, a senior editor at Ms magazine, “when people say that the answer to anti-Semitism is Palestinian rights rather than the lack of Jew-hating.” [POGREBIN, in KLEIN]

“Anti-Semitism,” says psychoanalyst Mortimer Ostrow, “has acquired a new face recently – it presents itself as antagonism to the state of Israel.” [OSTROW, p. 58] “One senses hostility towards things Jewish in a nonreflective anti-Israel stance,” says Sara Horowitz (about African-Americans, Hispanics, and other American “multicultural” minority groups), “an inclination to overlook, minimize, or trivialize racism when aimed against Jews; a denigration of Jewish traditions, communities, habits, cultural markings, and learning.” [HOROWITZ, S., 1998, p. 120] “On this point,” notes Arthur Liebman, the Jewish [political] Left, Center, and Right as well are in strong agreement: the Left’s denial of the legitimacy of Israel is necessary and sufficient grounds to label it anti-Semitic.” [LIEBMAN, A., 1986, p. 352]

“Anti-Israel sentiment,” asserts Justin Hertog of Vassar College, “has replaced anti-Semitism as a more sophisticated form of Jew-hatred.” [HERTOG, p. 14] “Blanket condemnation of Zionism as against specific Zionist policies,” declares Irving Greenberg, “is ipso facto anti-Semitism.” [ELLIS, M., 1990, p. 27] “An area of major concern today,” wrote Yehuda Baer, “is that very complicated issue of anti-Semitism masquerading as anti-Zionism… Whether one deals with Israel as a people or Israel as a state, anti-Zionism is an anti-Jewish program.” [PEARL/PEARL, p. 129] In the world of sociology, complained Irving Horowitz in 1993, there are “assaults on the ‘fascist’ state of Israel, with the claim that the high participation of Israeli sociologists in the American Sociological Association is a function of ‘the huge U.S. aid to Israel.’ The emergence of Israel as a nation state, far from taming the anti-Semitic conundrums, has only intensified such attacks… Whether this anti-Zionist/anti-Jewish tendency will sprout wings and take off remains difficult to determine.” [HOROWITZ, I., p. 91]

“Those who are critical of Israel,” says Tobin, “are more likely to hold anti-Semitic stereotypes. Some anti-Israelis may represent new forms of anti-Semitic expression.” [TOBIN, p. 50] “Almost half a century after the establishment of the Jewish state,” adds Evyatar Friesel, “… many Zionists have discovered that there are historical characteristics in the Jewish community that are very resilient. None seemed more resilient than what Leon Pinsker, over a hundred years ago, called the ‘Judeophobia of the Gentile.’ It is quite astonishing that more than forty years of Jewish statehood has hardly changed the basic premises of the relationship between Jews and non-Jews.” [FRIESEL, E., p. 232]
“To say that anti-Zionism is not anti-Semitism is a lie,” once declared prominent Jewish Argentinian Jacobo Timerman, “It is like saying that there is difference between authoritarianism and totalitarian governments — another adventure in semantics.” [BECK, E., 1982, p. 193]

The profoundly disturbing subtext to such commentary is that it is not the aberrant commentary of marginal Jewish fanatics, it is the Jewish norm. Intelligent, well-read, informed, largely secular people collectively cling in a veritable religious manner to martyrological folklore above all empirical evidence about the causes of anti-Semitism and the moral foundations of their Jewish homeland. The widespread Jewish refusal to face, and remedy, the enormous suffering the state of Israel causes non-Jewish people grossly transcends mere oversight. It is a consciously created political program of international Jewish elitism and it is sinister. Unfortunately, probably most of Jewish identity and its ceaseless passion for itself truly boils down to the most selfishly primitive of all human emotions: individual — and in the Jewish case, collective — self-preservation at all, and any, moral costs. As the dominant world view in the Jewish community, it is the complete unwillingness — even paralysis — to recognize and address human suffering unless it is Jewish. As Jewish psychotherapist Irene Bloomfield suggests,

“In its desperate fight for survival and in becoming an occupying power, Israel has used harsh and inhuman methods, which would probably not have deserved mention if used by some of the Arab states, but torture, oppression, and inhumanity cannot be justified according to our own laws, yet any criticism of Israel by outsiders often evokes a furious and extreme reaction on our part and is experienced like an attack on the family and is therefore intolerable.” [BLOOMFIELD, I., p. 28]

It has been suggested by some Jewish observers (as reported elsewhere in this work) that anti-Jewish hostility (“anti-Semitism”) is a necessary glue to maintain the “otherness” of Jewish identity. The World Jewish Congress noted a similar theme in 1981, that Israel’s violent tensions with the Arab world are a very crucial rallying point for Jewish identity:

“For the preponderant part of Diaspora Jewry whose attachment has been to Israel, rather than to Judaism and Jewish ways of life as such, it seems quite clear that a comprehensive peace [with Palestinians], given present trends [in 1981], must be expected progressively to result in a weakening sense of Jewish identity, a lesser concern for Israel and for other Jews, and in less identification with Jewish organizations and communal affairs.” [WALINSKY, L., 1981, p. 104]

What, one wonders, would modern Jewish identity be without the necessary antithetical echo of non-Jewish hostility to it? The World Jewish Congress seems to suggest what the answer might be for many Jews: very little. Or even nothing.
A 2001 survey of Israelis by the World Jewish Congress found that:

- 57% believed there was more anti-Semitism in the world than 10 years earlier.
- 75% “agreed that international anti-Israel sentiment is motivated by anti-Semitism.
- 67% “said anti-Israel politics at the United Nations is driven by anti-Semitism. [AXELROD, T., 10-29-01]

“One must come to terms with the past. One cannot wholly escape it. One may reject it, but the very mode of rejection is often conditioned by the past itself. A man is, first, the son of his father. In almost all tribal societies, the patronymic is part of one’s name. And the sins of the fathers – in the psychological, if not the legal sense – are apt to be burdens on the sons as well.”

Jacob Neusner, 1972, p. 64

We must inevitably conclude a circle in these many pages, back where we began: a reassertion of the ethical legitimacy of investigating collective (“peoplehood”) responsibility for collective deeds, so clearly, and ominously, epitomized in the example of the Germans and the growth from them of Aryan fascism.

Primo Levi, a well-known Jewish survivor of Auschwitz, flying in the face of “political correct” platitudes, confronts directly the obvious value and logic of critical generalizations:

“It is dangerous, wrong, to speak about the “Germans,” or any other people, as of a single undifferentiated entity, and include all individuals in one judgment. And yet I don’t think I would deny that there exists a spirit of each people (otherwise it would not be a people) a Deutschtum, an italianità, an hispanidad: they are the sums of traditions, customs, history, language, and culture. Whoever does not feel within himself this spirit, which is national in the best sense of the word, not only does not entirely belong to his own people but is not part of human civilization. Therefore, while I consider insensate the syllogism, ‘All Italians are passionate; you are Italian; therefore you are passionate,” I do however believe it legitimate, within certain limits, to expect from Italians taken as a whole, or from Germans, etc., one specific, collective behavior rather than another. There will certainly be individual exceptions, but a prudent, probabilistic forecast is in my opinion possible.” [LEVI, P., 1988, p.183-184]

What, we may fairly wonder, from the evidence found in this volume, is the “probabilistic spirit” of the Jewish people? Levi’s unemotional, reasoned assertion opens the door to an avalanche of troubling issues about them.

The positive side of the Jewish “contribution to civilization” (“Jonas Salk invented the polio vaccine,” etc.) is not in this volume. That perspective is represented in its one-sided form everywhere elsewhere, always: an impenetrable monolith of saintly Jewish self-celebration in today’s popular culture. This volume, however, is more akin to a long complaint, an underscoring of Jewish historical responsibility.

This book insists that, while Jews take credit for so much good in modern civilization, they must also take their fair share of blame where it is also reasonably merited. Why is this necessary? Because modern Jewry is not an oppressed minority. It is, by all measures, a center of economic and social power, and political control. Virtually all corners of society are effected by Jewish influence. Yet modern Jewish identity continuously screams its alleged disadvantages, configuring as a relentlessly Accusing Finger, constantly demanding – demanding attention, demanding concession – all rooted in the foundation of the Jewish martyrlogy tradition. To this day the Jewish community still defames Arabs, Poles, Lithuanians, Ukrainians, Russians, and others, including all Gentiles as a categorically “guilty” Other for historical crimes against Jewry. Modern Jewish identity has become a collective aggression, a collective demand, a collective accusation, a collective insistence upon continued, never-ending reparation and further power. As the old saying goes, there are two sides to every story – but the non-Jewish side of history (in its interaction with Jews) is afforded absolutely no forum anywhere in popular culture.

The best defense is an offense, as the Jewish community today knows well; they are so very skillful at it. This volume asserts a counter-view to Jewish mythology and aims to balance the scales. The common notion that anti-Semitism is a “mystifying disease,” or that “prejudice” and “discrimination” is always and completely irrational, is preposterous. All people make prejudicial and discriminatory decisions about everything continuously, based upon their life experience, as part of the process called life. What human being is not “discriminatory?” We are all human. But why are Jews afforded so much “prejudicial” slack in their apparent “right” to defame all others around them with impunity? In the long term, endlessly one-sided “victim” assaults upon alleged oppressors are not healthy solutions to interethnic tensions. True resolution, true health, is a dialogue, an exchange, and exploration of mutual prejudices (and the reasons for them), and a willingness to be drawn to sympathy for the others’ side – not merely consistent concession to one group’s accusation and demand.

If today’s Jewry did not constantly wield – and exploit – a distorted history as evidence of (and claim to) moral supremacy, if Jewry did not function as an unified entity towards collective self-aggrandizement at the expense of all others, and if Jews melted as truly equal neighbors into American (or wherever they lived) society, and if Israel was merely another country and not an international Jewish nerve center, there would be no reason to write this volume. Unfortunately, this book is much, and crucially, merited.

One cannot fairly discuss Gentile racism without addressing the very powerful Jewish version of the same thing. One cannot righteously discuss any notion of “anti-Semitism” without equal attention to Jewish “anti-Gentilism.” One cannot fully address Jewish identity without examining its traditional religio-racist tenets. One cannot understand the worldwide centuries-old animosity towards Jews without understanding the enduring Jewish animosity towards all others. One cannot understand the Holocaust without understanding the genocidal basis of Israelite land claims in the Old Testament. One cannot understand how the Holocaust fits into modern Jewish identity without an examination of the virtual Jewish need (rooted in old religious tenets: “punishment by God”) to be victims. One cannot understand the nature of American consumer society without understanding the enormous Jewish contribution to its formation and maintenance. (Conversely, one cannot fully understand the nature of communism without addressing its Jewish impact in deconstructing Christian social order). One cannot fully understand the workings of the modern mass media without addressing its Jewish component. One cannot understand Jewry’s claim to be champions of social justice without noting its significant obverse: traditional Jewish “double standard” ethics and the profoundly disproportionate, and elite, Jewish representation in white collar fraud, international drug networks, the prostitution trade, the slumlord ethic, and so forth, as well as Jewry’s rank as the wealthiest ethnic community in America. One cannot dismiss the many “stereotypes” about Jews and money, without investigating the evidence that prove cores of truth to these assertions. (How, one wonders, does a collective commitment to social justice in capitalist society make a group of people – so incongruously – the most affluent?) One cannot understand the awesome American governmental charity to Israel without understanding the Jewish role in American government and popular culture. One cannot understand “democratic” Israel without understanding its profoundly undemocratic fabric and the ancient “nation apart” principles upon which it has been created. And one cannot understand today’s notions of American democracy without understanding “particularist” Zionism’s increasing subversion of it via the dominance of Jewish political money.

There are plenty of people of Jewish descent who do not support Israel, who are not wealthy slumlords, who are not racist, and who exhibit in all spheres the solidiest of moral character. But where are they when the Collective Jewish Body speaks, acts, and oppresses in their name? If the Jewish community dictates a “community of fate” by bloodline, surely all those of even partial Jewish heritage have a stake in raising critical voices against the steamroller that claims them.

In the non-Jewish world, there are those who have no interest in being led by Jewish messianism, whether religious or secular. There are those who do not believe that Jewry and disputable “Jewish values” represent the navel of the world. There are those who are tired of endless Jewish complaint and demand. And our proposed multicultural society must ultimately fail if it is so incredibly Jewish-centered and, emulating the Zionist model, so heatedly Balkanized. A just, and real, multicultural democracy in the social, political, and economic worlds would represent ethnic communities in a rough approximation of their population numbers. Let all peoples have a voice, per the original concepts of the Constitution. That’s fair, at least as fair as humans can aspire. But we do not have that. In far too many realms, we have Jewish dominance.
Does speaking the truth about Jewish identity, power and history lead to Jews being led to concentration camps and ovens? (As so many Jews preposterously proclaim, as a veritable religious conviction today). Nonsense. World wars (where murder is the norm) lead to people thrown in ovens. Fanatical ethnocentrism leads to people thrown in ovens. The suppression of free speech leads to ovens. Military states and institutionalized racism leads to people locked up in concentration camps. Censorship, intolerance, and allegiances to sacred racial pedigrees lead to mass murder. How is it that the mere mention of the unpleasant facts of Jewish history is dictated to be tantamount to genocide against the Jewish people? True, there was an Adolf Hitler: his existence is used as a Jewish shield against any criticism. True, Hitler condemned the Jews and sought to exterminate them (as he did others) as part of a master plan to rule the world. But it is absurd, even manipulatively sinister, to dismiss the context of the broader scope of World War, and the struggles and sufferings of all other people, and equate criticism of Jews with mass murder. For good reason, as we have amply seen, criticism of Jews throughout history knows the full political spectrum. Even Hitler’s hated ideological enemy and polar opposite, Karl Marx, criticized Jews. Even in the works of Theodore Herzl, the secular Zionist “King of the Jews,” one can find echoes of the same themes. Not mass murder. But legitimate criticism.

The Jewish community maintains a “head in the sand” approach to Jewish history and identity, systematically censoring all the many Jewish-inspired unpleasantries of the past, singularly gleaning from all of human history only the “Jew as victim” scenario. Those who dare to break the institutionalized muzzles today to address Jewish bigotry, past and present, are themselves defamed as bigots. Always and everywhere, the Jewish community is held to be beyond criticism. Today “anti-Semitism” is repeatedly and categorically described throughout the Jewish community as merely a “mystifying disease,” only attributable to Hitlerian psychological perversions. This is profound evidence that the collective Jewish community has lost its intellectual, and moral, compass. It fears even partial blame for the tragedies in its history. The Jewish community is in denial. Not only is it in denial, it censors at every opportunity any penetration of this denial. When one studies history carefully, intent upon finding a rational “cause” for anti-Semitism, there are, unfortunately, answers to be found. And if there should ever be a real “cure” for this “disease,” the FULL story of history must be squarely faced. And honestly. That’s the beginning of real dialogue.

The Jewish conviction that their historical suffering transcends all others is religiously based (even the term “Holocaust” has religious roots) and the “Holocaust is unique” theology can be dismissed, as we have seen, rather easily, except to the degree that ANY atrocity is in some ways special to its own context. This Jewish view of itself (that no other genocide approaches the special Jewish suffering) is also racist: it is the traditional Chosen People identity (the racial lineage to Abraham theme) expressed in a secular (although catastrophic) form.

Because of profound Jewish power and presence – and enduring intra-Jewish allegiance – throughout modern popular culture, the many myths of Jewish identity are an integral part of the daily diet of modern America. And, increasingly since the Enlightenment, the Jewish struggle to cope with its collective neurosis (Who is a Jew? What is a Jew? How do I balance Jewish chauvinism and ethnocentrism against worldwide universalistic themes?) has been woven like a knot into the very essence of modern western society.

It is the principle of democracy that it is in everyone's best interests to resolve an issue by fully, and freely, exploring it. In a true democracy, those that are factually and ethically wrong may be proven as wrong, not repeatedly threatened, shouted down at first voice and suffocated. The alternative to the free exchange of ideas is censorship, authoritarianism, totalitarianism. And fascism. Jewry's self-preserving strategy through the centuries has always been to stifle free debate, lobby with governing powers behind the scenes, and to sit on the lid of the resultant pressure cooker. (Orthodox Jewry, after all, formally forbids critical exploration of its tenets). Then comes the shock for Gentiles when, all at once, as if an explosion, the repressed story is somehow suddenly revealed. This volume argues that in a free society, all facts, and the full realm of evidence, must be placed on the table towards open discussion. And, afforded the full range of information, “the people” (moral, decent, democratic people – Jews among them) can decide what it means.

The fact that this simple democratic premise is such a radical idea in the case of the Jews is the beginning of the healthy debate. Let us begin with honesty for a change:

Who are the saints of history?

No one.
